of it by the tax-gatherer, all of which has been brought upon them by the conduct of the people of these States, to feel over-anxious for their return to participate in ruling the nation without the best and strongest assurances that they are safe in doing so. Another reason which keeps them watchful and careful is that almost every Union man in the whole North, who has any considerable property, is the holder of the bonds of the Government, which they feel would be put in peril if the southern men, even with northern help, could ever again hold the control of this Government. It is not true, sir, that the Union people of the North are dissatisfied with the policy or the action of Congress on this subject. What they do fear is that we shall not stand firm to the end; they fear the effect of patronage on us, and they have far more reason to than we have to fear for them. Now, Mr. President, what luck do you suppose some postmaster, or marshal, or assessor, made by the President out of a copperhead, or limping Republican, would have among these people arguing for the immediate and unconditional admission of the rebel States?

The idea is simply ridiculous. The truth is that the Union masses of the loyal States stand firmly with Congress in this matter and will do so to the end if we do not allow them to make issues against us by the adoption of untenable measures. Our platform is firm and strong, and all the Union party will stand with and by us upon it, unless we by our own folly let in a weak timber or rotten plank to frighten them from it. In this particular matter of the political patronage of the President, if we do nothing that can be made an excuse or cover for it, if the President turns out good Union men because they sustain Congress and concur with the mass of their party, and puts in others because they agree with him, he will raise a storm of indignation against himself among Union men as has not been witnessed before. The truth is that the President, if he entertains any such design, cannot build up for himself against the Union party, a presidential party of any considerable numbers without having in it the men who opposed every measure for the putting down the rebellion, who discouraged enlistments, opposed the draft, voted the war a failure, and many other things of that character. This very fact will destroy his party if he endeavors to make one. Where those men go the people will not. The people look upon this thing now as they did during the war, not as an ordinary question of politics, but as a question of loyalty or treason, and if the President abandons the great Union party to form one for himself, and his party is made up, as it must be in the main, by the men who opposed the war, they will soon be the only ones left in it.

If the President is ambitious to have such a party as this, shall we deny him the benefit of a few hired mercenaries in the shape of Federal office-holders if he desires? If he chooses to make changes, so far as my own State is concerned he will have to make them from men who do not belong to the Union party, if he must have men who support his policy, for I have never yet heard of a Union man there who does not most cordially support Congress. And I believe my State is not singular in this respect, but that the same will be found true of every loyal State. Let us then have faith in the people, stand firmly upon our principles, avoid all false and doubtful expedients, leave to the President the full and free exercise of every constitutional right and prerogative, so that any action of his hostile to the party that elected him, if he be guilty of any, shall be without excuse. If we can keep from killing ourselves, I have no fear of the President being able to do so, even if he entertains any such wicked purpose.

Mr. President, I expect to be rebuked and lectured here and elsewhere for opposing this amendment. I know that one can hardly be allowed to question a measure here, however injudicious or unwise he may deem it, without incurring the charge of being a copperhead, or a conservative, or a Johnson man. I have seen in a leading Republican paper a notice of my motion to reconsider the vote by which this bill was passed, in which it was said that I had adopted the language of the copperhead press, and the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS.] My ideas on this subject may be odd and old fashioned, I admit, but they are such as have always obtained in Vermont.

Mr. President, I do not know anybody who can sustain such accusations with less danger of injury to themselves than Vermont and her representatives. Vermont has always upheld freedom and law. The doctrines of equal rights and equality before the law have been there maintained since the days of Ethan Allen. Her legislation, her officers, and her courts have ever faithfully fulfilled her will in sustaining liberty and freedom according to the Constitution and laws. When the war of the rebellion came upon the nation no State in the Union contributed her proportion of men more promptly than Vermont.

Her sons showed their patriotism and courage on many a bloody field, with equal credit at least to those of any other State. She paid as heavy a legacy of death, in proportion to her numbers, as any other. She bore her share in putting down the rebellion most cheerfully, and she did it to preserve a Government of constitutional law. She does not desire to have her representatives here aid in frittering away what has cost us so dearly to maintain. She desires her representatives to stand firmly for her principles and their principles, but to make their fight clearly within the pale of constitutional law.

The two great measures of this session of Congress which elicited the difference of views between Congress and the President were the Freedmen's Bureau and civil rights bills. I assisted in the preparation and perfecting of both those great measures in committee. I voted for both on their original passage in the Senate, and voted for the passage of both notwithstanding the President's veto. I voted for the joint resolution declaring that no State which had been in rebellion was entitled to representation or to share in the Government of the nation until both Houses of Congress should agree thereto. I think I may safely claim to be ranked as a supporter of the policy of Congress. It might in reference to these measures be said of me as a political wag said of a leading Anti-Mason in my State in the days of the rule of that party, "that he was such a fool that he believed in his party principles."

I feel a firm and abiding confidence in the soundness of our position, and of being able to maintain it before the people. Our party professes to be based upon something higher and nobler than mere temporary political expediency, and to stand upon the great doctrines of liberty and justice. It seems to me especially important that our practice should correspond with our professions; and that we should not undertake the acts of mere political adventurers. In this if anywhere lies our danger. An open and manly stand upon our principles, disdaining all political quackery, relying upon the intelligence and patriotism of the people, will carry us safely through to ultimate victory.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, much has been said by the Senator from Vermont to which I shall have no occasion to allude, as I am not in a position, nor about to assume a position, that makes it necessary for me to go over my political record in order to satisfy my friends at home, in the Senate, or elsewhere, that what I am about to do is not a departure from my previous course. I regret very much that in discussing this question the Senator from Vermont, in a prepared and written speech, should have reflected upon the majority of the Senate as he has felt at liberty to do. I regret, sir, that a Senator with whom it has usually been my pleasure to act, should have risen in his place and denounced a measure voted for by a majority of the Senate, by nearly all his political friends, and which he himself had once voted for, as political quackery, as an indirect and sinister way of legislating, and as an attempt to do something in a way which is not open and honest. Does the Senator from Vermont mean to impute to a majority of this body dishonesty in its action, that it is governed by sinister considerations, that it does not act openly and fairly? I will not suffer myself to be betrayed, Mr. President, into such a reply to these remarks as I think they would warrant. In a body where we are equals, where the motives of members are not to be assailed, and where one is presumed to be as honest as another, I have never indulged in any remarks claiming for myself greater honesty than others; nor have I imputed to others sinister designs or dishonest motives.

The proposition under consideration has received but a small part of the Senator's attention. He has denounced it as monstrous; he has spoken of it as a resort to a doubtful and desperate measure, as one upon which no party can stand; and he has said that he is disposed to make the fight within the pale of the Constitution. Does he mean by that that anybody here is disposed to make a fight without the pale of the Constitution? Why, sir, I think the majority of the Senate who voted for this measure have as much respect for the Constitution as the Senator from Vermont, and as little inclination to resort to any sinister or dishonest mode of legislation to carry out their objects.

What, sir, is this amendment? And it is to that that I design to confine my remarks, and not to go into the history of the war, to recount the gallant deeds of the sons of Vermont or of any other State. Sir, the heroic boys who went from all the States into the Army to put down this rebellion did their duty, those from Vermont as well as from elsewhere; and, sir, our legislation here should be shaped to secure the fruits of the victories which their valor achieved; and we should not permit by our legislation the fruits of the victories which they won at such great sacrifices to be lost to the country and to posterity.

The pending proposition is simply this: that persons unconstitutionally in office shall not be paid. The Senator admits that he would have no objection to that portion of the amendment which provides that if the President shall undertake to fill a vacancy which existed when the Senate was in session, after the Senate has adjourned, the person with whom he fills that vacancy should not be paid; so that to do so much is not dishonest nor a resort to a desperate measure. He is willing to refuse pay to an appointee in that case; he makes no objection to the provision on this appropriation bill; and what does he object to? He objects to the refusal to pay a salary to a person who obtains his position by a removal without cause, and who is put into office for the purpose of breaking down the Union party of the country and turning the Government over into the hands of the men who have been fighting for five years to destroy it. He tells us that the people of Vermont, of whose gallant sons he has spoken, and to the bravery of whose people he has paid a just tribute, are in favor of saying to the President of the United States, "You may, without consulting the Senate, hurl from office without cause whomsoever you please, and put in their places anybody you please, a rebel from the rebel army if you will, and we, the people of Vermont, will pay the man you thus appoint in the recess of the Senate." He is willing to tax the fathers of the gallant boys who went from the State of Vermont and fought to put down the rebellion, for the purpose of paying a rebel, it may be, who is put into office without the sanction of the Senate, and, as I insist, in defiance of the Constitution, when to secure him a place a faithful officer is, in the recess of the Senate, removed without cause, except to make room for a partisan of presidential policy.

The Senator says he would require him to take the oath. Does not the Senator from Vermont know that there are hundreds of traitors in office to-day that have not taken the oath?

Read the documents upon your table from the different Departments and you will find there are many in office who have never taken the oath.

Sir, it may be that the people of Vermont are in favor of saying to the President of the United States, "You may remove from office whomsoever you please, you may put in office whomsoever you please, without the constitutional sanction of the Senate, and we are prepared to tax ourselves to pay the salary of the man you put in, though he be a traitor and ready again to conspire to overthrow the Government." Sir, it may be that the citizens of Vermont are for that, but the citizens of Illinois are not. I claim not to know the views of the Senator's constituents, but I think I know something of those whom I have the honor to represent.

The amendment, as originally proposed, related to the filling of the vacancies which existed during the session of the Senate, and which the President would have had an opportunity to fill in the constitutional way by the advice and consent of the Senate. That was the original proposition. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] thought it would not do to adopt it in that form because there might be connected with the revenue some officer who was squandering the public money, and if it was necessary to remove him for malpractice and put an honest man in his place it would not do to say that the successor appointed under such circumstances should not be paid until he was confirmed by the Senate. In order to meet that objection the amendment was changed so as to provide that in case of a removal by the President during the recess of the Senate of an officer for any act or omission in violation of public duty, where a person was appointed to fill a vacancy thus occasioned he should be paid. The President can, if this amendment becomes a law, remove and appoint in case of malfeasance in office, and the appointee will be entitled to his salary. That does not satisfy the Senator from Vermont. What does he want? He wants the President to be vested with authority to remove without cause for partisan purposes, and it may be for the purpose of aiding to force into Congress representatives from States not fit, according to the Senator's own showing, to be represented. That is his object in moving this reconsideration. There can be no other. But he tells us the President either has the power to remove, or he has not the power to remove from office, and if he has the power at all it is unlimited. I do not so understand the Constitution. I do not so understand the practice under the Government.

The Senator from Vermont tells us that from the foundation of the Government this power of the President to remove and appoint at pleasure has been recognized. I would like to inquire of that Senator if it has been recognized in the Army and Navy. Has it not rather been denied? Will he point to the clause of the Constitution that restricts the power of the President in the appointment and removal of Army and Navy officers any more than it does in the appointment and removal of civil officers? Has not Congress from the foundation of the Government denied the authority of the President to remove, except as provided by law, a very large class of officers, both in the Army and in the Navy? Have we not denied it also in relation to civil officers? It is not true that the President has from the foundation of the Government exercised this power ad libitum. I am not disposed to go into that argument. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] exhausted that subject the other day. He showed how many removals had been made under the different Presidents, and I was astonished at the few that were made by the earlier Presidents. I shall not go over the argument to show whether the power to remove exists or not. I think that subject has been sufficiently argued. But, sir, if the President has not the authority to remove during the recess of the Senate, as a general proposition, does the Senator deny that we may give him that authority? I take issue with the Senator from Vermont as to the authority of Congress in this respect. I insist that we may confer upon the President the power to remove in vacation by law, and wherever he does make a removal in vacation in pursuance of law and makes an appointment in pursuance of law in vacation, it is proper we should pay the appointee; but because we by statute confer upon the President authority for cause to remove and appoint in vacation, does it therefore follow that without legislation he can remove and appoint in vacation? Why, sir, we confer upon the President this power to appoint officers by creating the office. We establish a new Department of the Government; we increase the number of judges; we establish a judicial district; and how does the President get authority to appoint a judge or a marshal or an attorney? He gets it in pursuance of the law that creates the office; it is in pursuance of an act of Congress that he gets the power to make the appointments at all.

Just so in regard to the removal and appointment of incumbents in office. We may provide by a statute that for cause he may remove a man from office during the vacation and substitute another in his place, and submit to the Senate when the Senate convenes the question of whether they will advise and consent to the new appointment. Congress may go further. They may authorize the President to appoint and remove inferior officers without asking the advice and consent of the Senate, and we have often done so. The Constitution expressly authorizes Congress by law to invest the appointment of inferior officers either in the President alone or in the judges of the courts or in any of the heads of Departments; and in pursuance of this authority the appointments of various minor officers all over the country have been vested in the President alone and heads of Departments. Now, would it not be competent to provide in one of these statutes, when we give him the power of appointment without consulting us, that he should not have the power of removal without cause?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will my friend allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the case of the Comptroller of the Currency we provided by law that he should not be removed without the consent of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I thank my friend from Maine for that suggestion. I recollect that there is such a provision, which was made, perhaps, in 1863; and the provision which it is now proposed to insert as an amendment to this bill also has a precedent the same year. The Senator from Vermont has denounced it as aggressive on the President, as inviting attack, as assailing him, whereas in 1863, when Congress was acting in harmony with the President, there was attached to an appropriation bill—the Army appropriation bill, I think—a provision very similar to this, not going quite so far, but providing that no officer appointed without the advice and consent of the Senate to a vacancy to which their advice and consent might have been obtained, should receive any compensation until he was confirmed by the Senate. So, sir, this is no new proposition; it is no new proposition in an appropriation bill; it is no new proposition in the law to deny the authority of the President to remove from office without the consent of the Senate. It was denied, as I am informed expressly, and as I recollect in 1863, in regard to the Comptroller of the Currency.

So the Senator from Vermont is mistaken as to the power of removal having always been exercised by the President ad libitum, and I believe he is totally mistaken as to the exercise of this power in the removal of the officers of the Army and the Navy; and I should like him to draw the distinction between them and civil officers. No President, so far as I am advised, ever undertook at will and without authority of law to appoint and dismiss officers of the Army and officers of the Navy.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. During the war, by special law, the President was authorized to summarily dismiss officers of the Army.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If there was such a statute, it is in confirmation of my argument, because it shows that Congress specially conferred the authority upon the President. Perhaps there was a statute passed during the war on the supposition that it might be necessary at such a time for the President to have the power summarily to dismiss and appoint officers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest that there is a statute of that kind. I have looked at it within a day or two; but the authority was not conferred upon the President by that statute; it had been exercised by the President before, with regard to striking the names of officers from the roll of the Army. He had been in the habit of doing it in special cases.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Had the President been in the habit of dismissing them from office?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes; before that.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But that law gave particular authority to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Was not the power given after trial by courts-martial?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Generally it was; but there were some special cases where it was done by the President himself.

Mr. JOHNSON. The case of General Gratiot was one instance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There were several instances in which the President exercised the power of striking the names of officers of the Army from the rolls at once. So it was in the Navy. I think there was a case recently; my impression is that Captain Preble was removed from the Navy, dismissed the service.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Was not that since this act?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; before.

Mr. ANTHONY. Was there not a court-martial?

Mr. JOHNSON. General Jackson dismissed one or two for sending a challenge.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Was there not a law expressly prohibiting the sending of challenges?

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course there was; but there was no law giving the power to the President to remove a man for that reason. General Gratiot was dismissed by Mr. Van Buren without any court-martial.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maryland if that power has ever been conceded. It has been discussed and denied since I have been a member of the Senate. I mean the power to remove at pleasure an Army or Navy officer.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know it has been denied, but it has always been exercised.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In a very few instances.

Mr. JOHNSON. I mean to say that in every case where the President thought there ought to be a removal he has removed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not so understand it. I understand the law provides for courts-martial and trials to remove a military officer. Does the Senator from Maryland mean to say that in every case where the President thought a man ought to be removed, instead of putting him upon trial, he has assumed to remove him himself; that that is the general practice of the Government?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; I did not say that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Has not the practice been the other way in a large majority of cases, that the officer has been tried by a court-martial or in some other way, and been dismissed the service, if dismissed at all, in pursuance of the finding of a court? Does not the law provide for that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is done under the Army regulations; but although that is the general practice, yet, according to my recollection, there have been some instances where Presidents have, without any court-martial, taken the responsibility of striking the names of officers from the rolls of the Army.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am bound to suppose there have been such cases. I did not recollect them, but they are the exceptions; the general rule is the other way, and the very fact that the law provides a mode for trying incompetent officers or officers guilty of malfeasance in office who are attached to the Army and Navy, goes upon the idea that without this authority the power to dismiss them summarily does not exist; and I am quite sure if the records are searched there will be found to be very few cases of the character alluded to by the Senators from Maryland and Maine. Mr. Van Buren, it seems, exercised the power. I was not aware that any President had done it, and I apprehend that it will be found that it is of recent origin, and that no such power was attempted to be exercised in the early history of the Government; and the general rule is unquestionably the other way.

The Senator from Vermont tells us it is an anomaly that a man may legally fill an office and yet not be entitled to pay. Is it an anomaly? There is a bill pending on the table now authorizing the appointment of commissioners without any pay. They legally fill the office created by law, commissioners to go to Europe without any pay at all. Is that an anomaly?

Mr. POLAND. The Senator misunderstands my position. Where a man holds an office and the law makes provision for his payment, provides what his pay shall be, it seems to me very strange that we should undertake to provide that he may hold the office and not have the compensation which the law provides.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The law would not provide any compensation when we took it away, would it? Is the old law any better than the one which repeals it? Then the Senator from Vermont takes this position, that we have a right to establish an office and not establish any salary to it; but having established an office with a salary, we cannot take the salary away. If that is satisfactory to him, he is entitled to the benefit of all that that argument can give him. I do not think because we once attach a salary to an office we are obliged to continue the salary, any more than when we create an office we are obliged to give a salary with it. If there is a former law giving a salary inconsistent with this, of course this subsequent statute repeals it.

But the Senator tells us he has no knowledge that the President designs making any removals; he does not know that the President has any purpose of the kind. Well, sir, I have some knowledge that removals are being made throughout the country. It is not proper to speak here of removals which have been made and are now pending in executive session; but if it was, I think I could bring to the notice of the Senator quite a number of cases. But, sir, outside of executive session, I have seen it stated in the newspapers of the country that the marshal of the western district of Pennsylvania has been removed, that the collector of internal revenue in the district of Pittsburgh has been removed, that the postmaster in Pittsburgh has been removed. Sir, I have heard of a number of removals, which are also noticed in the papers in my own State. Yes, sir, I have heard of a letter written to a man holding an insignificant office in Illinois from one of the Departments, informing him that, having taken part in a meeting which passed resolutions sustaining Congress, he would have an opportunity to explain the matter. The Senator seems not to have heard of any of these things.

Now, sir, I have as much confidence in the people as the Senator from Vermont. I do not believe the people of this country are to be corrupted by patronage; but I am opposed to fostering men for the very purpose of giving them the benefit of official position to defeat measures which I believe, and which the Senator from Vermont has told you he believes, essential to the best interests of the country.

This amendment having been adopted, I trust the Senate will not reconsider it. It was not an original proposition with me. The Senator from Missouri first proposed an amendment to this appropriation bill which seemed to me defective, and I aided in trying to perfect it. This explains my connection with it. I thought it was proper then; I think so now; and I think that after having adopted this amendment by the deliberate vote of the Senate, if we now recall the bill and reconsider the vote by which it was adopted, it will be virtually saying to the President of the United States that the Senate is prepared to vote money to pay men put into office for the very purpose of defeating the measures which we believe essential to the preservation of the Government and the perpetuity of our free institutions, and put there, too, by displacing faithful officers against whom no complaint exists. I am sorry if the Senator from Vermont cannot stand upon this position before the people of Vermont. I regret that he feels he cannot stand upon the position of refusing to pay men put into office at the sacrifice of men who are discharging their whole duty to the Government. Sir, if a man in office has been guilty of any official act of omission or commission the President may remove him, and his appointee, whoever he may be, is entitled to pay; but if he has been guilty of no official delinquency whatever, and is removed by the President during the recess of the Senate simply for the purpose of giving place to a person who will do the behests of the President or of anybody else, except in the proper discharge of his official duty, I think he ought not to be paid till confirmed by the Senate; and I am willing to stand upon that position before the country and the people of my own State.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am very much gratified that the Senator from Vermont has felt it to be his duty to submit a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate upon this amendment, and I think that we ought to discuss the matter without the slightest political feeling. It is a question which may become important, far more important than it appeared to be at the time it was first introduced by the Senator from Missouri.

This amendment is attached to an appropriation bill; it is a condition-precedent to the payment of any money for the support of the Post Office Department during the next fiscal year. Unless the President is willing to assent to this proposition affecting his power to remove and appoint to office this appropriation bill cannot pass. If he approves the bill, he approves it with all the conditions and qualifications attached to the appropriations. It is therefore a condition to an ordinary appropriation bill, and unless he does approve it, it must receive the sanction of two thirds of both branches of Congress or it cannot become a law; and in the event of his disapproval we shall either be called upon to pass the bill by a two-thirds vote of both branches, or we shall be compelled to abandon it and to lose the appropriations for the next fiscal year for the Post Office Department.

During the short period of my service in Congress I have passed through three or four scenes of this kind. Once the arbitrary will of one man in this body defeated the Post Office appropriation bill to the serious detriment of the public service and to the severe loss of the Treasury. That was the case of the defeat of the Post Office appropriation bill in 1859 by Robert Toombs in the Senate. On another occasion, last year, by a political amendment attached by the House of Representatives to the miscellaneous appropriation bill under the lead of a prominent gentleman in that House, an amendment which the Senate disapproved of and which the House sought to force upon the Senate, the result was the defeat of the miscellaneous appropriation bill to the very serious loss of the Treasury and very great inconvenience to the different Departments of the Government. There is another case where a condition proposed to be appended to an appropriation bill caused great injury to the public credit.

In view of these circumstances I always hesitate when conditions are proposed to appropriation bills. I do not doubt the power of Congress to attach these conditions. We have the unlimited power over the public Treasury. No money can be drawn from the Treasury without an appropriation made by law, to which each House must assent; and therefore the Senate may, as a condition-precedent, impose terms upon the House of Representatives, or that House may impose upon the Senate, or both Houses may upon the President. The Constitution gives us that power; but I say it is a power which ought never to be exercised, and these political conditions ought never to be attached to appropriation bills unless it is to accomplish some great overriding good which is greater and higher than the evil of the defeat of an appropriation bill. That principle cannot be varied. We cannot attach qualifications or conditions to these bills unless we seek to accomplish some overriding good that cannot be accomplished in any other way, and to accomplish which we are willing to risk the defeat of the ordinary appropriations of the Government.

That is a principle which cannot be departed from; and therefore, as a general rule, it is never wise to attach to these bills which are intended for the support of the Government any conditions or qualifications of a political character. What is the consequence of it? The Executive may differ from Congress. It has been so in the past. Many times Congress has differed from the President. Suppose that Congress exercising its power over the public money should attach conditions to appropriation bills which are not agreed to by the President, what is the result? Revolution; either the President will then be compelled in violation of the Constitution to seize upon the public Treasury and pay the expenses of your Government, contrary to law and contrary to his oath of office, or else he will have to suspend the operations of the Government. Suppose this amendment should lead to an open breach between Congress and the President, what can he do? There is the Post Office Department which affects every man's house and home, which carries his letters from his wife, from his children, which transacts all his business of that character, which affects all the intimate relations of life—are we to endanger the ordinary appropriations for this great branch of the public service by a mere political controversy between Congress and the President as to his power of removing public officers?

I say that now is the time for us to consider this question before it goes further and before any such breach is made. It may be said that the President will sign this bill with this condition in it. I hope he will if it passes; but suppose he should not do so, we shall then have the question before us, and I prefer to meet it now. As a general rule to be applied in all cases, both in this and all other Administrations, I am opposed to attaching conditions to the appropriation bills. When Mr. Buchanan was in power, when Mr. Pierce was in power we had similar questions up and I always opposed any such efforts.

I say, then, that we ought to meet at the outset every effort to attach these political or disputed problems to an appropriation bill. There is no excuse, let me say to my fellow-Senators, for this proposition at this particular time, because we in Congress, representing the great Union party of the United States, supported, as I believe we are, by the great mass of the people, probably ninety-nine out of every hundred of those who sent us here, have the power to pass the laws we think necessary, without attaching them as qualifications to an appropriation bill. We can pass any law which meets the sanction of our political party, by the requisite vote, either of a majority, or, in case of a clear proposition, by a two-thirds vote. There is, therefore, no occasion, in order to accomplish any political object, to attach this as a condition to an appropriation bill. If, however, only a majority of both Houses of Congress could agree upon any bill that might be proposed, that shows that we ought not to attach that opinion of a majority of each House to an appropriation bill, because we should not force upon the President any provision of law against his deliberate judgment unless we have the power to do it by the constitutional vote of two thirds of both Houses. We should not make the public necessities which demand that certain Departments of the Government be supplied with public funds a reason for forcing upon the President a provision that might not meet his sanction if it stood alone. It is impossible, it seems to me, to combat this plain proposition.

But, sir, beyond that—and upon this point alone I rested my argument before—I was willing to meet the object embraced by the amendment of the Senator from Missouri; but upon an examination it was found, and I think very clearly proved, that the law of 1863 met all the difficulty that he proposed to meet, and that was an attempt on the part of the President to fill offices the vacancies in which occur during the session of the Senate. The law of 1863 provides for that case. If the President after the adjournment of the Senate undertakes to fill an office the vacancy in which occurred during the session of the Senate, he does it without the authority of the Constitution. He has no power to fill vacancies which occur during the session of the Senate, except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and if he attempts in violation of the Constitution to exercise a power not conferred by the Constitution, we are then perfectly justified in withholding appropriations; indeed, we should not do our duty unless we did withhold the appropriations, because if we should pay officers thus illegally appointed we should consent to a violation of the Constitution on his part. But now in the case provided for by this amendment there is no denial of the power of removal, but a denial of the right of the officer to receive his money. The Constitution provides for two classes of appointments: one class where a vacancy occurs during the session of the Senate; it must be filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; the other is the case of a vacancy which occurs during a recess of the Senate, and then the President from the nature of things and by the express provision of the Constitution has the power of appointing a man to office to fill that vacancy, but the vacancy is only filled by such an appointment until the end of the following session of the Senate. The officer thus appointed by the President is a legal officer. As I said the other day there is no power conferred by the Constitution upon the President to remove any one from office. That power is only inferential. That power may be regulated by law. That power is not limited or restrained in the least by the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. The amendment does not say that a Union man shall not be removed from office and a rebel put in. That seems to be the proposition he debated; but that is not the proposition he has submitted to us. He says that no man shall be removed from office except for such and such causes; that is, a man who during this whole war has enjoyed the honors and emoluments of office shall not be turned out and a loyal Union soldier put in. That is one effect of his amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is after the session is over. If there is a man who has held an office during all the years of the war, and received its emoluments, he shall not be turned out and a Union soldier without a leg or an arm put in, or if put in that soldier shall not draw his pay until the Senate meets and passes upon the reasons for the removal, and then if the Senate does not think the removal is sufficiently justifiable by the reasons stated, he shall not have any pay at all. That is the effect of this provision. This, therefore, does not reach the purpose contemplated by the Senator from Illinois. His purpose, I know, is to prevent the President from removing men for their political opinions; that we all know to be the purpose; but the President has, by the very terms of the amendment, the power to remove.

All he has got to do is to give us a reason, whether that reason is wise or unwise, sufficient or insufficient. He may give us a reason, and turn us off with a reason. Reasons are as plenty as blackberries. He may say he removes a man because he is a civilian and the person he appoints was a soldier.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator does not remember the phraseology of the amendment in regard to that point. It is for an act done or omitted in violation of his duty.

Mr. SHERMAN. "For acts done or omitted in violation of the duties of his office." Take the case again which I formerly put: suppose an officer discharging the ordinary routine of his duties, say a clerk in one of the Departments, has enjoyed that office until after the adjournment of the Senate, there is no specific act to be alleged against him, but it is thought to be desirable to make a place for a Union officer, not a rebel—

Mr. CLARK. The clerks are not touched by this.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, take the case of an assessor or a collector or a consul or a diplomatic minister, and the thousands of officers covered by this amendment. Cabinet officers cannot be removed and anybody put in, rebel or loyal, except at the risk of not getting any pay in case the Senate disapproves the reasons for the removal. This amendment does not prevent the President from removing any man he chooses, and he may give us a reason or not just as pleases; the removal is complete and perfect by the will of the President; so that the amendment accomplishes nothing. It is true, the man who takes the office cannot draw his pay until the Senate meets; but do you punish the President, do you cripple his power, do you limit his control over the public officers? Do you accomplish what you desire to accomplish? Not at all. You may punish some poor devil who is compelled to exercise the duties of an office and not get any pay for it; but you do not hurt the President or hurt his feelings. The result will be that good men, poor men, may be deterred from accepting office under these conditions, while bad men or rich men may be indifferent to the salary attached to the office. I say, therefore, with due deference to the Senator from Illinois, that the amendment does not accomplish the purpose that he has in view; it does not limit or control the power of the President over the public officers, but simply aggravates a controversy which may never arise.

Now, sir, there is a way, I think, in which this matter can be accomplished—not by an amendment to an appropriation bill; not by a limitation of this character; but by the exercise of the power of Congress over the duration and term of the various public officers. Although it has been somewhat questioned at different times since the foundation of the Government, yet, as I have said before, I do not believe it has ever been successfully controverted that Congress may regulate the duration and term of a public officer, may limit the power of the President to remove him, may declare that such and such an officer shall not be removed except for such and such a cause. But a bill of that kind must be made with many discriminations, must be made after much care. There are certain officers that the President ought to have the absolute power of removing; I can name Cabinet officers; it would be intolerable that the President should be expected to carry on the business of this great Government with a Cabinet council over whose members he had not the power of removal, the complete and absolute power. For that reason, hostile political parties have often confirmed the Cabinet ministers of a President of opposite policies, on the ground that the President from the very necessity of the case must have the power of removing Cabinet ministers and appointing such as he chooses. He must administer those great offices through his personal friends, and no party would require him to appoint any but personal friends around him to these great offices. He must, therefore, have power over the Cabinet ministers. So, too, he must have a power over the diplomatic corps in a great measure. Those are officers appointed to represent our country abroad, holding confidential relations with the Secretary of State, and therefore the power over those officers ought not to be limited or controlled or crippled by Congress. But there are classes of officers who ought to hold their offices independent of the power of removal by the President—assessors, collectors, postmasters, and other officers who really may exercise political power; that ought by the law to be secured from unjust and arbitrary removal; and there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent Congress from passing a law on the subject, securing those officers in the discharge of their duties.

Mr. President, Congress has power over this subject much more ample than is generally supposed. Congress may prescribe that the judges of the Supreme Court or heads of Departments or courts of law may make a great variety of appointments. The provision of the Constitution is that "Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

Now, who is an inferior officer? Is a collector an inferior officer or a superior officer? Is an assessor an inferior or a superior officer? The Constitution says that "Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments." There is no limit in this relative character of officers except the wise discretion of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. The fair inference is that all not named are inferior officers.

Mr. SHERMAN. As the Senator from Maryland says, it is a fair inference that all officers not named in the clause of the Constitution, "ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for," are inferior officers.

Mr. HENDERSON. Madison says that a Cabinet minister is not an inferior officer.

Mr. SHERMAN. I take it that exercising common sense in the construction of the clause, no one would say that Cabinet ministers, who are officers of the highest grade, were inferior officers; but with regard to the host of subordinate officers, including postmasters, I have no doubt of the power of Congress to say that the power to appoint all the postmasters of the United States shall rest in the courts of law or with the heads of Departments. There can be no doubt of it; so that our power over this subject is substantially unlimited, and thus we have the right to control and check the power of removal. Why, sir, we declare by law that an Army officer shall not be deprived of his commission except by court-martial and trial by his peers; and the same is true of an officer of the Navy. So of the various officers under the steamboat law, who are removed by the action of the judge of a court, and the supervising inspector, and a kind of a board that is organized; and so of the Comptroller of the Currency. Congress have repeatedly imposed limitations on the power of removal, and there is no difficulty in this Congress providing such a limitation. I only say that the exercise of the power in this form is objectionable as an amendment to an appropriation bill; that this particular proposition does not meet the evil complained of; and that on the other hand we have a remedy and a power to control removals by the President furnished us by the Constitution, and which may now be exercised with great ease by this Congress if they choose to set themselves to work upon it.

From all the developments that have been made up to this time, I do not believe that we have the right to say, as the honorable Senator from Illinois says, that rebels will be appointed to fill the offices of the Government; that the President will turn his back upon those men who placed him in his high position, and appoint rebels to office.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust the Senator did not understand me to say that the President would appoint rebels. I said they might be appointed, and we had a right to provide that they should not be paid; but I do not think I said that the President would appoint rebels to office.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to extend the language.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But I understand that we are asked to repeal the test oath so that rebels can take office.

Mr. SHERMAN. There were certain cases in which men who had taken part in this rebellion were appointed to office. They were appointed by the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Treasury. The matter was referred to us in all cases, and we had a special message on the subject.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How was it with the provisional governors?

Mr. SHERMAN. They are not officers under the law; they are simply agents; and I believe it was so held by the Judiciary Committee. They are not officers under the law; they are not officers whose nominations are to be submitted to us; they are simply agents for the time being, provisional in their character, I may say like spies or other persons employed in case of war, not officers in any sense of the word.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are military officers or nothing.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are military agents and employes, but not officers. But waiving that question, two of the Departments of the Government have appointed subordinate officers who may be called "rebels." The Secretary of the Treasury has appointed certain of them subordinate agents to collect the revenue, and the Postmaster General has appointed a few probably as postmasters; but it has been wisely checked by Congress, and I believe the practice has now been abandoned. I think, therefore, there is no danger of such a contest as we now seem to anticipate by this amendment. If there is such a danger, we have the power to guard against it by a law. If this power shall be attempted to be exercised during the next summer after we adjourn; if the President of the United States shall seek to use the public money and the public offices for the purpose of breaking down any deliberate sentiment of the people of the United States, not only would the people of the United States be just and true enough to punish him, but we have it in our power next winter when we meet again to properly guard against such things in the future.

Let us not anticipate this danger. Let us not guard against it until it occurs. Let us not invite a controversy until it is upon us; and then we have ample and complete power over the whole subject. Let us not fear a foreign enemy, and arm our militia until he declares war against us and invades our country, and then we have the material within ourselves to repel the assault. I say Congress need fear no controversy with the President. He may appoint here and there persons whom we do not approve; but we have the power over such appointments in the Senate, and therefore I am opposed to seeking a controversy of this kind until it is forced upon us.

I have already said more than I intended on this subject. It is one of those unpleasant questions that it is difficult to argue. I prefer to rest my opposition to this proposition solely upon the ground that it is unwise to attach such a provision as this as a condition precedent to any appropriation bill.

Mr. STEWART obtained the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Senator from Nevada will excuse me, I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question.

Mr. STEWART. I will yield, if it will not take too long.

Mr. HENDERSON. I shall not occupy much time. The Senator from Ohio says we have entire control over this question, and that if the President should appoint, during the coming summer, men that we are not in favor of, we can control those appointments next winter. Let me ask the Senator, if the President can, immediately after the Senate adjourns, remove an officer and thereby create a vacancy, and can fill that vacancy, to last until the last day of the next session of the Senate, what is there to prevent his doing the same thing at the end of the next session, and so continue making vacancies always immediately after the adjournment of the Senate? Because, if the policy heretofore adopted by preceding Administrations be carried out, the President can create a vacancy at any moment he chooses by turning an officer out, and when a vacancy is created of course he can fill it. Then what control has the Senate over it? If the Senate rejects the appointment, the vacancy has been created, and of course the President can appoint somebody else. What control have we over it?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already stated that we can declare that an officer shall hold his office only for such a term, and that he shall not be removed, or we may take away from the President the power to appoint these officers, or give it to another department or officer.

Mr. HENDERSON. I thought that was the object of this amendment.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, as I am in favor of reconsidering this proposition and rejecting the proposed amendment, it may be proper for me to state my reasons, as they are somewhat different from any reasons that I have heard. If my views had been expressed by any other Senator I should not take this occasion to trouble the Senate with any remarks on this subject.

I have no doubt of the power of Congress to refuse to pay the appointees named in this amendment, or to refuse to pay anybody else, or to refuse to pass any appropriation bills whatever. I do not think there is any doubt about the power of the President to veto any bill that we may pass. I do not think there is any question of power involved, because that is ample. We can refuse to pass any bill or make any appropriation; but it is a question of policy, a question of a correct line of conduct. Inasmuch as it has been the habit in this Government for the last thirty years for the President of the United States to remove officers during the vacation of Congress and to appoint and commission others, and for the Government to pay them, there must be some new condition of things to make a law of this kind necessary at this particular time. It has not been the policy of Congress for the last thirty years to pass a law of this kind, and of course there must be some special reason now influencing Congress inducing them to pass such a law at the present time.

I have heard a great deal about the President's policy and the policy of Congress. I have heard a great deal about sustaining the policy of the President and sustaining the policy of Congress. The object of this amendment, so far as I have been able to learn from the course of this discussion, is to prevent the President from using this patronage in support of his policy. The world will so understand it. I believe that has been avowed here upon this floor. I do not think any one doubts that the object of this legislation is to prevent the President from using the power of his patronage to sustain his policy, it is said, as against the policy of Congress. If it be true that the President has a very bad policy, a policy that will be entirely destructive to the country, and Congress has a very good policy that will save the country, then it may be well to exercise this extraordinary power, unusual as it is; but that involves too extended a discussion for the present time. There is no danger until Congress does adjourn. While Congress is in session the Senate can reject all the appointments of the President; they need not confirm any of his appointments that are not suitable, and consequently no evil can arise until after the adjournment.

I suggest whether it would not be well to wait until the policy of Congress shall be developed, so that we can compare it with the policy of the President, after we know exactly what the policy of Congress is. I admit that I do not understand the policy of Congress, and I do not wish to commence a war on the President as such per se until we get in a position to know whether we agree or not. It seems to me we should devote ourselves to the all-important question of knowing exactly how we stand, and what we intend to do, and then there will be time enough to take all the necessary means to defend that policy when it is known. I have differed sometimes with the President, and sometimes with the majority of Congress, and I expect I shall continue to do so, and to exercise my judgment upon all questions; but when I see that Congress has a better plan than the President, I shall take every means I can to vindicate that plan.

Now, what are the plans of the two, so far as they have been ascertained and developed? I appeal to Senators, and ask them what are the plans of the two, and what do they propose to accomplish? I have never indorsed the President's plan in full; I have always had objections to it, and stated them on all occasions; it does not meet the whole question; but it is a plain and simple plan. He says to us, "Admit loyal members at once; restore the Union on that basis; retain your test oath; admit those who can take that test oath; and recognize the States as they existed." Some of us are not satisfied with that. It is possible that we shall never get anything better, however, in this Congress.

Now, what is the policy of Congress? That is the most difficult thing to ascertain that I know of. It is stated that we want security for the future. I admit that. I feel the necessity of security for the future. I am a warm advocate for all the securities that can be taken for our republican institutions in the future. I will go as far as any man in this Congress to obtain those securities which shall do us some good. I am not afraid to meet any question, whether it may be called popular or unpopular, when the emergency arises to obtain a guarantee for security for the future; and I am not afraid to advocate any proposition which will give us security for the future.

The question of negro suffrage has been the only grand difficulty. I stated to my constituents before I left home that whenever I came to the conclusion that negro suffrage was a necessity as a security for the future in the reconstruction of these States I should go for it. I came here. I found both Houses of Congress advocating this theory. I found them laying down the doctrine that it was the only security that could be taken. I found them earnest in its advocacy. In the other House a bill was introduced granting universal negro suffrage in the District of Columbia. That bill drew forth a discussion which will mark the annals of the history of debate in America to all time. I read that discussion attentively. That bill passed the House of Representatives by more than a two-thirds vote. It came to the Senate. The Committee on the District of Columbia, however, saw fit to amend it by restricting the suffrage and rendering it partial; but on motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. YATES] the bill was recommitted by almost a unanimous vote of this body, for the avowed purpose of making suffrage in the District of Columbia impartial; and from that day on until the 16th day of March I heard eloquent and able speeches on this floor upon that question, declaring that it was the only security that could be given for the future, and I became satisfied that Congress would do nothing else. I, however, continued to mention the difficulties in the way, the prejudice which existed in nineteen northern States that had the word "white" in their constitutions. The radical press assailed me; I was assailed in this Chamber and elsewhere as unsound, because I did not see my way clear. I could not be convinced that Congress would stand up to its principles, but I was laughed at for so thinking.

While I heard some Senators here contending for this principle, while I heard the voice of the press contending for suffrage for the blacks, I also heard others contending for the punishment of traitors and the disfranchisement of rebels. I was aware how popular that cry was; but I reflected that disfranchisement was the old road to tyranny. I reflected that it was the effort of faction to disfranchise faction that had sunk in oblivion all the republics of antiquity. I reflected that in modern times we had examples of disfranchisement in Ireland and Poland. I reflected that Mexico for the last fifty years had been playing this game of disfranchisement; that each faction that would come into power would disfranchise the others, and the result was anarchy. I reflected upon the argument that the honorable Senators made on this floor to the effect that the evil under which we are now laboring was the disfranchisement of four million blacks; that the experiment of disfranchisement in the South had nearly ruined the country, and brought on the recent war; that the cause of that war was the violation of the great principle of enfranchisement; and I shuddered at the idea of adding fuel to this fire, adding to the disfranchised blacks seven million disfranchised whites. I believed that what we wanted was amnesty and suffrage. I believed that we wanted amnesty for the rebels, suffrage for the blacks. I believed that we wanted to turn our attention to the principles of democracy, to put faith in the people. I saw no other road out of this difficulty, and finally arriving at the conclusion that Congress was in earnest, I introduced a resolution proclaiming universal amnesty and impartial suffrage. I repeat, I came to the conclusion that what the country wanted was amnesty to the rebels and an extension, not a limitation, of the suffrage; that all our ills had grown out of the fact that we had deprived four million blacks of their civil and political liberty, and that violation of the democratic principle had brought on this rebellion, and caused all the trouble we have had.

I know you say these men are rebels and should be punished. That is what was said in Mexico. That is what was said among the factions in Rome. It is the same argument that they used at the time they murdered the Catiline conspirators. Cato used the same argument, and in a few years afterward the same argument was used and drove him from Rome and made Caesar imperial. This argument that you use to disfranchise men leads to despotism, and it is a dangerous argument. It has been for insubordination, for treason, that the majority of mankind have been disfranchised; and you cannot show an instance on record where any good result has come from disfranchisement. On the other hand, we have some glorious examples of the beneficial results of a contrary policy. Scotland was enfranchised, Ireland disfranchised; compare the two. Compare our own progress with that of Poland. We have been enfranchised, Poland disfranchised. We were enabled to throw off the yoke when Great Britain attempted to disfranchise us. We have an example of the evil effects of disfranchisement in our own country. We found that the attempt to disfranchise the negroes, inferior as they are, few in numbers as they are, compared with the rest of our population, shook this great Republic from center to circumference, and now threatens its overthrow. However you may "beat about the bush," I believe on full reflection that if this controversy is ever settled you will come down to the principle of impartial suffrage and universal amnesty, or as near as may be. The mere exclusion of a few leaders from office is immaterial, one way or the other, but you must come down to that principle if you ever have a settlement.

Now, what is the policy of Congress on this question? It is not what it appeared to be when Congress met; and I mean to be understood on this point. I will change every time I see a principle that I have never discovered before, but I will not change and go backward unless I see a cause and a principle. I say that the position Congress occupies to-day is not a strong one. We have before us the report of a committee on this subject; a committee that has had great difficulty in agreeing; a committee composed of worthy and leading men in both Houses; a committee whose report is regarded by the country as extremely important, as reflecting the sentiments of this body—a report which I do not now propose to discuss, but which, if adopted, will become a policy. But, before we undertake war with others, let us organize and agree among ourselves and examine this report, and lay down the rules that shall govern us. I will look at that report for a moment, because I think it is important.

The first section of the constitutional amendment reported by the committee, if it stood alone, would grant universal civil and political rights, if it means anything. I think, however, that that was not the intention. If that was not the intention, it adds nothing to the Constitution. It is evident that such was not the intention, because the second section provides for a case wherein the States deny the suffrage. It admits that that is a part of the programme, that they may deny suffrage. The second section, which is regarded as so all-important, is a provision that has been discussed in its substantial features in this body for weeks, and has finally been voted down. If in making these constitutional amendments we are to be the judges, as we are from necessity, in our own case—because we cannot, until these guarantees are fixed, allow the South to come back, and we must judge for them and ourselves—I say then in examining the amendments, I want to judge impartially. I say this provision is not impartial. If a move in that direction is to be made, changing the basis of representation, we should change it from numbers to voters and not invent an unfair proposition as this is. Being a judge in my own case, I want to judge fairly. This section provides, by its practical operation, for excluding from the basis of representation the non-voting population of the South and including the non-voting population of the North. The non-voting population of the South, according to the contemplation of this amendment, are the blacks. They will be excluded because they are native-born. The non-voting population of the North are aliens, and they will be included because they are not citizens. I say, therefore, that this provision is unfair, and it will be regarded as unfair in its operation. If you are going to make a change in the basis of representation change it to voters, which I have always contended for.

But I say, furthermore, that I do not believe there is any necessity for this change. I believe that if we plant ourselves on the original principle of democracy, that all the people shall be trusted to vote, we will find no necessity for these expedients. I hope that before this session closes we shall arrive at some conclusion of that kind. I am opposed to wasting our strength now in a war with the President until we have spent our power upon these amendments and attempted to agree and have a firm foundation. He can do no harm until that is done; and when we have planted ourselves on the broad principles of democracy and equal rights to all men, we can stand forth bold and strong; our principles will fight our battles for us; but until we have a platform of principles upon which we can stand, it seems to me idle to fight the President.

The third section submits a proposition to the southern States to vote for their own disfranchisement. I say that when they vote for their own disfranchisement they are no longer entitled to freedom, and it should be the work of the United States to provide a penal colony for them and send them there. If they will vote for their own disfranchisement, they are less than slaves. I propose to call upon them for the enfranchisement of all men, but I never will submit to the proposition to call upon the South to vote for their disfranchisement. It may be inferred by this time that I am opposed to some of the provisions of this plan. I shall not be very enthusiastic in advocating a provision of this kind in our plan, but I do believe that discussion and time will bring us a good plan, and then let us commence our war on all who oppose our principles; but let us organize first.

The fourth section is a good one. It repudiates the confederate debt and all claims for damages for the emancipation of slaves. That is all right. Then it is provided that these amendments shall have been adopted by three fourths of all the States before any one of the southern States shall be admitted. You are not calling upon them to act individually. Their action will do them no good. It seems to me, as it stands, with a provision calling upon the South to vote to disfranchise themselves and making it impossible for them to get in unless they will consent to their disfranchisement, and postpone their admission until three fourths of the States adopt these amendments, it is not a very good plan. While I do not fully approve of the President's plan I freely say that I think the President's plan is a better one than the plan of the committee. I believe that we can get a better plan than either. I do not believe this report reflects the sentiment of any member of the committee. I believe it is a compromise of contending forces and conflicting opinions. They have gotten wearied of the subject. I believe if we get it into Congress and discuss it we shall develop something from this plan which will be more satisfactory. I do not believe any gentleman on that committee will say he favors that entire plan, but he will say, "I submitted to it in order to get a report." As it stands thus, let us postpone any outside issue; let us direct our attention to the work of reconstruction legitimately, and it seems to me fruits may come of it. We certainly never will agree upon a plan if we commence warring upon the President without a plan, distract our forces, and reduce our majority requisite to pass the plan when agreed upon; and consequently I hope that this amendment will be withdrawn and postponed until we know whether the President agrees with us or whether we differ from him.

I did not intend to be drawn into a premature discussion of this question, and perhaps I have anticipated too far the discussion that must necessarily arise upon the report of the committee. I do not intend to despair of getting a good proposition submitted to the country. I still have the utmost hope. I shall still do all I can to secure that end. If we can form none that is feasible, then I shall do all I can to prevent any special war being made upon the President, because if we have failed he has done no more, and we have no right to complain. I want to be distinctly understood that I shall not vote to destroy what has been accomplished by the President until a better plan of reconstruction has been agreed upon by Congress; and if he can use his patronage in aid of his policy let him do it, for unless we have a plan and a policy to vindicate we will have no use for patronage.

Mr. HOWE obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. As I am obliged to leave the Senate, I appeal to the honorable Senator to permit me to detain the Senate for about ten or fifteen minutes only.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I do not know that I made myself understood when this question was before the Senate on a former occasion, and it is likely that some of the members of the Senate may have supposed that I was of opinion that it was not in the power of the Congress of the United States to interfere with the President's right to remove in any case. I rise principally for the purpose of saying that I agree fully with the honorable member from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] that in relation to all inferior officers, it is competent for the Congress of the United States to vest their appointment either in the President alone, or in the heads of the Departments alone, and to provide either that they may be turned out by the party in whose power the appointment is vested or that they may not be turned out. In the case of Marbury vs. Madison, referred to by my friend from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] the other day, it will be found that Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the whole court in that case, went upon the ground that the particular officer whose commission was involved being an inferior officer and his appointment by act of Congress being for the period of five years, it was not in the power of the President to remove him during that period; and Mr. Justice Story, in those passages of the Commentaries to which the honorable member also referred, takes the same ground, and I have never heard it disputed, that it is in the power of Congress by law to place inferior officers in a situation to which the power of removal by the President will not apply, to withhold from him a power which he has not except with the consent of Congress, as far as the inferior officers are concerned. In the absence of any provision in relation to such inferior appointments, placing the appointee out of the reach of the party who is to appoint for the term of the law, whether he be the President or the head of a Department or a judge of the court, it is in the power of the appointing power to remove; but it is in the power of Congress to provide that there shall be no removal in such cases except upon such terms as Congress themselves may provide. The honorable Senator from Ohio, therefore, in my judgment—and I can add nothing to the force of his argument—is clearly right in the opinion that he has expressed. It is an opinion that I have held for many, many years. I entertained it after an examination of the subject during the Presidency of General Jackson.

I said the other day that the authority of the President of the United States to remove had not only never been denied by the Supreme Court in any of the cases in which that question was presented, but had been virtually admitted. The case that I had in my mind—the name of it, however, I did not for the moment recollect—was the case of ex parte Hennen, reported in 13 Peters. Hennen was a clerk of the district court of the United States for Louisiana. The act of Congress gave to that district judge the authority to appoint the clerk, and without assigning any cause for his removal other than the wish to appoint a personal friend, which appeared in the proceedings, he removed Hennen and appointed somebody else, and Hennen applied for a mandamus to compel the district court to reinstate him in the office. The court, in the opinion as delivered by Mr. Justice Thompson—as we all know, one of the ablest judges who ever sat upon that bench—throughout recognized, as I think, the authority of the President to remove. I will read a sentence or two from that part of his opinion. He says:

"It cannot for a moment be admitted that it was the intention of the Constitution that those offices which are denominated inferior offices should be held for life. And if removable at pleasure, by whom is such a removal to be made? In the absence of all constitutional provision or statutory regulation it would seem to be a sound and necessary rule to consider the power of removal as incident to the power of appointment. This power of removal from office was a subject much disputed and upon which a great diversity of opinion was entertained in the early history of this Government. This related, however, to the power of the President to remove officers appointed with the concurrence of the Senate; and the great question was, whether the removal was to be by the President alone or with the concurrence of the Senate, both constituting the appointing power. No one denied the power of the President and Senate, jointly, to remove, where the tenure of the office was not fixed by the Constitution; which was a full recognition of the principle that the power of removal was incident to the power of appointment. But it was very early adopted, as the practical construction of the Constitution, that this power was vested in the President alone. And such would appear to have been the legislative construction of the Constitution."

Then he refers to the acts constituting the several Departments of the Government, and in speaking of that which provides for the constitution of the Navy Department, he says:

"When the Navy Department was established in the year 1793, 1 Story, 498. provision is made for the charge and custody of the books, records, and documents of the Department, in case of vacancy in the office of Secretary, by removal or otherwise."

In all the other laws, the provision is "by removal by the President or otherwise." The words "by the President" are omitted in the act establishing the Navy Department.

"It is not here said, by removal of the President, as is done with respect to the heads of the other Departments; and yet there can be no doubt that he holds his office by the same tenure as the other Secretaries, and is removable by the President. The change of phraseology arose, probably, from its having become the settled and well-understood construction of the Constitution, that the power of removal was vested in the President alone in such cases, although the appointment of the officer was by the President and Senate."

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. JOHNSON. Thirteen Peters, page 259; and from that time to this—I am sure I can say with truth that I speak knowingly—no judge of the Supreme Court has ever questioned the power of the President to remove, although the appointment is made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. My honorable friend from Ohio has said that it never could be in any state of excitement the design of Congress to deny his right to remove his Cabinet officers; and yet it is in the power of Congress to repeal all the laws by which those officers are appointed. Cabinet officers are not provided for in the Constitution. His authority over them is derived from that part of the Constitution which says that he shall have the authority to appoint all the officers particularly named, and all officers the appointment of whom is vested in the President and the Senate. Congress may, therefore, repeal those laws and leave no Cabinet officers at all, and the President will have to act upon his own judgment; but the good sense and patriotism of the men of 1789 showed how important it was that the President should have official advisers, and they therefore provided that the heads of these several Departments should be what is termed the Cabinet of the President; and in all the laws providing for the appointment of those officers it is assumed that the power of removal shall remain in the President.

Now, my friend has said that we can provide against any removal by the President of postmasters and collectors of the revenue. That is all true. We may by law give to the President the power to appoint those officers and deny to him the power to remove them. We may give to the Secretary of the Treasury the like power and deny to him the power to remove them; but I am sure no Senator would be willing to say that the power of removal, in cases of that description, should not be vested somewhere; and the question, therefore, which would present itself, if such a measure was proposed to the Senate, would be, where will you vest it? Will you vest it in the President of the United States? If not, will you vest it in the Secretaries? It must be vested somewhere, or we must run the risk of having dishonest or incapable officers in the several Departments of the Government. If you vest it in a Secretary, the President can remove the Secretary, and appoint one who will suit him better, and thus effect the same object.

I agree with the honorable member that it is advisable that the patronage of the Government should not be used for political purposes. In the beginning of the Government, and in the debates in 1789, which led to the determination of Congress that the power to remove was in the President, it was stated, and it is so stated, I think, in one of the numbers of the Federalist, that the exercise of that power, without cause, would be a good reason for impeachment. But it has long been the practice of the Government to remove without assigning any cause; and it has now become, as I think, the settled construction of the Constitution, that so far as relates to appointments which you have given to the President, although they are to be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, he has a right to remove, and has a right to fill the places made vacant by removal, provided the removal is made during the recess of the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I shall be very reluctant to see this vote reconsidered and to see this amendment rejected, because I think the amendment a very proper, a very judicious, and a very necessary one. There is no mere measure of expediency and but few of necessity the defeat of which would occasion me so much chagrin and mortification as to have any measure of any kind prevail by the sort of argument which is adduced in support of the reconsideration of this vote. I could not but regret most deeply that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] thought fit to introduce here the argument which he has laid before the Senate. What is it? Conceding, for the purpose of his argument, our right to adopt this amendment, he still invokes the Senate not to do it; and why? Because it involves the Legislature in a collision with the Executive. For twenty years prior to 1860 a great deal of the legislation of this body, and a great deal of the political action of the people of the United States was controlled, not by appeals to the judgment of legislators or to the consciences and convictions of the people, but directly to their fears. The argument more potential than any other that was heard throughout the Republic was, upon various and sundry questions, not that it is or is not right and expedient, but you must adopt this or reject that; if you do not there will be a collision somewhere. I am glad to know that in those days, which I sometimes am made to fear were braver days even than these, there was no attempt to frighten the Legislature by pointing out the horrors of a collision with the President. We were threatened invariably with collisions in different portions of the Union. Different States of the Union said, if you do not submit to this policy, or to that, the Union will be disrupted. That was the threat which was held over the Legislature in those days. But now we are urged to pause, to reject an amendment conceded to be addressed to the discretion of the Legislature, because within its jurisdiction, for the simple and single reason that if we adopt it it may involve us in a collision with the President of the United States. Sir, if the Constitution, which we talk of frequently and which we regularly swear we will support, meant anything, if it meant to secure anything, it meant to secure a body to enact laws that should be as independent of the President as the President is of the Legislature.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me one word at this point?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator misunderstands me—

Mr. HOWE. I am not referring to the Senator from Nevada. I have not got to him yet.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator misunderstands me if he supposes that is the ground I place it upon. I place it on the ground that I do not know whether we have got any use for any such war as yet, and I want to wait and see.

Mr. HOWE. If my friend from Nevada will wait and see, he will know when I reach him. I was referring to the argument introduced by the Senator from Ohio. I say the Constitution intended that the action of this law-making tribunal should be absolutely independent of the action of the Executive, except through the simple exercise of the veto power. But the argument which is paraded here calls upon us as a matter of usage, as a matter of expediency, as a matter almost of necessity, to inquire at the White House what sort of legislation will be approved there before we venture upon it. I am unwilling to see any such usage adopted. I shall regret most profoundly the day when by any act or vote of the Senate or of the House of Representatives such a usage shall be sanctioned or seem to be sanctioned. When any proposition is laid before this body I ask, and I think I have a right in the name of the Constitution to demand, that its merits shall be passed upon with strict regard to its own terms. If we, a majority of this body, approve the merits of the proposition, we have no right to reject it. We betray what, in our judgment, is the true interest of the people if we do reject it. No man has a right to tell us that the President will veto the bill, and we have no right to listen if we are so told. When the Senate approves a measure right, it is bound to assume that the President will think it right, and that he will approve the measure; and upon this point I will not believe any testimony except the direct and official testimony of the President himself. When we have considered and approved a measure, then he is called upon to consider, and approve or disapprove; and when he has had an opportunity to consider, and has told us that he disapproves, I will believe him, and I will believe no man but him.

I therefore lay out of view entirely the suggestion that the adoption of this amendment will involve us in any controversy with the President. If he does not approve of the bill with this amendment upon it, he will veto the bill possibly; if he does not see fit to approve the bill, he will unquestionably veto it; and then the two Houses will be called upon to determine what they will do in that contingency, to pass upon the reasons he gives for not approving the bill.

But, says the Senator, it is an amendment to an appropriation bill—an appropriation bill every dollar of which is needed for the good of the public service, and by putting upon this bill this measure which may prove obnoxious to the President, you jeopard, you hazard the safety of the bill. How so, or if so, what possible measure can you put into an appropriation bill and not run the same hazard? Every single individual appropriation in this bill might have been opposed upon precisely the same ground. If any Senator had assumed to say the President is opposed to this or that appropriation, he could have called upon us with just as much authority to lay aside that particular appropriation upon peril of having the bill vetoed, and the appropriations lost in case we put it in. This is only designed to be one of a great many provisions in a single bill. It is not in terms an appropriation. It is in terms a direction as to the disbursement of the money appropriated, and I know of nothing more proper or more regular than the imposition of just such regulations as this, touching the disbursement of moneys upon bills making appropriations of public moneys.

But, says the Senator, if we do put it on and if the President does veto this bill, then the postal service must suffer and languish through a whole year, and we shall be held responsible. Why shall we be held responsible? What shall we have done to occasion this disaster to the postal service? We have seen fit to incorporate a section into the bill making appropriations for that service, which we approve, which we deem right in itself, and it is conceded by those who urge this argument to be right. We put it on to this bill; and the President, it is assumed, does not approve it, and therefore he will not assent to the appropriations, and we are to be held responsible for the disaster that overtakes that branch of the public service. I conceive that he who wrongfully refuses to approve the bill is alone responsible for the consequences that follow. If we put a provision in this bill which the President ought not to approve, then he is justified in vetoing the bill, and the consequences that may follow upon this service justly attach to us; but if we put nothing on this bill but what the President ought to approve, then I do humbly conceive that he ought to approve the bill, and if he refuses to approve the bill he is not only responsible for rejecting this proposition, conceded to be right in itself, but he is responsible to whatever consequences follow to this branch of the public service.

But the Senator from Ohio insists that it is not necessary. He says there is no necessity for it now; it is entirely within our power to do this thing; it will be justified if the President should assume to make removals for insufficient or unworthy reasons. But, the Senator says, that time has not come; wait; do not inaugurate the war; pass your regular appropriation bills; when another session shall have convened, if you find the President has exercised this power, then put on the checks. Is that sound advice to give to the Legislature? It is assumed here on the part of some that in the recess of the Senate the President may remove every officer employed in the public service, the term of whose office is not fixed by the Constitution. If there be danger that he will exercise this power for partisan or political purposes, the time will not come, perhaps, until Congress shall have adjourned; and the occasion will have passed before the next session will convene. The Senator says, do not anticipate any such thing; wait, try him, and when you convene again if you find he has done it, then provide the remedy. When the wolf is in the yard, be sure you shut the gate! Well, I am not anticipating any maladministration on the part of the President; but I find a certain power claimed here to make these removals, with or without cause, for any reason that pleases the President; I deny that such power is given to the President by the Constitution; I insist that the Legislature should not recognize any such power; but because I find it insisted upon here, and by some assuming to speak in the name of the President, I am led to fear that the power may be exerted, and if exerted it will be exerted during the very next vacation of this body; and when you come together again the occasion for its exercise will have passed; officers of the obnoxious kind will all have been removed from their places and those places will be filled with officers of the right kind, approved by the President himself. When that is the case, says the Senator from Ohio, then put on the brakes, to use a form of expression I get from the President himself. When he gets all these offices filled with just such men as he likes, then pass an act of Congress which will prevent him from making a removal without the consent of the Senate! It strikes me that that would be a little late in the season to plant with any certainty of a valuable crop.

But these were not the only objections urged by the Senator from Ohio; they were the objections that I regretted to hear the most, for I do not like to have such considerations addressed to a legislative body ever. I like to have their judgments, their reasons, their convictions appealed to; their fears never. There was another objection. He argues that by the adoption of this amendment we restrict the power of the President to make removals. I think so; it is the very purpose. But if we restrict him in the exercise of that power, says the Senator, we may put it out of his power to remove a civilian who has been in office from the beginning of the war and to put in his place a poor soldier who has been crippled in the war; and will you not leave him that power? No, Mr. President; I think we had better not under existing circumstances leave him that power. I take it that all the occasion of the exercise of that power that will exist for a good many years exists now. I thank my God that we are enabled to reflect at last that our soldiers are done being crippled. All the cripples that are to be made in the progress of this rebellion are now made and are to be provided for; here is the tribunal, the President and the Senate together, that can make provision for them; and I shall not concede, either upon the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio or upon the suggestion of any other member of the Senate, that the President is more willing to take care of these crippled soldiers than we are. There are numerous cases of the kind that wait to be provided for. I will not encourage the President to postpone that act of justice until this Congress shall have adjourned, and then do it upon his own private account. Let him do it now, because now justice waits to be done; let him send here the names of these crippled soldiers and let us pass upon the case. We can cooperate now, we are here to cooperate with him both in the act of removal and in the act of appointment.

The Senator admits, and I believe all who have spoken in opposition to this amendment concede to-day, that the power is in the Legislature to fix the terms of all these officers and to take from the President the right, if he has it, as I think by the statute he has, not by the Constitution, to remove any of these officers. We can, it is said, take that from him; and they say, why not do it? This is an indirect method of accomplishing the purpose, and the Senator from Ohio says it does not accomplish it after all. What is our purpose? To restrict the exercise of this power of removal. Do it then directly, they say, by act of Congress, and declare that the President shall not make these removals. Sir, that is only one way to do it. Is it a better way than this? That is the exercise of a greater power than this is. This does not say in terms, "You shall not remove at all," but it says that if you do remove without cause the officer whom you select to succeed shall not be paid. They tell us we may prohibit him from removing at all, but it is very hard to say when he has removed and a man has been appointed, that man shall not be paid. Hard? Why? Upon whom is it hard? It is not hard upon the incumbent particularly. It is not any harder than the existing law, under which the President can remove him or does remove whenever he pleases. It is harder upon the incumbent of the office, to be sure, than would be a law which said he should not be removed at all; but that we do not choose to say; we want to reserve the power somewhere to remove for cause; but is it hard upon the appointee? Yes, it does seem to be rather hard upon a poor, ambitious aspirant for a post office to say that after he is put into it and discharges the duties of it he shall not be paid; but recollect that is no harder upon the aspirant for the post office than it is to say to the President, as they suggest to us to say, "You shall not make the removal; therefore you shall not make the vacancy; and therefore you shall not make the appointment," for if we say that, as they urge us to say it, certainly the vacancy cannot be made, and certainly the aspirant cannot be gratified. But, says my friend from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] in an "aside," in the one case the man would hold the office, in the other case he would not. True as holy writ; but by whose fault or connivance does he hold the office? By the connivance of the Legislature? By ours? The law does not compel him to take the office. He sees fit to take it with the deliberate notice placed upon your statute that he cannot be paid if he sees fit to take office under those circumstances. He acts with his eyes open, and he acts voluntarily; there is no sort of duress or constraint laid upon him. Of what shall he complain? Why shall he complain?

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] seems to think we are anticipating, reaching out for, seizing a weapon to strike before it legitimately comes to us. He does not like this amendment. Why? Not because we have not the power to pass it, not because it is not right in itself, not because he would avoid a collision with the President, but he has not got ready to enter into a struggle with the President, because he does not precisely know whether he can stand by Congress or not. He waits to know what is the policy of Congress. Until he knows whether he is on the side of Congress he does not like to make up an issue with the President. Until, in other words, he can see and understand precisely how he will relish the service of the Almighty he does not like to desert—no, I believe it would not be proper to go on with that sentence, I will omit the rest of it; until he understands clearly that he will relish the service of Congress, he does not like to step out of the service of the President.

I do not know but that I am prepared to commend such prudence as that; and I cannot really relieve the Senator from his difficulty. I do not know what is the policy of Congress. I am struggling here to find out, to develop, the policy of Congress. I trust in the name of the Almighty and of the people and of the Constitution that a part of the policy of Congress is to adopt this amendment; and if my friend from Nevada approves it, I ask his assent to it. If he does not approve it, then I think he ought to vote against it. But I ask him to lay aside now and forever the idea that he is inaugurating a fight with the President of the United States when he simply sits here like a Senator and gives to his country the benefit of such judgment as he has upon any and every question that may be laid before him. That is the idea that I want to see started. It has lingered about these Halls a great deal too long, and it is because it has lingered here so long that it makes the adoption of just such an amendment as this so very necessary.

I have spoken so far, Mr. President—and I have spoken longer than I intended to do—from the stand-point presented on the other side, conceding that the amendment was right in itself and entirely within our discretion. Is there any doubt about it? I understand the Senator from Maryland concedes it to-day. I said the other day, and I repeat again, that whoever doubts or denies our right or our power to incorporate this amendment upon this bill ought to vote against it, and whoever doubts or denies the power of Congress to restrict the right of removal and to fix the tenure of these offices, I think ought to vote against the adoption of this amendment, for I concede now, as I conceded then, that if the Constitution confers upon the President of the United States the power to remove these officers, that is a power which he may exercise in defiance of us, and when he has exerted it in any case he has made a vacancy, and when he has made a vacancy he has not merely clothed himself with the right, but he has charged himself with the duty under the Constitution of seeing that vacancy filled. It turns, then, upon our right to restrict this power of removal. I shall not detain the Senate with any argument upon that point; to-day I do not understand it to be controverted; and I have only one single remark to make upon that head. As I read the Constitution, I must say that if the President has the right under the Constitution, and independent of statute law, to remove a postmaster at pleasure and for political reasons, he has the right to remove a judge of the Supreme Court. If he has a right to remove one of these civil officers, he has the right to remove every civil officer. I mean if he has it under the Constitution. But you tell me that the Constitution expressly fixes the terms of the judges, limits them to good behavior. Yes, I admit it. If you see fit to fix the term of a postmaster at four years or ten years, or during good behavior, the two cases are put upon a footing so far as the law is concerned. It being conceded that we have the right to fix the tenure of these offices, when we have done it it is just as much a law as the Constitution, for the Constitution of the United States is no more valid than any act of Congress made in pursuance of and in accordance with the Constitution; and if you see fit to fix the tenure of these offices, and yet concede that in spite of your law, which says it shall be four years or six years, the President may, under powers derived from the Constitution, remove within the term, then he may remove the judge; and every one of the officers employed in the civil or in the military or in the naval service is not an agent of the people of the United States, not an agent of the law, but he is a servant of the President.

Sir, if any such notion has prevailed in the minds of the American people, I think it is time to wipe it out. I could illustrate the necessity of this by facts which have fallen under my observation within a very short time. This is not the occasion to parade them before the Senate; but there is not a Senator sitting here that cannot point his own finger to numerous instances illustrating the necessity of teaching the American people that it was not the design of our institutions to make the President of the United States responsible for public opinion, or to make him a missionary clothed with patronage and power and emoluments for the purpose of inculcating his own opinions or his own political doctrines upon the people.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, when this subject was before the Senate originally, I did not mingle in the debate, because I considered it then, as it seems to be now, a controversy more between the two branches of the Republican party than between the Republican party and the party to which I belong. Sir, there seem to be two wings of that party, according to this debate, the one led by Congress and the other by the President of the United States. As I have said before, I belong to neither, but I belong to a party much older than either, a party having its origin at the foundation of this Government, a party under whose counsels and advice and management this country grew from a feeble Republic to be one of the greatest nations upon the earth. During its existence and control no civil war afflicted the land, and none of the evils were experienced under its management of public affairs that we have suffered during the short, brief, and terrible reign of this now distracted party. The Democratic party has but very little interest in this controversy as a party. Believing, however, the President to be patriotic, and that his policy, if carried out into practice, would conduce to the general benefit of the whole country, would be the means of soon restoring amicable relations between the States of this Union, and would again put us on the high road to prosperity and happiness as a people, the Democratic party, with a unanimity, yea, sir, a generosity seldom witnessed in the history of political parties, sustains the President in every constitutional effort to restore the relations which formerly existed between the States. That is the connection and that is the only connection which the Democratic party has with this controversy.

Sir, I should not have risen on this occasion if it had not been for a remark which was made by the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. FOLAND.] I listened with great pleasure to his speech. It was able; it was in good taste; it was just such a speech, with very slight exceptions, as we should have expected from a gentleman of his high reputation. But I was sorry to hear one remark which fell from the lips of that honorable and distinguished Senator. When war was raging in the land, when the passions of the people were excited, when brother was arrayed against brother, and when parties and individual men were striving to prove that they were more loyal than their neighbors, I expected that men would so far forget propriety as to deal in epithets towards their political opponents; but I had hoped that when peace had returned, when passion had subsided, when the spirit of party had become calm, I never again in the Senate of the United States should hear the term "copperhead" drop from the lips of any Senator. But, sir, there is an old maxim, de gustibus non disputandum est. It may be the taste of honorable Senators to indulge in such epithets; I will not imitate the example. Not that it affects me; but I hope that it is the last time in the Senate of the United States that we shall be compelled to listen to such epithets.

While I am up, Mr. President, I will say a word upon the measure now before the Senate. It is very strange to me how the power of the President of the United States to remove certain officers from their offices can, at this late day, be questioned. I had supposed that, as Senators, we were familiar with the early debates in Congress upon this subject, and I had supposed that if there was any question clearly and definitely settled, both by the practice of the Government and by judicial decision, it was the power of the President to remove those officers whom he had the power to appoint, and whose terms of office were not limited to a particular period, or during good behavior. Has the President the power, for instance, to appoint the heads of Departments? Has he the power to remove them from office if he sees proper? I do not know that I understood the honorable Senator from Maryland aright; I do not know but what he half conceded that this power might be taken away from the President by repealing the acts establishing those Departments. But to show that this power of removal clearly exists in the President I will cite two passages from the Constitution of the United States, if it is not now out of order to quote from that instrument.

The Constitution, in section two of article two, provides that—

"The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States; he may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices," &c.

The Constitution contemplates offices denominated here as Executive Departments; and in 1789 Congress proceeded, under the authority of the Constitution, to create those Executive Departments—the office, as it was called, of Secretary of Foreign Affairs, now Secretary of State, and the offices of Secretary of War, Secretary of the Treasury, and Secretary of the Navy. In the bills organizing those Departments this very question was most elaborately argued and solemnly settled by a vote of Congress, that the power to appoint and the power to remove both existed in the President of the United States. It passed by a very large majority. The main argument upon the bills establishing those Departments arose on the power of the President to remove the officers at the head of them, after he had appointed them by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The language of the Constitution is, that the President shall nominate and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint. Now, who appoints to office? What was the argument then? Some said the appointment was made by the President and the Senate; but if we look for a moment we shall see that the Senate has nothing to do in making an appointment; it acts simply as an advisory body. The President nominates and the President appoints, but before he makes an appointment he takes the advice of the Senate. When is the appointment perfected? Is it perfected when the Senate gives its advice? No, sir. Then the Senate does not appoint. The appointment is only complete and perfect when the President attaches his signature to the commission. It was decided in the case of Marbury vs. Madison that to render an appointment complete there must be the signature of the President to the commission. The commission is the evidence of the appointment, and it is not issued and signed until after the Senate has advised the appointment; but suppose after the Senate gives its advice, the President does not choose to make out the commission and does not affix his signature to the commission, I ask you, is there any appointment? Clearly not.

This shows that the President, and the President alone, has the appointing power, and that the office of the Senate is nothing but that of an advisory body. That being so, the question comes back to this: what is the principle governing the power of removal? Any one who looks into Lloyd's Debates of that day will see that the doctrine was universally admitted in the argument that the power which appoints is the power which can remove, and which alone can remove. I know that in those early days the question arose whether the only power of removal was not by impeachment. Some advocated that doctrine; among the rest,

Mr. Smith, of South Carolina. Some contended that inasmuch as it required the advice of the Senate before an appointment could be made, the Senate also had the power, conjointly with the President, to remove, and that the President had not the power without the advisory body. But after full argument—and it is one of the ablest and most exhaustive arguments to be found in the debates of Congress either in former or present times—it was decided by Congress that the President, being the appointing power, had in himself alone the power of removal. And, sir, should it not be so? What are these but executive officers? Their appointment is an executive duty; they are called upon to discharge executive functions; the President of the United States is responsible for their conduct to the people and to the country; and therefore, being chargeable with the due administration of public affairs, and being clothed with the executive power, it would, upon principle even, if there were no authority one way or the other, and we were driven to reason abstractly on the subject, be nothing but right and proper that the power to remove should be in the authority which is responsible to the country for the action of the executive agents.

But, sir, judicial decisions, as well as uniform practice, has settled the question. This principle was clearly recognized in the case of Marbury vs. Madison in 1803. It was recognized and decided to be settled law in the case of ex parte Hennessy in 1833. It was declared in both cases that the law was clearly settled, and if you turn to the Life of Washington, by John Marshall, Chief Justice of the United States, who certainly ought to have known something upon the subject, you will find that he declares it to be settled law that the power of removal is with the President alone. And yet, notwithstanding this construction and the uniform practice from 1789 down to the present hour, some in this debate have gone so far as to question the right of the President of the United States to remove the head of a Department or any other officer. I might add to this authority the weight of the great name of Chancellor Kent, of New York, who held the same doctrine. This debate is the first time in my life, in the last twenty-five years at least, that I have heard the doctrine questioned.

Congress itself has uniformly heretofore recognized the power of removal to be in the President. In the acts of 1789 establishing the Departments of Foreign Affairs or State, of the Treasury, and of War, provision was made for the appointment of subordinate officers to take charge of the books, papers, &c., of said Departments in case of the removal of the heads of said Departments by the President. This is a clear legislative recognition of the right of the President to remove, and every President has acted under the Constitution in conformity with this recognition of right.

But, sir, there are officers whom the President now has the power to remove that Congress may prevent his removing, by depriving him of the right to appoint them; but I hold that while you leave him the appointment of these officers, you cannot take away from him the power of removal. The Constitution empowers Congress to vest the appointment of inferior officers in the courts of law or in the heads of Departments. Congress has done that in reference to the appointment of clerks, &c., in the Treasury and other Departments. Congress may by law provide for the appointment of inferior officers by some other party than the President, if Congress sees proper to do so; but Congress has not so far seen proper to do so; and the proposition now is to attach to an appropriation bill for the support of the postal service of the country an amendment providing that if the President of the United States shall, not only in reference to a vacancy happening during the sitting of Congress, but in reference to a vacancy which may occur during the recess, undertake to exercise the power admitted to be his, the person appointed by him shall not receive pay unless he shall be confirmed by the Senate. All I have to say upon that (not feeling much interest in it as a party man or personally) is simply that it has not been done from the foundation of the Government up to the present time, under any Administration, however hotly war has waged between Congress and the President of the United States. When the President of the United States was a Whig, a Democratic Senate and House of Representatives never attempted to take from him this power of removal from office as it has existed ever since the foundation of the Government. When your President was a Democrat and your Congress Whig, they never attempted to deprive him of this power.

Let me ask gentlemen, what is the great reason for doing it now? If amid the hot conflicts of party in former days it was not found necessary thus to stigmatize the President of the United States, (for it is nothing but an attempted stigma upon him,) what great public emergency demands it at this late hour? Do you dare question the actions of your own President? When I questioned some of the acts of the late President of the United States, I heard the epithets "copperhead" and "traitor" rolling thick and fast wherever I went. Only two or three brief years ago if any man questioned the infallibility of the acts of Abraham Lincoln, if he had not one, two, or three plates of copper upon his head it was because the tongue of slander could not place it there. But now, sir, having a President of your own election, of your own choice, you attempt to deprive him of the power which has been heretofore admitted to belong to the Executive from the foundation of the Government. For myself I feel no interest in it as a party man. I have yet to find that the present Executive of the United States has appointed the first Democrat to office; and let me take occasion to say that while I consider it a pleasure and a pride to be the personal friend of the President of the United States, and while I approve and indorse fully every constitutional and patriotic effort that he has made to restore the harmony of this country, and again to cause us to be a happy and a united people, I am looking for my party to no crumbs that fall from the presidential table. Neither, sir, is the Democratic party looking for those crumbs; they did not vote for him; they have no right to demand his offices; and they do not demand them; but they claim the right, and it gives them pleasure, when he acts nobly and patriotically and manfully for the good of the whole country, to forget the fact that they did not vote for him, and to rally to his support; and if his hands at any time shall fall down, they will help to raise them up, if votes and counsel can help to raise them up. They have the harmony of the country, the peace of the country, the restoration of friendly relations between the different States more at heart than they have party triumph. Nay, sir, leave it, this day, to that good old party which launched this ship of state on the billows, to be out of office for four, eight, or twenty years, and to stay out, upon the condition of the restored Union under the Constitution as our fathers made it; place before them the alternative of restoring the Union which our fathers framed, or of their coming into power and having this country continually distracted, with eleven States kept out of the Union, and they would retire to the quietude of private life and rejoice that the flag of their country once more waved from ocean to ocean, and from lake to gulf, over a united, happy, and prosperous people.

It is a mistake when gentlemen suppose that the members of the Democratic party, in giving such support as they do to the measures and policy of this Administration, are actuated by party considerations, with a view of taking their President away from them, or with a view of getting their offices. Sir, we do not claim their offices. If we dared say anything to the President of the United States, we would say to him, "Give your offices to the men who voted for you and who sustain your policy, provided they are best qualified to discharge the duties of such offices; but take care, be sure, you give them to friends who will support you sincerely, honestly, and vigorously in the war being waged against you;" and the honorable Senator from Nevada to-day seemed to talk as if there was such a war. He knows more about the secrets of the Republican camp than I do. He ought to know all about that fact. He says, "Give us a platform and we can fight." Whom is the honorable Senator going to fight? I thought from what I heard in this Chamber that the Democratic party was dead and buried; we have heard that often enough. Surely you are not preparing a platform now to fight this dead party. Then it must be a platform to be used in this war between the President and Congress; and as to the side on which my friend from Nevada is in that fight, a doubt was intimated by my honorable friend from Wisconsin.

A word more on the subject before the Senate, in reference to the question of justice and propriety. You should remember that I am speaking impartially in reference to this matter. I have no interest in it whatever as a party man; but I ask you as a matter of justice, should not the President have the privilege of surrounding himself with a few friends? From what I have heard of the appointees of the former President of the United States, very few of them are the friends, as I suppose, of the present Executive. Now, would it not be just, would it not be magnanimous on the part of this great party, that is going to make war on the President, if it is going to make war, to give him the privilege of selecting a few friends to be around him? Certainly it is usual to allow a dying man to be surrounded by a few friends to comfort him in his dying moments. If the President be so weak that he has not one per cent. of the party that elected him as you say, can you not afford to let him take a few of that one per cent. to take counsel with, and to comfort him in his affliction?

Why, sir, look at the history of removals in this country. When John Adams came into office there was no occasion for any removal of appointees under General Washington's Administration; but when Thomas Jefferson came into office there was some occasion for them, because then all the offices were filled by persons opposed to a majority of the people of the United States. Mr. Jefferson made but few removals, comparatively few. I believe he removed no man simply because he had voted against him, and no one for mere political cause alone unless the man removed from office had made himself particularly obnoxious by his abuse. There was no occasion for Mr. Madison, or Mr. Monroe, or John Quincy Adams to make many removals, because there was very little division of parties then, and yet they did all make some. When General Jackson came into power there was occasion again because the offices were mainly filled by those who were opposed to him, and yet that Administration which has been held up as a model Administration for proscription made but a little over six hundred removals in eight years, and there were then about eight thousand postmasters in the country besides thousands of other officers. Now, even if Congress is disposed to take from the President of the United States the appointing power, as I admit it has the right to do in a great many instances, by giving the appointment to the Supreme Court or to the heads of Departments, still it would be nothing but justice to leave to the President of the United States the power to appoint a number of his friends to office.

Why are gentlemen alarmed, let me ask? Why should they be alarmed? Why should they entertain the idea that the present President of the United States is going to pervert this power of removal to a bad purpose? Is he not surrounded by the "divine Stanton" and such men? Has he not Mr. Seward for an adviser? Are not all his present advisers men whom you have indorsed over and over again? Have you not confidence in your President's advisers? Certainly they are not going to make any appointment to injure you. Certainly they will not countenance any appointments in favor of the Democratic party. Sir, let me tell you, that it would take more faith than it requires to remove mountains to cause me to believe that the present Secretary of State of the United States, who so long has fought the Democratic party, and who, by the by, I consider the cause of a great deal of the evil that has been brought upon this country, is going to forsake your standard and rally to the Democratic standard. He is going to do no such thing. But suppose he should, what then? Some few men might follow; but I march under no captains manufactured out of "divine Stantons" and bell-ringing Seward, and other men that I might name. You have them. You have got to keep them. You need not expect to get clear of them. Make war upon them if you choose, because in making war upon the President of the United States you will make war upon his Cabinet.

The Democratic party will not be driven from their support of the Chief Magistrate of the United States, whom they believe to be patriotic, and who in their judgment means well, though he may be surrounded by men who have warred upon that party all their lives, and whom the Democratic party have always fought; but they will support him in every act that they believe right, and in giving that support they are not animated or governed by any mere party considerations, but it is from a love of country and devotion to the country, and because they believe that his policy will conduce more to the interests of the country than your policy will. Although I know I differ with gentlemen on this floor who say they are so triumphantly strong in this country, I believe to-day that the Democratic party numbers more than one half of the constitutional voters of the United States in the States which never seceded; and, sir, now that your bayonets are removed from the polls, now that men can vote freely and act freely, we will hang our banner on the outer wall, and give it to the god-storms, the tempest, and the breeze, and we are not afraid to meet the united hosts of the Republican party in the next presidential election. At the same time, sir, Andrew Johnson may—and that is what you are afraid of—Andrew Johnson may, if he acts rightly, not through the action of the Democratic party alone, but by the almost spontaneous action of the American people, become the next President of the United States. If he acts constitutionally, settles these great questions which are now disturbing the nation, settles them peaceably, gives back to the country a restored Union and a restored Constitution, the grateful hearts of hundreds of thousands and millions of American voters may so swell that they may say he deserves yet further honors at their hands; and if the American people will it neither Congress nor the Republican party can prevent it.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] did not state my position quite fairly, nor exactly as I put it. He stated that I was waiting to see whether I could serve the Lord before I broke with his adversary. Well, that really looks like a manifestation of egotism on his part, as if he and the Lord were on intimate terms, so that he can say that he is on the Lord's side. But I beg leave to say that I do not exactly occupy that position. I believe that it is pretty well known that I am not much afraid to break with anybody, that I do not watch the President to see how he is going. I mean on all questions to consult my best judgment, and I am ready at any moment to break with the President or anybody else on principle, if he deserts principle. Now I choose to state my position for myself. The President has attempted reconstruction; he has reared a kind of policy; I as a member of the Senate do not propose to aid in destroying it until I have got some materials together whereby to build a better house. Until I have collected the materials I do not propose to go to work tearing down and destroying. It may be impossible for Congress to construct a better policy; and if so, it is not the part of wisdom and justice on our part to destroy all that he has done.

I stated that the object of this amendment was undoubtedly to prevent the President from using the patronage of the Government to sustain his policy. If his policy is abandoned, or if we have a better one, I do not think there is anything so terrible in this law. If we have got a better policy that we desire to subserve, if we have the ability to build a better plan of reconstruction, it is our duty to use all constitutional power to make that successful; but if we have not, and do not succeed in getting it, we had better not pass any laws which shall embarrass the President in carrying out his policy. I want the States reconstructed; I want the Union preserved; and I believe that is the wish of the American people, and if Congress is incapacitated to do that, then I say we should throw no obstruction in the way of the President using his patronage and power to reconstruct in his way. But I stated at the same time that I believed Congress would be able to construct a policy which would be better than the President's; and when we have done that, I still hope the President will go with Congress.

Congress, after it has sufficiently deliberated, will, I believe, produce a plan, but until that is accomplished no harm can be done from delaying this matter; because Congress will be in session, and we shall have all the power in our hands. I say we should not be led astray on this side issue which is calculated to distract, which is giving us additional weight to carry, until we shall have arranged our plan of action, and then there may be no need of any conflict with the President. We may then be in harmony, and the great Union party may go on again without trouble. The President has not in the matter of appointments gone so far as to alienate himself from Congress. We have rejected very few of his appointments; we have confirmed nearly all. I believe we have not rejected more than the usual proportion. There is as yet no violent contest on this subject. We are here able to reject any improper appointment that he can make. We are going to stay here for some time, until we agree on some plan of action. Then, if there shall be trouble in carrying out that plan, let us use our constitutional power. My position is, that I am willing to break with any man who breaks with principle; but I am unwilling to tear down what another man has done until I have some evidence that I can do better, until I am prepared to do better.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, I do not rise with the hope that I can add to the information of Senators on this subject. I cannot make the complement to the argument of the Senator from Vermont for the reason of its exceeding fullness; I cannot add to the learning that has been bestowed; but I choose to state my particular objections in my own way, briefly.

In the first place the amendment, the subject properly of discussion, is not germane to the bill; and the rule has been, and it is a good rule, that an appropriation bill should not be charged with extraneous matter. I have heard it maintained very earnestly always by the Senator from Ohio, who has been chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House, and now represents the Finance Committee, I believe. It is a bad practice, against sound policy; but that is not my gravest objection. The most difficult subject that was before the men who sat in council in 1787 was how to balance the powers of the Government, and those wise men, our ancestry, wiser than we, drew from the wells of old antiquity, they drew from the modern ages, and particularly the problem was how to balance the various powers of Government, and they designed as a policy that the three departments of Government should be each independent of the other, the executive, legislative, and judicial.

Now, all laws are not written. The common law is what is called the unwritten law.

So the laws of the seas from the time of Oleron are unwritten laws, and yet are laws of nations. For seventy-nine years we have been expounding our Constitution and system of government. It has been expounded by those who framed it. It was not possible to put in form of words every consideration that lay in and about the instrument, for then it would have been more extended than the Pandects of Justinian. It was intended for a Constitution to be built upon, construed, and has been construed by those who framed it. It has been determined that there are classes of officers, for instance, judges of the Supreme Court, appointed during good behavior who can only for misbehavior be ejected; a person appointed regularly to the military service under our system can be removed, if in the Army, by an Army court-martial; if in the Navy, by a naval court-martial that has tried and adjudged him. This has grown to be law, and is law. The case of Marbury vs. Madison, if I remember aright, was the case of a justice of the peace, appointed in this District, whose term was fixed for five years by law. That is within the province of legislation; but there are a class of officers who are not within the province of legislation, and after all their administration belongs to the executive department of the Government. Legislation belongs to us as much as judgment belongs to the Supreme Court. We were not made to make officers. We are merely advisers of the President with regard to a class of officers, and not necessarily all officers, not inferior officers. In this legislation we are indirectly undertaking to usurp the functions of the executive head of the Government, whose business it is to understand these things by himself and through those whom he is authorized to surround himself with. We are usurping his authority; we have not the legitimate power to do what is here proposed; and it is against the policy by which the foundation of this Government was laid.

This kind of legislation is itself in its character revolutionary. It is breaking up the established order of things for a mere temporary purpose. There is no disguising the underlying motive for this movement; it is patent. That from it must spring evil consequences is indubitable. We ought to live as a people that should endure through centuries, and why handle our institutions as things of a day? This is one of that class of movements, and I trust it will not meet the favorable consideration of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The question is, Will the Senate reconsider the vote agreeing to the amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Guthrie, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Riddle, Sausbury, Sherman, Stewart, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Creswell, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wade—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cragin, Dixon, Grimes, Hendricks, Johnson, Kirkwood, Wright, and Yates—10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that unless some Senator desires to debate the matter further or to move an amendment, we had better go on and get through with the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. Let me remind the Senator that there are several Senators absent who would like to have an opportunity to vote on the question.

Mr. CRESWELL. I ask the Senator from Missouri to give way for a moment until I can make a formal motion. My colleague has informed me that private business will require his absence from the Senate until Monday next, and he has requested me to ask leave of absence for him until that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to adjourn, unless the Senator from Missouri withdraws his motion.

The motion was agreed to—yeas twenty-four, nays not counted; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 7, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the call of committees for reports to go upon the Calendar, and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

No reports were made.

The SPEAKER stated the next business to be the call of States for resolutions, commencing with the State of Indiana.

COLORS SUFFRAGE.

Mr. JULIAN. I submit the following resolution, and demand the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing that hereafter the elective franchise shall not be denied or abridged in any of the Territories of the United States on account of race or color; and providing further, and thereby giving notice of the fact, that henceforward no State which the people of any of said Territories may organize shall be admitted into the Union whose constitution shall sanction such denial or abridgment of the elective franchise.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask whether the gentleman proposes to instruct the committee.

The SPEAKER. It is a mandatory resolution.

Mr. JULIAN. I am willing to modify it so as to make it a resolution of inquiry. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. FINCK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 29, nays 76, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Boyer, Coffroth, Dawson, Delano, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Griswold, Aaron Harding, James R. Hubbell, Kerr, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, Newell, Niblack, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taylor, Thornton, and Whaley—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Henderson, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Ketcham, Ladin, William Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Myers, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Stevens, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—76.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Banks, Barker, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Deftrees, Dodge, Eggleston, Farguhar, Goodyear, Grinnell, Hale, Harris, Hayes, Hilly, Hill, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Dumas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hubard, James Humphrey, James M. Humphreys, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Kelso, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, Moorhead, Moulton, Nicholson, Neill, Orth, Patterson, Phelps, Pomeroy, Rice, Alexander H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Schellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Spaulding, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Bart Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Wentworth, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—78.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, introduced a bill regulating the time and place for holding the circuit court of the United States in the district of Virginia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I hope now that the Chief Justice will perform his duty, and not try to place the blame on the President.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill passed.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EMPLOYÉS IN THE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. SMITH. I did not hear the State of Kentucky called, being occupied at the time, and I ask leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, Secretary of War, Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of the Navy, Secretary of the Interior, Postmaster General, and Attorney General be requested to report to the House the number of clerks, male and female, now in their respective Departments, from which States they were appointed, and what was their occupation before appointment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

The SPEAKER. This resolution being a call for executive information it requires unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH. I ask the gentleman to withdraw it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If the gentleman will look in the Blue Book he will find all he wants.

Mr. SMITH. I wish to make this statement:

It was but a few days ago that I saw the recommendation of a man who had just come out of the rebel army for appointment in some of the Departments, and but for the fact that he could not take the oath would have been there now. I understand there are efficient, capable, good men, who wish appointments who have served their country, who have one arm or one leg, who desire positions, while there are those who have never been in the service at all who have obtained appointments. I wish to ascertain and have the country know these facts, and therefore I introduce this resolution. I wish to see men who are deserving rewarded by the Government they have served. That is all the object I have in introducing this resolution, and I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] will withdraw his objection and let the resolution be passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Illinois withdraws his objection. Is there unanimous consent to the introduction of the resolution?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest that the word "requested" be changed to "directed."

Mr. SMITH. I have no objection. I supposed the word "requested" would bring the information.

The SPEAKER. The usage of the House is, where information is desired of the President to use the word "requested," but where it applies to Cabinet ministers to use the word "directed."

Mr. GARFIELD. Should not that be in the form of a joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. The House directs Cabinet officers to report about anything.

Mr. MERCUR. I suggest to add to the resolution the words, "also those, if any, who have been in the confederate army, giving the names, number, and residences."

Mr. SMITH. I do not understand that to be the case, but I have no objection to the amendment being made.

Mr. MORRIS. I suggest that the resolution embrace the further inquiry, how many of the family occupy positions.

Mr. SMITH. If we can arrive at the fact without incumbering it too heavily I have no objection. And I will not object if the House will allow me to include inquiry into the custom-house at New York. Because I will state that men who have been in the service and who have been promoted to the highest rank have actually begged their bread in the streets of New York because of the refusal of the place of watchman in these departments that are within the gift of the Government, while others who have not in any way helped to defend the country have been the beneficiaries of those departments.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I like the object of this resolution, but I hope my friend will permit it to be modified by directing the heads of Departments also to state by whom those several clerks were recommended for appointment. Let us know if there are any rebels in the Departments and who recommended them.

Mr. SMITH. I will accept that—and "by whom recommended;" and I demand the previous question.

Mr. RADFORD. I call for the reading of the resolution as modified.

The resolution, as modified, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General be directed to report the number of clerks, male and female, now in their respective Departments, from which States they were appointed, and what was their occupation before appointment; and also, the names, number, and residences, if any, of such as have been in the late rebel army, and by whom the latter class were recommended for appointment.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to modify the resolution by inserting the words "and the number who have served in the Union Army."

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. That is right; let us see how many there are there.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

* Mr. WELKER introduced a bill to annul the thirty-fourth section of the declaration of rights of the State of Maryland so far as it applies to the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

DOCUMENTS FOR GLOBE REPORTERS.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House reporters of the Congressional Globe be furnished with three copies each of all bills and resolutions printed by order of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will those copies be taken from the number which members receive? There is a standing order as to the number of copies which shall be printed. I should like to know if these copies are to come out of that number. I have no objection to the resolution. I think the reporters should have copies of these bills and resolutions, but it should be in addition to the regular number printed.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. Under the standing rule a sufficient number of copies is printed to supply what is called for by this resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It may be so in some instances, but I think the resolution had better be modified so as to provide for the printing of an additional number of copies.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. There is no need of increasing the number. There is a sufficient number printed to supply this demand. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

TRANSFER OF AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be instructed to inquire into the expediency of removing the Department of Agriculture to one of the Western States, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING OF SMITHSONIAN REPORT.

Mr. GARFIELD submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five thousand extra copies of the Report of the Smithsonian Institution be printed, two thousand for the Institution and three thousand for the use of the members of the House.

DISTRIBUTION OF ORDNANCE.

Mr. SCHENCK introduced a joint resolution relating to the distribution of ordnance and ordnance stores among the States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RECONSTRUCTION COMMITTEE.

Mr. BOYER submitted the following preamble and resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question, and called for the yeas and nays:

Whereas the joint committee of fifteen on reconstruction reported on the 30th ultimo, after the arduous labors of five months' continuous incubation, a well-matured plan of "how not to do it," in which they have fully met the expectations of the country, which is as much as ought ordinarily to be demanded of any committee; Therefore,

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That said joint committee be discharged.

Mr. BROMWELL. I move to lay that resolution on the table.

Mr. LE BLOND. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 24, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Reeder, W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Defrees, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Henderson, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, James Humphrey, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercier, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Payne, Perham, Pike, Plants, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Stillwell, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Boyer, Coffroth, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Aaron Harding, Harris, Kerr, Le Blond, Marshall, Niblack, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taylor, Thornton, and Winsfield—24.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Barker, Bergen, Blaine, Brandegee, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Eggleston, Farquhar, Goodyear, Grinnell, Hale, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulbard, James M. Humphrey, Ingelsoll, Johnson, Jones, Kuykendall, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, Moorhead, Newell, Nicholson, Noell, Patterson, Phelps, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Tabor, Thayer, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Wentworth, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wright—59.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

DISTRIBUTION OF ASSASSINATION REWARDS.

Mr. KELLEY submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the fairness and propriety of the award of the rewards offered for the arrest of Jefferson Davis and the conspirators to murder President Lincoln; and that the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to take no action on the same until the Committee of Claims shall have reported the result of their investigations and the House taken action thereon.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] explain the necessity for the passage of such a resolution as this?

Mr. KELLEY. I will very gladly give an explanation of it if the House will permit.

The SPEAKER. If objection be made the resolution will go over under the rule if it gives rise to debate.

Mr. KELLEY. An award has been made, which has already given rise to many objections. And as the Committee on Appropriations have been ordered to prepare a bill making an appropriation—

Mr. KASSON. I think the House has made no such order.

Mr. KELLEY. We have passed a resolution instructing the Committee on Appropriations on that subject.

Mr. KASSON. The resolution was simply referred. I would ask the gentleman if he knows of any action of the Committee on Appropriations which makes it necessary to ask the House to enjoin the committee from early action.

Mr. KELLEY. This is intended merely to guard against the subject being acted on by the Committee on Appropriations before the Committee of Claims shall have inquired into the propriety of the award.

Mr. KASSON. The order of the House directing the Committee of Claims to inquire into the subject, I presume, would be sufficient for the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KELLEY. Very well; I will modify my resolution by striking out that portion which relates to the Committee on Appropriations; and also substitute the word "distribution" for the word "award." It will then be a simple resolution instructing the Committee of Claims to inquire into the propriety of the distribution of the rewards.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The Committee on Appropriations have the subject before them with a design to inquire into it. But we are not instructed to report any appropriation.

Mr. STEVENS. I think my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. FARNSWORTH] is mistaken. After the subject was referred to the committee suggestions were made that the subject should be investigated. And one day, when my colleague [Mr. FARNSWORTH] was not present, I believe, the committee agreed that we would postpone action upon it until some other committee shall have investigated it, if it should be brought before them.

Mr. KASSON. I hope this subject will go to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. KELLEY. The Committee of Claims, I think, is the proper committee to consider this subject; and therefore I now call the previous question.

The resolution was again read, as modified:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the fairness and propriety of the distribution of the rewards offered for the arrest of Jefferson Davis and the conspirators to murder President Lincoln.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

NOTT AND COMPANY.

Mr. SCOTFIELD introduced a bill for the relief of Nott & Co.; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. STROUSE presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania in favor of equalization of bounties; which were ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EXPORT DUTY ON COTTON.

Mr. STEVENS introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution was read in full. It proposes to submit to the Legislatures of the several States the following article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

ARTICLE —. Congress shall have power to lay and levy tax or duty on cotton exported from the United States.

Mr. STEVENS. I call the previous question.

Mr. LE BLOND. If that joint resolution gives rise to debate, does it not go over under the rule?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is not seconded, and debate arises on the joint resolution it would go over under the rule.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then we will filibuster a little.

On seconding the demand for the previous question there were—ayes 36, noes 38; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rules, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. STEVENS, and Mr. RANDALL of Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to modify my motion a little. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report within one week. I desire to add these instructions, because in the earlier part of the session a similar resolution was, on my motion, referred to that committee, from which we have never received a report on the subject.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to say, in reply to what the gentleman has said, that the gentleman has had no such resolution referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, so far as my knowledge extends.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is this resolution debatable?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired; and the resolution goes over until next Monday, unless the gentleman offers it in a modified form now.

Mr. STEVENS. I offer the resolution, to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks consent, the morning hour having expired, to introduce a resolution.

Mr. LE BLOND. I object.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of allowing the resolution to be introduced and referred.

Mr. LE BLOND. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask; what is the present motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? Does he propose to refer the resolution with any instructions?

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw that part of the motion with regard to instructions.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As there is now no proposition to refer with instructions, I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to know whether the resolution has not already been introduced, and whether it has not gone over under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] has moved to suspend the rules, the morning hour having expired, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the resolution, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not desire action at the present time, but which he simply desires to have referred.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Can the rules be suspended to allow the introduction of a resolution which has already been introduced and has gone over?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moved to suspend the rules to bring the resolution before the House. That suspension would include the rule requiring the resolution to go over, as well as all other rules which may stand in the way of the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. LE BLOND. If this resolution is not to be reported back within a week, I am willing to withdraw my call for the yeas and nays. My chief object is to have these constitutional amendments postponed as long as possible, so as to preserve for as long a period as we can the principles of our Government from the hands of the radicals.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to debate.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to; and the joint resolution was introduced, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

An act (S. No. 90) enlarging the powers of the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. No. 478) to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims;

An act (H. R. No. 214) for the benefit of Colonel R. E. Bryant;

An act (H. R. No. 347) for the relief of R. L. B. Clarke;

An act (H. R. No. 238) to amend an act entitled, "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 107) for the relief of Rev. Harrison Heermance, late chaplain of the one hundred and twenty-eighth regiment New York volunteers.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from Professor Henry, Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, transmitting his annual report for the year 1865; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MR. BANCROFT'S ORATION.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have received and desire to lay before the House a letter from Hon. George Bancroft, who delivered the memorial address on Abraham Lincoln, together with some correspondence of Lord Russell. I desire that the whole shall be printed and referred to the joint committee on the memorial to President Lincoln. I think the House will be entertained and instructed by the reading of the correspondence; and I ask that it be read.

Several MEMBERS. Let us hear it.

CHESHAM PLACE, February 28, 1866.

DEAR MR. ADAMS: I observe in the Daily News of yesterday extracts from a speech of Mr. Bancroft delivered in the House of Representatives on the 12th instant.

In this speech Mr. Bancroft is represented to have said referring to the breaking out of the civil war: "The British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs made haste to send word through the palaces of Europe that the great Republic was in its agony, that the Republic was no more, that a headstone was all that remained due by the law of nations to 'the late Union.'"

As words pronounced on such an occasion and by so eminent a man as Mr. Bancroft may have an effect far beyond the injury which my personal character might suffer, I must request you to convey to Mr. Bancroft my denial of the truth of his allegations, and to refer him to facts of a totally opposite character.

Soon after the news of the resistance in arms of the southern States to the Government of the Union arrived in this country, a member of the House of Commons stated in his place that the bubble of republicanism had burst.

I replied in the same debate that the bubble of republicanism had not burst, and that if the curse of slavery still hung about the United States it was England who had made them the gift of the poisoned garment which was now their torment.

In fact I never had any doubt that whether the United States consented to separation or pursued the war to extremity the great western Republic would remain, happily for the world, a powerful and independent republic.

The authors of the Declaration of Independence in declaring their separation from Great Britain, after enumerating their complaints of her conduct, go on to say: "We must therefore acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, and hold them, in peace friends."

That we should be enemies in war is easily understood, but when we are at peace, why should we not be friends, as the great men of the American Revolution intended us to be? If they, in the moment of separation and of war, looked forward to a period of peace and of friendship, why should we, more than three quarters of a century after these events, keep up sentiments of irritation and hostility founded on a mistaken apprehension of facts, and tending to lay the foundation of permanent alienation, suspicion, and ill-will?

As Mr. Bancroft's speech is likely to have very extensive publicity, I reserve to myself the power of making public this letter at such time as I shall judge fit.

I remain, my dear Mr. Adams, your faithful servant,
RUSSELL.

P. S. I subjoin an extract of my speech on the 30th of May, 1861, as reported in Hansard's Debates.

Mr. Bancroft to Mr. Adams in reply.

NEW YORK, March 23, 1866.

MY DEAR MR. ADAMS: I have received from you, by Lord Russell's desire, a copy of his letter to you of 28th February last, in which he denies the truth of certain allegations in my address to Congress on the 12th of the same month. The passage which he cites contains these three allegations: that as British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs he viewed this Republic as "the late Union;" that he sent this view of our country through the palaces of Europe; and that he made haste to do so. When Lord Russell calls to mind the authority for these statements, he must acknowledge them to be perfectly just and true.

On the 6th day of May, 1861, Lord John Russell, then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, wrote a dispatch to Lord Lyons, in which he describes the condition of America as "the disruption of a confederacy," and he further used these words: "Civil war has broken out between the several States of the late Union. The government of the southern portion has duly constituted itself. Her Majesty's Government do not wish you to make any mystery of that view." Here is irrefragable proof of my first allegation.

On the day on which the minister of the Queen thus wrote he addressed a dispatch to Lord Cowley, her Majesty's ambassador at Paris, designating our Republic as "the States which lately composed the American Union;" "the late United States;" "the late Union;" and he inclosed in that dispatch, for Lord Cowley's instruction, a copy of the above cited letter to Lord Lyons. Having thus ostentatiously communicated his view of our country as "the late Union," he asked in return "to be made acquainted with the views of the Imperial Government." My second allegation is therefore true in letter and in spirit.

That Lord John Russell, as Secretary of State, was in haste to do this, appears from his not having awaited the arrival of the American minister of Mr. Lincoln's appointment, and from those very letters of the 6th of May, 1861, to Lord Cowley and to Lord Lyons; for in those letters he confesses that he had not as yet received from Lord Lyons any report of the state of affairs and of the prospects of the several parties; but that on coming to the decision which was so momentous and unprecedented, he acted on the reports of "some consuls" and "of the public prints."

It is true that twenty-four days after Lord John Russell had officially described our country as "the disruption of a confederacy," "the late United States," "the late Union," he reproved a member of the House of Commons for openly exulting "that the great republican bubble in America had burst;" and owned "that the Republic had been for many years a great and free State;" but he uttered no expectation or hope of the restoration of our Union, and rather intimated that the Americans were "about to destroy each other's happiness and freedom." Lord John, on that occasion, rightly attributed the rebellion to the "accursed institution of slavery," and confessed that England was the giver of "the poisoned garment," that the former governments of Great Britain were "themselves to blame for the origin of the evil." But this confession must be interpreted by the light of his avowals on the 6th of May, 1861, and by Lord Russell's later assertion, that the efforts of our country were but a contest for "empire."

In speaking to the American Congress of the life and character of Abraham Lincoln, it was my unavoidable duty to refer to the conduct of the British Government toward our country during his administration, for nothing so wounded his feelings or exercised his judgment or tried his fortitude.

I was asked to address the two Houses of our Congress, and those only. When I learned that the British minister at Washington was likely to be one of my hearers, I requested Mr. Seward to advise him not to be present; and through another friend I sent him a similar message, which he received and perfectly understood.

I need not recall words of ninety years ago to be persuaded that in peace America and the United Kingdom should be friends. I have a right to say this, for when in the public service I proved it by public acts; and as a private citizen I have never wished our Government to demand of a foreign Power anything but justice.

Pray send Lord Russell a copy of this letter, which he is at liberty to publish; and I consider myself equally at liberty to publish his letter, to which this is a reply.

I am ever, my dear Mr. Adams, very truly yours,
GEORGE BANCROFT.

North America, No. 3. Presented to Parliament, 1862, (LXII.)

Lord J. Russell to Earl Cowley.

FOREIGN OFFICE, May 6, 1861.

MY LORD: Although her Majesty's Government have received no dispatches from Lord Lyons by the mail which has just arrived, the communication between Washington and New York being interrupted, yet the accounts which have reached them from some of her Majesty's consuls, coupled with what has appeared in the public prints, are sufficient to show that a civil war has broken out among the States which lately composed the American Union.

Other nations have, therefore, to consider the light in which, with reference to that war, they are to regard the confederacy into which the southern States have united themselves; and it appears to her Majesty's Government that, looking at all the circumstances of the case, they cannot hesitate to admit that such confederacy is entitled to be considered as a belligerent, and, as such, invested with all the rights and prerogatives of a belligerent.

I have stated this to Lord Lyons in the dispatch of which I inclose a copy for your Excellency's information.

In making known to M. Thouvenel the opinion of her Majesty's Government on this point, your Excellency will add that you are instructed to call the attention of the French Government to the bearing which this unfortunate contest threatens to have on the rights and interests of neutral nations.

On the one hand, President Lincoln, in behalf of the northern portion of the late United States, has issued a proclamation declaratory of an intention to subject the ports of the southern portion of the late Union to a vigorous blockade; on the other hand, President Davis, on behalf of the southern portion of the late Union, has issued a proclamation declaratory of an intention to issue letters of marque for cruisers to be employed against the commerce of the North.

In this state of things it appears to her Majesty's Government to be well deserving of the immediate consideration of all maritime powers, but more especially of France and England, whether they should not take some steps to invite the contending parties to act upon the principles laid down in the second and third articles of the Declaration of Paris of 1856, which relates to the security of neutral property on the high seas.

The United States, as an entire Government, have not acceded to that declaration; but in practice they have, in their conventions with other Powers, adopted the second article, although admitting that without some such convention the rule was not one of universal application.

As regards the third article, in recent treaties concluded by the United States with South American republics, the principle adopted has been at variance with that laid down in the Declaration of Paris.

Your Excellency will remember that when it was proposed to the Government of the United States, in 1856, to adopt the whole of the Declaration of Paris, they in the first instance agreed to the second, third, and fourth proposals, but made a condition as to the first, that the other Powers should assent to extending the declaration, so as to exempt all private property whatever from capture on the high seas; but before any final decision was taken on this proposal, the Government of President Buchanan, which in the interval had come into power, withdrew the proposition altogether.

It seems to her Majesty's Government to be deserving of consideration, whether a joint endeavor should not now be made to obtain from each of the belligerents a formal recognition of both principles, as laid down in the Declaration of Paris, so that such principles shall be admitted by both, as they have been admitted by the Powers who made or acceded to the Declaration of Paris, henceforth to form part of the general law of nations.

Her Majesty's Government would be glad to be made acquainted with the views of the Imperial Government on this matter with as little delay as possible.

I am, &c.,

J. RUSSELL.

[No. 2.]

FOREIGN OFFICE, May 6, 1861.

MY LORD: Her Majesty's Government are disappointed in not having received from you by the mail which has just arrived any report of the state of affairs and of the prospects of the several parties, with reference to the issue of the struggle which appears unfortunately to have commenced between them; but the interruption of the communication between Washington and New York sufficiently explains the nonarrival of your dispatches.

The account, however, which her Majesty's consuls at different ports were enabled to forward by the packet, coincide in showing that, whatever may be the final result of what cannot now be designated otherwise than as the civil war which has broken out between the several States of the late Union, for the present at least those States have separated into distinct confederacies, and, as such, are carrying on war against each other.

The question for neutral nations to consider is, what is the character of the war; and whether it should be regarded as a war carried on between parties severally in a position to wage war, and to claim the rights and to perform the obligations attaching to belligerents?

Her Majesty's Government consider that the question can only be answered in the affirmative. If the Government of the northern portion of the late Union possesses the advantages inherent in long-established Governments, the Government of the southern portion has, nevertheless, duly constituted itself, and carries on in a regular form the administration of the civil government of the States of which it is composed.

Her Majesty's Government, therefore, without assuming to pronounce upon the merits of the question on which the respective parties are at issue, can do no less than accept the facts presented to them. They deeply deplore the disruption of a Confederacy with which they have at all times sought to cultivate the most friendly relations; they view with the greatest apprehension and concern the misery and desolation in which that disruption threatens to involve the provinces now arrayed in arms against each other; but they feel that they cannot question the right of the southern States to claim to be recognized as a belligerent, and, as such, invested with all the rights and prerogatives of a belligerent.

I think it right to give your lordship this timely notice of the view taken by her Majesty's Government of the present state of affairs in North America, and her Majesty's Government do not wish you to make any mystery of that view.

I shall send your lordship, by an early opportunity, such further information on these matters as may be required for your guidance; at present I have only to add, that no expression of regret that you may employ at the present disastrous state of affairs will too strongly declare the feelings with which her Majesty's Government contemplate all the evils which cannot fail to result from it.

I am, &c.,

J. RUSSELL.

[Extract of Lord John Russell's speech in the House of Commons, May 30, 1861.]

My honorable friend, the member for the West Riding of Yorkshire, alluded the other night to one subject in a tone which I was very sorry to hear used by any one. My honorable friend said that "the great republican bubble in America had burst." Now, sir, I am proud to confess—I may be subject to correction—but for my part, when I find that a dark and tyrannical despotism has been abolished, and that people are likely to enjoy free government in its place, I rejoice. It is my duty to represent her Majesty as friendly to all existing States; but if a despotic Government fall, and the people who are subject to it are likely to obtain better and freer Government, I cannot conceal that it gives me satisfaction and that I sympathize with them. But I own I have very different feelings when a great Republic, which has enjoyed for seventy or eighty years institutions under which the people have been free and happy, enters into a conflict in which that freedom and happiness is placed in jeopardy. I must confess the joy which I felt at the overthrow of some of the despotisms of Italy is counterbalanced by the pain which I experience at the events which have lately taken place in America. I admit that I have thought, and that I still think, that in this country we enjoy more real freedom than the United States have ever done. I admit, also, that the great founders of that Republic, wise and able men as they were, had not the materials at hand by which they could interpose, as we are able to do in this country, the curb and correction of reason in order to restrain the passionate outbursts of the popular will. Yet we cannot be blind to the fact that the Republic has been for many years a great and free State, exhibiting to the world the example of a people in the enjoyment of wealth, happiness, and freedom, and affording bright prospects of the progress and improvement of mankind.

When I reflect that the approaches which are cast by the States of the North upon the States of the South, and the resistance which they have called forth, have arisen from that accursed institution of slavery, I cannot but recollect also that with our great and glorious institutions we gave them that curse, and that ours were the hands from which they received that fatal gift of the poisoned garment which was flung around them from the first hour of their establishment. Therefore, I do not think it just or seemly that there should be among us anything like exultation at their discord, and still less that we should reproach them with an evil for the origin of which we are ourselves to blame. These are the feelings which I heard the remarks of my honorable friend the other night, and I must say that I believe the sentiments which he expressed form an exception to the general impression in England. Indeed, I think nothing could be more honorable to our country than the prevailing pain and grief which have been occasioned by the prospect of that great and free people being about to rush into arms to destroy each other's happiness and freedom.

NEW YORK, May 3, 1866.

SIR: Having, in conformity with the request of Congress through its joint committee, delivered before them a memorial address on Abraham Lincoln, and Earl Russell having written a letter to deny some of my allegations, I deem it but an act of justice to transmit to you a copy of Earl Russell's letter and of my reply, and of the documents on which my allegation and his denial are founded. I request you to lay these papers before the joint committee of Congress, and I leave them at their disposition.

Very respectfully, yours,

GEORGE BANCROFT.

To Hon. ELIHU B. WASHBURN, of Illinois, Chairman on the part of the House of the Joint Committee of Congress, &c.

Papers inclosed.

1. Earl Russell to Mr. Adams: February 28, 1866.
2. Mr. Bancroft to Mr. Adams, in reply to Earl Russell: March 23, 1866.
3. Lord J. Russell's letters of May 6, 1861, to Earl Cowley and to Lord Lyons.
4. Extract of Lord J. Russell's speech in the House of Commons, May 30, 1861.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now move that this correspondence be printed and referred to the select joint committee on the memorial to President Lincoln.

The motion was agreed to.

TAX ON CRUDE PETROLEUM.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Ways and Means, for consideration at the present time, a joint resolution to provide for the exemption of crude petroleum from internal tax or duty, and for other purposes.

Mr. UPSON. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of allowing the introduction and present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. LE BLOND. I ask that the resolution be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read the resolution. It provides that paraffine oil, not exceeding in specific gravity thirty-six degrees Baumé hydrometer, the product of a residuum of distillation, crude petroleum, and crude oil, the product of the first and single distillation of coal, shale, asphaltum, peat, and other bituminous substances, shall, from and after the passage of this joint resolution, be exempt from internal tax or duty.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. As the House is about to proceed at once to the consideration of the internal revenue bill, I do not see why this matter should not be considered in connection with that bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is not debatable except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORRILL. If the House will hear two or three words in explanation of this measure, I do not believe a single member of the House will object to the consideration and adoption of this resolution at the present time.

The parties manufacturing this oil are subjected to a tax so heavy as to prevent absolutely the manufacture of the article with any profit to the manufacturer. The manufacturers being consequently compelled to stop their operations, their employes have become riotous, and are destroying large numbers of the wells. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that, as we propose to relieve this tax on the 1st of July, we might as well do it now, so as to allow these manufacturers to resume their business.

Mr. UPSON. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. ROSS. I renew the objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 90, noes 13.

So the rules were suspended, two thirds voting in favor thereof.

The joint resolution was then received, and read a first and second time.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, as to-morrow has been fixed for taking up the report of the joint committee on reconstruction, I wish to suggest, inasmuch as it has been largely discussed, and there are still a considerable number of members who wish to speak, the speeches on that subject shall be confined to thirty minutes. Though on our part we have the laboring oar, yet I am satisfied we shall be limited to thirty minutes, so that a larger number of members may be heard. If there be no particular objection, I shall offer the following resolution. If there is any great objection, I do not intend to press it. I want the constitutional amendment sent to the Senate, to see what they will do with it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the discussion of the constitutional amendment proposed by the committee no speech shall exceed thirty minutes, nor shall the motion to extend the time of any member be entertained.

Mr. ROSS. That will not prevent a motion to print.

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. RAYMOND. I beg to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether it would not suit the convenience of the committee and the House to let that question lie over until the tax bill shall have been disposed of. If we go on with the tax bill to-day, and to-morrow with the report on reconstruction, it will leave a gap in the discussion. We may finish the tax bill in two or three days.

Mr. STEVENS. We have to some extent considered that. We think it important this should pass and be sent to the Senate so they may have it before them. We then propose the accompanying bills shall be postponed to suit the convenience of the House so that the tax bill or any other may be proceeded with.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope there will be no such postponement.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to know whether an opportunity will be afforded to offer amendments to the proposed constitutional amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. This has of course nothing to do with that question. We intend to be liberal in allowing time for discussion. I only offer this so a larger number of gentlemen may be heard before it becomes necessary to close debate. The discussion must be brought to a close within a reasonable time. We desire to be liberal. We have already discussed the question so much that I think thirty minutes will be long enough.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I suppose this series of measures is proposed in good faith as a means of settling the difficulties of the country. The committee has taken a long time to consider the subject, but not too long, but there ought to be some opportunity given to discuss it. I do not think any time expended in the discussion of these measures, either for or against them, is time lost to the country. It will be discussed and understood by the people, and it is much better for the committee as well as for the House, that the discussion here should be full and thorough. I hope the gentleman will not press for a limitation of discussion until the House shall have shown at least a tendency, if not a disposition, to consume time improperly.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman knows we can only make this arrangement to-day.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. How many gentlemen have signified their intention to speak?

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, there is a list as long as my arm. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Do we understand the proposition to be that we are to consider the three measures that are proposed as one subject? It is thought by gentlemen on this side that these three measures are in fact one, and that the discussion ought to be had upon them all together. I think we may as well discuss the constitutional amendment and the other two measures at the same time rather than discuss them separately. They were reported as a series of measures upon the same subject.

Mr. STEVENS. I will say to the gentleman that as different days are fixed for the hearing of the different measures the subject must properly be considered in that way. We cannot take them up and pass them all together. I will say, however, that if the first measure is acted upon, whether passed or defeated, it is expected, if the House desire it, that the fairest debate shall be allowed on the other measures also. But the debate which I now propose to limit to thirty minutes is only on the one measure.

Mr. FINCK. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether he has in his own mind fixed any time when he will call the previous question upon this proposed amendment to the Constitution. I would like to know how long the discussion is likely to be permitted to continue.

Mr. STEVENS. I have not. I intended to be governed by the desire of the House very much in regard to that, allowing a very candid discussion. I am sure it will not be asked to procrastinate it factiously.

Mr. FINCK. Certainly not.

Mr. STEVENS. On our part, I can only speak for one, it is the intention to allow the largest and fairest debate desired by any member of the House.

Mr. FINCK. That is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BANKS. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before that question is put I desire to make a suggestion. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] intimated his purpose after having disposed of the main proposition, the amendment to the Constitution, to defer the consideration of the other special orders which are to follow in their turn. Now, regarding these different measures as gentlemen on the other side say, all as part of one whole, I trust when we enter upon the consideration of this business in one of its parts we will continue until the whole matter is disposed of. I merely make this remark now so as not to be considered as concluded or as having been understood to agree to any proposition of that kind which is thrust upon us now.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not propose to do anything except what the House may desire.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to, two thirds voting in favor thereof.

The question recurred on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I suggest to the gentleman to modify the resolution so as to provide that at the evening session speeches may be made of an hour's duration.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire that the evening session shall be for action. I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The House has prescribed a "morning hour" in the morning and evening session both.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Is it provided for yet in the evening?

The SPEAKER. It is not provided for yet, but the House has ordered that whenever an evening session shall be held the first hour shall be considered the same as a "morning hour." During the debate on the constitutional amendment that will be the first business in the morning after the reading of the Journal, so that there will practically be no morning hour.

Mr. LE BLOND. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he had not better amend his resolution so as to embrace the other two propositions coming from the committee, so as to limit debate on each one to half an hour.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know that I understand the suggestion—whether the gentleman desires that the thirty minutes shall apply to them all; but at present I do not wish to compel members to discuss three questions in the thirty minutes.

Mr. RADFORD. I would suggest the propriety of striking out the last part of the resolution prohibiting the extension of time to any gentleman.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot do that. We have nullified the hour rule already, so that it amounts to nothing; and I do not want the rule nullified when it reduces the time to thirty minutes.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF A SUBSTITUTE.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a substitute bill of the House No. 467, to declare and protect all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States in the several States, and the same was recommitted to the committee, and the substitute was ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SMITH. I ask leave of absence for two weeks for Mr. NOELL, of Missouri, who is sick.

There was no objection, and the leave of absence was granted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I ask indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. HILL.

There was no objection, and the leave of absence was granted.

DEPOSIT OF GOVERNMENT FUNDS.

Mr. LYNCH. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be directed to inquire what legislation is necessary to protect the Government against loss of public funds deposited in national banks, and report by bill or otherwise.

No objection was made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend that resolution by adding "and that said committee report a bill to prevent any deposits by Government officers being made in national banks."

Mr. LYNCH. I cannot yield for that purpose. I move the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the previous question will not be seconded. Let us try this question here.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. LYNCH. I withdraw the resolution.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to suspend the rules so that from and after to-night the House shall hold evening sessions, commencing at half past seven o'clock, p. m., until otherwise ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. For what purpose?

Mr. MORRILL. For the purpose of continuing action on the revenue bill.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Exclusively?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, exclusively.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will modify his motion so as to provide that the evening sessions shall be for no other business excepting the consideration of the tax bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Would not that do away with the "morning hour" in the evening?

The SPEAKER. The House has already ordered by unanimous consent that when evening sessions are held there shall be a "morning hour" for the transaction of the business of committees.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I hope there will be no evening sessions.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is it in order to inquire if any good ever came of evening sessions?

Mr. ROGERS. Never.

Mr. MORRILL. We can do as good work on the tax bill in the evening as at any other time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I know that things can be run through at evening sessions very rapidly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If I understand the ruling of the Chair, there is an order already existing that there shall be a "morning hour" at the evening sessions. Cannot the House dispense with that?

The SPEAKER. Yes, by a suspension of the rules; but a majority of the House can order an evening session.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I trust that if we have evening sessions at all they will be devoted exclusively to the consideration of the tax bill. If you have a "morning hour" it will take an hour and a half to get a quorum here.

Mr. BLAINE. The position which the report of the committee on reconstruction holds in the House cuts off indefinitely the reports of other committees. The report of that committee comes up immediately after the reading of the Journal, and the discussion of it will run on ad infinitum; and if we do not have a "morning hour" in the evening there will be no opportunity for the other committees to report for several weeks.

I hope that members will come here to the evening sessions, and that we shall devote the first hour to the business of the morning hour.

Mr. ROSS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to modify his motion so as to postpone the reports of the committee on reconstruction until after the tax bill shall have been considered.

Mr. MORRILL. The House can make such order as they please in that regard to-morrow, when the subject comes up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The reports of the joint committee on reconstruction cannot now be postponed without a suspension of the rules, as they are not now before the House. When they come up to-morrow morning the House can then take such action as they may think proper.

The motion of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] as the Chair understands it, is to suspend all rules in order that there may be each day after to-day, until otherwise ordered, an evening session for the consideration exclusively of the tax bill. The Chair is of opinion that if that motion prevails it will cut off the consideration of morning-hour business during the evening session, and also postpone the reports of the committee on reconstruction.

Mr. MORRILL. The Chair misunderstands my motion. It is not intended to postpone the consideration of the reports of the committee on reconstruction, but merely to suspend the rules so that after to-day there may be evening sessions for the consideration exclusively of the tax bill.

Mr. STEVENS. Would it not be better to allow the consideration of the reconstruction reports to go on in the evening also, and thus be able to get through them the earlier?

Mr. MORRILL. I think we better take the evenings for the tax bill.

The question was taken on suspending the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 68, noes 36.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. BLAINE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BLAINE, and WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 34.

So the rules were suspended, two thirds voting in the affirmative.

Mr. MORRILL moved that after to-day the House shall hold an evening session each day, until otherwise ordered, for the consideration exclusively of the tax bill until the same shall have been disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. COOPER, his Private Secretary, who also announced that the President had approved and signed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 67) providing for the reappraisal of lands described in an act for the relief of William Sawyer and others, of Ohio.

FISHERY AND WATER-CULTURE EXHIBITION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Referring to my message of the 12th of March last, communicating information in regard to a proposed exposition of fishery and water culture at Arcachon, in France, I communicate a copy of another dispatch from the minister of the United States in Paris to the Secretary of State, and invite the attention of Congress to the subject.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, May 4, 1866.

The message, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WARMING AND VENTILATING THE CAPITOL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in compliance with the resolution of the House of 4th instant, transmitting certain papers, and the report of T. U. Walter, on warming and ventilating the Halls of the two Houses of Congress; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

MONEYS FOR INDIAN SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in compliance with the resolution of the House of the 23d ultimo, transmitting a statement of moneys on hand applicable to the Indian service; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LATHAM asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. HUBBARD, until Wednesday next.

ADDITIONAL ASSAY OFFICES.

Mr. MORRILL reported, from the Committee of Ways and Means, a bill to establish additional offices for the assay of gold and silver, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

TAX BILL.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being a bill of the House (No. 513) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, let me say at the start, lest gentlemen should be too much frightened, that the great length of the bill before us mainly arises from the fact that the Committee of Ways and Means thought it advisable, wherever in the course of the revision a section of the old law was amended, even though but slightly, to strike out the old section and reinsert it as amended. This vastly swells the size of the bill, but will be much more convenient for those who are to interpret or administer the law hereafter. In revising our internal revenue laws, the question that meets us at the threshold is, how much revenue have we to spare? Or how much will our necessities require for another year? The last question has been specially answered by the Secretary of the Treasury, who has fixed, in a recent communication to the committee, $350,000,000—provided the appropriations of Congress do not exceed the estimates—as the sum it would be safe to rely upon, including the revenue from the tariff as well as internal taxes. In making an estimate of the probable receipts from the latter, we have as a basis one full year and three fourths of the present year of experience, and the data are sufficiently complete to be of value. Our receipts for 1864-65 were, in round numbers, $210,000,000, and the returns thus far of 1865-66 show that we may expect for the year an increase of nearly fifty per cent., or not less than from three hundred to three hundred and five millions. One of the largest and best paying consumers of the products of the country during the war was the Government, but is so no longer. War prices no longer rule, and it is inevitable that manufactures must be still further reduced in values until we reach the solid standard of gold as recognized by the commercial world. The tax on manufactures, therefore, must be far less productive for the year ending June 30, 1867, than heretofore, as it will be computed at a less percentage, if our bill should be adopted, and on a far less aggregate amount. Then, as a general rule in a season of falling prices, it is not gains but losses which must be calculated at the end of the year; and therefore the tax on incomes, the dividends from banks and other corporations for the next year, cannot be expected to yield anything like the amount derived from these sources for the years ending December, 1864, and December, 1865. Nor can our foreign importations be maintained upon their present scale. It is very desirable that they should not be as they are supplanting a large share of the labor of our own people, and because payment will at present be made chiefly in United States bonds. Financial disaster, as well as increased depression to our industrial interests, cannot fail to follow such an influx of foreign goods as we have witnessed the present season. That trade must in some degree be postponed until we recover from the exhaustion caused by the war, until capital and labor can adjust itself to its new conditions of peace, or until we have something to exchange for British, French, and German iron, wine, and haberdashery, besides merely our national credit.

It is right, however, to look for some increase of revenue in consequence of the close of the war, and we may expect something from the States lately in rebellion, though not an amount in proportion at all to their relative numbers. Never fruitful in taxable resources, they have less now than ever. If we obtain outside of the receipts from cotton enough to cover the bills already passed in one or the other House for extra expenses on their account, it will equal my expectations. Taking all these things into consideration, as well as others not necessary to mention, the Committee of Ways and Means have felt willing to report the bill as it stands; which will reduce taxation the present year in round numbers about seventy-five million dollars.

It is also prudent to anticipate a large diminution of the revenue from customs, as it ought not to be expected to long continue at double the amount ever obtained in the most prosperous times. Our receipts from miscellaneous resources the coming year will be very light, as they have recently accrued mainly from property disposed of at the close of the war, and premiums on sales of gold, sources already nearly extinct.

We seek to make some compensation for these losses by increasing the tax on raw cotton three cents, or by raising it from two to five cents per pound. Supposing that two million bales should be raised this season and be taxed—and I think the amount will be considerably greater notwithstanding the actual want of good seed, and the changed system of labor—we ought to obtain a revenue from this source of $44,000,000, or an increase over the tax at present in force of $26,400,000. The crop may so far exceed the number of bales mentioned as to cover all the cotton which will escape taxation, or which will be used on plantations, and all that will be exported in the shape of manufactures and upon which a drawback will be allowed; but it will be safer to estimate probable receipts on a lower basis. All human calculations are subject to contingencies, and financial calculations are perhaps most exposed to be shipwrecked of all; but if we retain the tax on cotton as proposed, we can safely release, in my opinion, taxes to the extent contemplated by the bill. Otherwise we must reinstate something already stricken out of the roll of taxation by the bill, or find some new source of revenue which will produce an equal amount; and I say this without feeling very confident that the rates for the income tax will be allowed to be changed much from the existing law.

It will be seen that I estimate a reduction in the revenue received from manufactures, on account of a depreciation of values, of about twenty-five per cent., and a reduction upon incomes and dividends of rather more than that amount. It is true that we shall be likely to have a more perfect administration of the law; and I take pleasure in saying that the present Commissioner is a most diligent and conscientious officer; but the increase of revenue on this account will be at least counterbalanced by many little favors distributed all through our amendments, and which it is impossible to accurately estimate.

We could not, if we would, levy an export duty upon cotton, and, except for convenience of collection, an excise tax may be better, as, in the form it is here proposed, it is not necessarily to be paid by the planter, and may, in the same manner that we now transport spirits, be removed from one collection district to any one other, upon giving bonds for the payment of the tax within ninety days, or upon its arrival at its place of destination. The duties will practically thus be paid by the purchaser. In addition to this, while we guard our political citadel here against the dangers of any insidious treason from any quarter, when it comes to taxation we should not only be just but generous, and the drawback on manufactured cotton, of all the taxes actually paid, in any form, will redound most to the benefit of southern and western States. They will at once manufacture coarse cottons and yarns and warps much more extensively than they have hitherto done. And the southern people will be the last to surrender the system of a tax on cotton, when once it shall be adopted and understood. Until the production of cotton shall be so large as to reduce the price below twenty cents per pound, or exceeds the wants of the world, this tax will not be greatly felt by Americans. Should the tax at any time operate adversely to our interests, as I do not think it can at present, it must be reduced or removed as experience shall seem to require. Surely, if the entire cotton crop of the United States, save what we consume, could be exported in a manufactured state, or even in a partially manufactured state, instead of exclusively as a raw material, it would be an end worthy of statesmen, covering our country with blessings, and, wronging no man, would do much toward extinguishing resentments and restoring kindly feelings throughout the land. The southern coast, and the banks of the Rio Grande, the Mississippi, the Mobile, the Tennessee, and the Savannah would soon be decorated and enlivened by factories, giving employment to thousands, and bringing the culture and contentment, the social life and comforts of organized industry into regions where hitherto useful labor has worn the badge of dishonor. The saving in freightage, and in the cost of food, will secure at least handsome profits—possibly large profits—to those who may engage in the business. With prosperity human nature is rarely disposed to make war. Make the South prosperous, and we make them our friends. With freedom for all, and with such measures as will induce them to work, they may become prosperous, and that through the policies of the national Government. Even though the cotton crop the present season should be but a half of the standard crop, the price will be so great that the South will realize more money from it than in any year of our previous history, as the laws of trade for the last seventy years prove that a short crop is always more valuable than a full one, and hence the uniform effort to hide the fact of a great crop.

The shrinkage of cotton in the process of manufacture is about fifteen per cent., and that amount will be lost to the manufacturer in the drawback, and gained to the Government. The principle is not novel. We return duties upon imported goods when reshipped, and we gladly allow spirits, tobacco, and all sorts of domestic manufactures to go out of the country without the payment of any internal tax. If it were possible to ascertain with any precision the tax paid on other raw materials when manufactured for exportation, as we can on cotton, as, for example, upon leather or iron, we should consider it unquestionably wise to refund the full amount paid.

Exports of the Manufactures of Cotton.

The largest export trade we have ever known of the manufactures of cotton was in 1853, when it was a trifle over eight million dollars; but in consequence of the low-priced Surat cotton and the lower-priced labor of Europe it has steadily declined since that time, and during the late war nearly ceased, not reaching $1,000,000 in 1865. Pass the present law, however, and we shall speedily have restored to American manufacturers and American merchants the full amount of the foreign trade we ever enjoyed, and in due time our country will assume that supremacy in the cotton trade of the world to which it is so legitimately entitled.

The system of levying a tax upon home manufactures would never have been dreamed of but for the grave necessities of the hour. Our Treasury was exhausted; our people were unused to paying taxes; a large party among our people were not in harmony with the idea of maintaining the Union at all hazards and at any cost; loans at home could only be obtained at first in dribbles; among foreign nations, with aristocracies everywhere dominant, it was an irrepressible joy for the organs of public opinion to speak of our country as "the late United States;" among them all there was no Louis XVI to send us a man or to lend us a dollar, or (with the single exception of Russia) even to bid us God-speed in the task of putting down a rebellion the most wicked in the annals of mankind; and a war—not a little war, but a great war—such as our country must and will always wage, if it wages any, of illimitable proportions had already begun. Under these circumstances we girded up our loins and became self-reliant—alone but independent—and built up the credit of the great American Republic in the hearts of our own people; made them see and feel that it would be safe to trust it, by seeking objects of taxation which would yield promptly and yield abundantly. The experiment proved a success. During the whole term of the war it was borne by our manufacturers and by our whole people, not only without complaint but absolutely without injury, for it is even doubtful whether they ever enjoyed a season of greater prosperity. The law was new and therefore not polished and perfected by experience or revision, but first put into operation by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] it at once vindicated the propriety of its principles and policy. Often amended subsequently in consequence of the increasing wants of the Treasury—bearing the misfortune of frequent changes, too, in its chief administrative officers—it soon brought forth most bountiful supplies and disclosed a resource of unequalled magnitude that can be used in any sufficiently urgent crisis, and which is an ample requital, rendered at the hour of our greatest need, for all the protection, direct or indirect, ever bestowed upon the products of domestic industry. Without these products of a free people we should have been as weak as our foes, and, if not vanquished, we should have retired after a single indeterminate campaign.

To illustrate the wonderful fecundity of a tax on manufactures take but a single instance: the little stamp tax of one cent upon each box of matches produced last year about fifteen hundred thousand dollars, or enough to arm, transport, and keep in the field fifteen hundred men. And this tax had not only to contend with the stocks on hand but for some time with extensive fraudulent importations. The tax may be expected to produce much more hereafter.

But now the duties of peace return, and we must simplify our laws, reduce the burdens of tax-payers so far as possible, and cheapen the cost of living. All cannot be done at once. We shall, do the best we can, leave something to be done by the next Congress and by future Commissioners of Revenue. At an early day spirits, malt liquors, tobacco, cigars, cotton, stamp taxes, and perhaps a small number of other objects, it is to be hoped, with custom duties, will afford revenue commensurate with all the wants of the Government. The fixed economy of all civilized nations requiring large revenues appears to be to squeeze out of those articles considered as luxuries by mankind—or which sustain and soothe but never slake habits deplored by good men everywhere—the largest sums which the most stringent laws will secure, and our practice in this respect from this time forward should doubtless conform to that of the world. Some changes are now proposed relative to tobacco and cigars, concerning the utility of which I have serious doubts. I fear the door which for the past year seemed effectually closed will be again opened to fraudulent practices, and that the revenue as well as the honest dealer will suffer. Still we must not be deaf to any well-founded complaints of the people. I know that gentlemen, for whose opinions and wishes I have great respect, from districts where low-priced tobacco is produced find their people clamorous for grading the tax according to values. On the face of it the claim would seem to be just. But I am told by officers connected with the administration of the internal revenue laws that the law as it now stands is working well, and that the tax on smoking tobacco should not be reduced. Experts believe that any fair discrimination cannot be honestly enforced, and the loss to the Treasury may be large. The tobacco-growing and manufacturing interest, it is true, has been and is now greatly depressed, but not so much on account of the form or amount of the tax as on account of the large influx of untaxed tobacco which flowed into our markets upon the cessation of the rebellion; and it may be added, too, that our tariff upon foreign cigars is much too low.

The bill proposes to wholly exempt from taxation many articles, and to largely reduce it upon others, and among these will be found slaughtered animals, salt, sugar, starch, coal, soap, vinegar, saleratus, clothing, and boots and shoes. These exemptions and reductions will lessen family expenditures and be a relief to all classes of the community. Dress-makers and milliners, wielding a potent influence, as they do, will no longer be treated as men, subject to taxation, but as deserving of favor. Though they may tax us, we do not propose to tax them. Provisions or products of the farm it has been the policy from the start (and its wisdom has been only exceptionally questioned) to keep free from taxes. All fertilizers, draining tiles, and many of the more expensive implements of agriculture it is now also proposed to relieve. Freights, perhaps the most indefensible tax we have had, perpetually checking commerce and adding to the price of purchases as well as diminishing the price of sales, it will be seen are to be utterly abandoned, as are all the articles in schedule A, except gold watches, silver plate, billiard tables, and carriages valued above $300, as by the testimony of the collectors the tax upon all the other articles therein embraced amounted to less than the cost of collection, while it imposed domiciliary visits, always obnoxious to a spirited people. It has been considered important not to check any enterprise for building or for repairs of buildings, and to this end building materials, such as brick, freestone, marble, slate, roofing-slate, lime, and cement, have been placed on the freelist. The tax imposed upon paper, books, and binding, entertained with little hospitality from the first, is surrendered the first opportunity without regret. The tax on knowledge, as it has often been styled, if it ever existed, it is to be hoped will be now abandoned. The tax upon all repairs, always indefinite and of dubious propriety, may also well be removed. If a horse runs away with a carriage, or a locomotive gets smashed, it seems oppressive for the Government to seize the opportunity of such misfortunes for levying a fresh tax.

We have proposed to exempt coal from any tax. If we regard it as an article of fuel we cannot any longer afford to dealers the excuse of a tax for a dear price. If we look upon it as the raw material from which gas is made, the tax on the latter would seem to be as great as we ought to subject an article so indispensable to the population of all our cities and most considerable towns. If we look upon it as the chief source—the hidden giant—of steam power, which drives so large a part of our machinery used in manufactures, from which so much of our revenue accrues, it certainly presents strong claims to be free.

Iron being an article of such large consumption, shaped into such multifarious forms for the use of mankind, employing numbers so vast in its production, and an abundant supply being almost a prerequisite in peace or war to national independence, the Committee of Ways and Means have been willing to wholly exempt pig iron, railroad iron, railroad iron rerolled, when in the form of, and to leave but three dollars per ton upon bar iron. Cheap iron is an advantage to the whole country, and especially so to agriculturists, to artisans, and even to the day laborer who wields but an ax or a spade. It is also important that we should not discourage railroad enterprises by making their cost so great as to frighten away all capitalists. Our iron should be made at home, but let us give our own people a fair chance to make it cheaply.

That the universality of a tax upon all descriptions of manufactures, in any state or condition when offered for sale, tends to a duplication of taxation, is sufficiently obvious, and the Committee of Ways and Means have sought to remedy this evil so far as they could consistently with their duty to the Government, whose wants though diminishing are still imperative. The increase of the tax on all manufactures last year, one fifth, or twenty per cent., as our law of last year provided for, it is now proposed to repeal. Steel being in the nature of a raw material, a manufacture in its infancy and in some peril from the pressing competition of the Old World, it is deemed expedient to entirely exempt from tax, and more especially as it will mostly be taxed when it reaches a more advanced stage of manufacture. The same argument applies to iron, which we have not yet felt able to wholly release; and also to copper, lead, zinc, and brass, which we do propose to release. The bill, however, will show for itself. The reductions have been made with the sole view of the greatest good of the greatest number; and in the main I hope they will be accepted by the House. It is very likely to be true that many articles not now relieved can be pointed out having equal claims with those proposed for favor; but the answer is, civilly but firmly, the time for those has not yet arrived. The release of the tax upon many articles has not been done so much to favor them or any particular branch of manufacture as to favor those which remain still bearing the burden of taxation.

The removal, so far as it at present seemed prudent, of the constant duplication of taxes, will certainly tend to diminish the cost of a large number of articles, but until we reach the solid basis of a currency equal in value to coin, prices must remain dear and unstable, and producers and manufacturers, while working under circumstances of inflated cost, will be exposed to the chances of making sales in a falling market. The reduction must come at some time, and the pain will be severe if it comes suddenly, or lighter if it comes more slowly. It is the same in the sum total whether hastened or retarded.

Savings banks, or provident institutions—by far the most appropriate name—it will be seen are to some extent relieved from the tax on deposits, entirely relieved when such deposits are invested in United States securities or when made in sums not exceeding $500 by any one person. It cannot be doubted that it is sound public policy to induce those having but small earnings to establish a habit of thrift and economy by using these savings banks as a place of trust. Does it not speak well for the character of our people, as well as that of our country, that these institutions now hold of these small earnings of the common people $500,000,000? Where else can a similar fact be cited? Women, young persons, and those unskilled in making loans and taking securities, who possess too little to be reached separately by taxes, should not be taxed when assembled together, but rather deserve the paternal care of the Government.

The tax on the gross receipts of express companies was raised in the bill as first reported from three to five per cent., but, upon further consideration, in the revised bill the rate has been restored to what it is now by existing law. When we are reducing taxation in every direction, it appeared too invidious to single out one class of business, and that one giving marked distinction to American enterprise, and doom it to a tax equal to twelve or fifteen per cent. upon its net annual receipts.

The tax upon telegraph companies has also been placed upon the same level, or reduced from five to three per cent. One of the companies last year paid to the Government a tax upon $700,000 gross receipts, amounting to $35,000, when they had made an absolute loss of $100,000, or $65,000 besides the tax.

Express and telegraph companies may not all deal liberally with the people, and may seek extravagant profits, but the Government of the United States could hardly be expected to base its legislation upon resentments thus engendered unless the companies were the creatures of its own creation. Such abuses are more properly corrected by State legislation, or by even the more potent influence of competition and public opinion.

The tax in schedule A, although one of an inquisitorial character, and therefore objectionable in form, has been retained in part by the committee on the ground that the owners of carriages valued at over $300, and gold watches and silver plate, were among those persons best able to contribute something to the support of that Government under whose protection they have been able to acquire articles indicative of wealth and assured means of support.

The law in relation to licenses, it will be seen, has been entirely changed in form, although the substance of the tax will be found adhering to it. A special tax takes its place, and will, it is supposed, do equal service without being liable to the objections made in some quarters that it is an attempt to regulate the internal commerce of the States. Members of the House are aware that a case is still pending in the Supreme Court of the United States involving the constitutionality of the existing license law, and that this case, after having been tried, was considered of so much importance as to be postponed until next term, when the decision, whatever it may be, will be announced. I do not suppose that the court will be very eager to overturn the legality of laws which find precedents in our Statutes-at-Large almost from the foundation of the Government, but other gentlemen may think differently, and from abundant caution, as we are revising the internal revenue laws, and as the technical objection, if there be one, can be so easily removed, the Committee of Ways and Means have made the alterations to meet any circumstances that may arise, whatever they may be. There is no necessity for transcending our legitimate authority, which is merely to obtain the proper amount of lawful revenue in the least objectionable form.

It is not proposed at this time to change the rate of the tax on spirits nor upon malt liquors, mainly that we may have the law of high rates in operation a sufficient length of time to test its real value for revenue purposes, and incidentally, no doubt, its value as a mode of repression in the consumption of intoxicating beverages. For the largest revenue purposes, the rate of two dollars per gallon, although the time elapsed since its adoption is too brief to definitely settle the question, seems likely to prove unsatisfactory; and if it were an original question, the recommendation of one dollar per gallon by the revenue commission would not be disregarded by the Committee of Ways and Means. It is very clear that the whole tax fails to be collected, as the price has at no time or at any place been equal to the cost of spirits with the tax added thereto, and in some parts of the country the price has occasionally been below even the amount of the tax. The amount of spirits of domestic manufacture returned to the assessors for 1865 was 16,936,773 gallons as against 85,285,391 gallons in 1864, showing a falling off of nearly four fifths of the whole amount. It is to be noted, however, that much was distilled in 1864 in expectation of an increase of the tax, and this accounts for a diminished business in 1865, but does not prove a diminished consumption. Notwithstanding the heavy increase of duties upon foreign liquors, the total importations have not been materially curtailed. Our experience is likely to correspond with that of the world, which is, that the appetites of men for spirituous liquors are held in check very little by high cost unless that cost is very exorbitant, and only those in the most indigent circumstances check the regularity of their indulgence or surrender any portion of their accustomed allowance.

It is curious to note that iron manufacturers, in making up the calculation of the increased cost of a ton of iron, put in $2 50 as the increased cost of whisky, and the employer is compelled, no doubt, to increase the amount of his monthly pay-roll to cover this new item in the cost of living. It may be inferred that the consumption of liquors in the length and breadth of the land is as large as ever, but that the tax has not been, possibly cannot be, collected. The great temptation to illicit distillation and to smuggling which arises in cases of the imposition of high duties upon liquors calls for the enactment of stringent, almost despotic laws, not merely for the punishment of fraudulent practices, but for the protection of the honest importer and honest distiller. Owling, or the carrying of wool out of the kingdom, was formerly punished in England by the imposition of heavy penalties, and we have found that the introduction from Canada of tin babies filled with whisky by their reckless parents can only be suppressed by heavy penalties and by their prompt enforcement. That a large trade has been carried on the past year in the manufacture of small copper stills there is abundant evidence. If these should be suffered to be used clandestinely, as it is to be apprehended may have been the design, not only would the Government be deprived of a large amount of revenue, but public morals would be more or less debauched. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend, with some modifications, a large part of the changes in the law as to spirits proposed by the revenue commission in order to increase its efficiency. It is believed that the country, as well as Congress, are in favor of obtaining the maximum amount of revenue from spirits, and that we are not so eager to reduce the cost of intoxicating liquors as to be unwilling to wait until experience has fully tested the policy or impolicy of the highest rate of taxation as now fixed by law. It is understood that the method of mixing wood-acid with alcohol, as practiced in England, so that alcohol might be used in the arts and manufactures without the payment of any tax, has proved a failure, it having been found that such methylated spirit can be rectified and made into pure spirit again without any offensive smell. If any chemical preparation could be found which would accomplish this object its discovery and adoption would be a great relief to many legitimate branches of arts and manufactures.

The Committee of Ways and Means have proposed some modifications of the income law, but have not reached the conclusion, while the industrial employments must remain to a considerable extent heavily burdened, that it can yet be wholly dispensed with. By its terms, as originally passed, it was to expire in 1870, and thus a temporary character was put upon its face. In our great emergency it contributed, not to be returned again with interest, a larger amount than the richest bankers in Europe would have loaned to us even at sixty per cent. discount. Our loyal people paid the income tax of 1863, in June, of $20,740,451 33, and then (estimated upon the same lists) they were called upon in four months to pay another income tax, and they responded by contributing $28,920,312 02. Again, in 1864 their income tax foots up $59,000,000. I point to these facts not only as a proud evidence of their patriotism and wealth, but as a proud evidence of their strict integrity of character. Strong as the temptation might be for evasive returns, sore as they might be in consequence of the swift pursuit and the continuous exactions of the tax gatherer, they even paid more in 1863 upon the second call than the first. Their country was in need, and even the greed for gain could not tempt the American people to defraud their Government. The law left it almost to the conscience of each man as to how much he should pay, and all seemed to vie with each other as to who should pay the most. I question whether any people ever paid a tax more honestly and accurately, and I question still more whether any free people ever imposed upon themselves, through their chosen Representatives, taxes so thick and fast.

If our income tax should be contemplated as a part of the permanent policy of the country it is not to be denied that it would need various and perhaps fundamental amendments. The objections to such laws are sufficiently obvious.

1. They are inquisitorial of necessity in their character, and Americans, like people elsewhere, though not averse to a knowledge of the secrets of others, are quite unwilling to disclose their own. Among commercial men such disclosures may be disastrous. If they show prosperity they invite envy and greater competition; or if they show any remarkable leanness they damage credits.

2. The temptation to make understatements and lend to these statements the sanction of an oath tends to sap and mine public morals, until men begin to excuse themselves for their own wrong doing, because, it being so common, that to do otherwise would be to fail in average smartness.

3. When we take into consideration the sources from which income is derived, the habits of the different persons who pay the tax, the difficulty of apportioning it so that each will have paid in just proportion to every other person, leaving each relatively in the same conditions, the perplexities become almost insurmountable.

Entertaining such views, and the pressing exigency having passed, we have undertaken to lessen but not to entirely remove the weight of the income tax. To this end we propose to exempt the first $1,000 of every person from any tax and only to reach any excess beyond that amount. This will increase the sum exempt from $600 to $1,000. Exactly how much of a reduction it will make in our receipts cannot be foretold, but probably not over ten to fifteen per cent., while it is likely to diminish the number of persons taxed nearly one half. If it should excuse fifty thousand persons, then the reduction will amount to $1,000,000 for every such fifty thousand persons. There is perhaps no just reason for excusing any portion of the income of any one from the tax, except that of the hardship and the inability of persons with a limited income to spare any part of it, but that is enough.

In a republican form of government the true theory is to make no distinctions as to persons in the rates of taxation. Recognizing no class for special favors, we ought not to create a class for special burdens. Pursuing this principle a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means have agreed to that portion of the bill which makes the income tax after this year a uniform one of five per cent. upon the annual gains. The loss to the revenue will be large—about $17,000,000—and it will be for the House to say whether the bill shall stand as reported or whether relief in any other direction is more urgently demanded.

I shall append to my remarks an appendix containing an estimate, made with the aid of the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, of the reductions appearing to me likely to occur in consequence of the present revision of the law. Other gentlemen may differ from me and count upon greater compensations to counterbalance these reductions; but I have never found that sanguine financial predictions were safe for legislators.

In our list of exemptions we strove to reach earliest those articles upon which a reduction of cost would bring relief to the masses of our people, and those which are produced with such lean margins of profit as to be opposed and in danger of being annihilated by even so small a tax as five or even three per cent., which is not unfrequently, upon branches of industry closely cornered by foreign competition, in excess of what may be considered regular and satisfactory profits.

I know that many gentlemen will render valuable assistance in the progress of the bill, and all will feel bound to show that they are alive to and not unmindful of the interests of their respective localities, and some may wish to press amendments giving such interests further relief; and it is fair to allow a prominent record of the fact to appear in the Globe; but if the House shall reach the conclusion that we have proposed measures which will reduce the revenue as much as it will be prudent to do this year—keeping in view the unestimated drafts our legislation has made and is likely to make upon the Treasury—remembering, in the large operation of funding our national obligations so that they may bear the lowest rate of interest, that fifty millions now may be more important to success than two hundred millions at a later period—I trust that the good sense and forecast of members will lead them to vote down propositions for essential changes.

The result of the labor of the Committee of Ways and Means is, that of the headings in the Commissioner's report of the "receipts from specific and general sources" fifty-nine out of two hundred and sixty-four will no longer be required, and the number of articles released, in proportion to the whole number remaining taxed, is still greater.

The law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to assign to the Bureau of Internal Revenue a sufficient force to carry it on will expire by its own limitation on the 1st of July next, and it therefore becomes necessary to make some arrangement for the permanent organization of the bureau. It will be seen that the bill makes provision for this object. The operations of this bureau are now on so large a scale as to require the services of able, clear-headed men, trained to business, and of unquestioned integrity. Such men in our country are highly prized, and command the highest salaries paid in financial and commercial employments, and unless we fix salaries at an adequate or competing point we shall only command the services of second-rate men. The base of the Treasury Department is that so soon as officers receive the stamp of its confidence they receive a loud call and the offer of more pay to go elsewhere. The best officers are, therefore, often mere birds of passage, here to-day but may be gone to-morrow. The Bureau of Internal Revenue, it is quite apparent, is deficient in executive force. It is impossible that the Commissioner, however faithful and industrious, and I know of no man more so, should be able to consider all the complicated cases daily arising for investigation in the administration of his office, and we have conceded not only the propriety but the absolute necessity of reinforcing the office by two additional deputies and one solicitor.

Notwithstanding all the disadvantages we have labored under in putting new and untried laws suddenly into operation, it is gratifying to find that the expense of collecting the revenue has been far less than was anticipated—including everything except printing done by the Public Printer—amounting, in 1865, to no more than two and seventy-five one hundredths, or two and three fourths per cent. This contrasts most favorably with the cost of collection in Great Britain, where, after years of experience, the cost varies from four and one quarter to five and three fourths per cent.

The services of the gentlemen employed on the revenue commission, I have no doubt, are properly appreciated by Congress, as they will be by the country, and the Committee of Ways and Means were unanimously, I believe, of the opinion that this kind of service should not be entirely discontinued. Believing that at least one similar officer can be profitably employed permanently, they have added a section to the bill for this purpose, and I have no doubt it will prove wise economy to adopt and continue it so long as we may be compelled to raise anything like our present revenues from taxation.

The military power of the United States needs no eulogiums from any quarter. Its supremacy at home is not likely to be questioned, and when it is challenged elsewhere it will be time enough to answer back. Its financial power, also, even in the agonies of civil strife, has been vindicated. No stain of dishonor rests upon its credit. Every promise has been kept with entire good faith. No creditor, holding the obligations of the nation, has had to do more than to ask and receive. No faithful soldier has closed his service without receiving at the same moment with his honorable discharge the last dollar due. Is there, then, any lurking danger as to our present and future financial condition? The confidence of the people in their own Government cannot be shaken; the vigor and elasticity of American industry is unrivaled; our resources, abundant to-day, will be greater to-morrow; no empire, ancient or modern, ever received, daily or annually, revenues of equal magnitude, and the wealth hidden in some of our single mountains, if it could be placed in the balance, would make our national debt kick the beam. Where, then, is the cloud no bigger than a man's hand? It rises only in that quarter from whence disloyal representatives may come. Open and inchoate repudiators lust for power. Save us from these and the United States Government will survive, with its credit and civil glories radiant with youth and the fame of ages, long after the final chapter in the history of anti-republican Governments shall have been written.

Mr. RAYMOND. I am sure the House has listened with very great satisfaction to the clear and interesting statement which has just been made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the financial condition of the country. It cannot but give satisfaction to find the country prepared for an immediate reduction in the amount of its internal revenue so very considerable as that which the committee proposes to make. And it will be equally satisfactory to the House and to the country to find that this reduction is to operate so generally upon those processes and articles which are of most importance to the great mass of the people of this nation.

I am unwilling to trespass to any considerable extent upon the patience of the House; but I shall be glad, with its indulgence, to make a few remarks upon the general subject of taxation, especially in the attitude in which we approach it now. Perhaps I may find an apology for so doing in the fact that it is a wholly new subject. Until within the last few years, we have made it our boast, justly and truly, that we were the most lightly taxed nation on the face of the earth. Now we are compelled to confess that we are among the most heavily burdened of them all. This, sir, is one of the many vast changes which have been wrought in our condition by the rebellion we have just suppressed. We have incurred a vast debt consequent on the war for the suppression of that rebellion.

We have, moreover, provided, necessarily, for a permanent increase, more or less considerable, in the ordinary expenses of the Government. Those expenses must be met year by year. The interest upon the debt must also be met as it becomes due; and I think it of the utmost importance in all respects to our credit, to our character, and to the courage with which all burdens will be borne by the people, that we should lose no time in making a beginning toward paying off the principal of that debt. It does not seem to me wise, sir, that we should begin to accustom ourselves or the creditors of the nation, the people upon whom these obligations rest, to the idea that this debt may be fastened upon us like the debts of England and of France, never to be paid through all time to come.

The ordinary expenses of the Government, as they are estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report, laid upon our tables at the opening of the session, are $143,000,000. The interest to be paid during this year is fixed at about the same amount, some two millions less. Both these sums, I think there is reason to suppose, may be somewhat reduced. The expenses of the Army and Navy are not likely to be as high as they were originally estimated; and the amount which will be due for interest will be somewhat reduced by the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury is not likely to fund so much of the debt now bearing no interest as it was originally supposed he would. But these two sums, taking them at his estimates, make the considerable amount of $284,000,000, which will be required to meet the expenses of the Government and the interest on the debt for one year.

I think we ought also to begin at once to make some provision for paying the principal of the national debt. I do not think it would be wise for us to provide less than $50,000,000 per annum for that purpose, the sum to be increased from year to year as our system of taxation may be perfected, and as the industry may gradually adapt itself to the new burdens which are imposed upon it. This would make an aggregate sum of $334,000,000 to be provided annually toward meeting the expenses of the Government and the interest and installments on the principal of the public debt. This sum will be required annually, without any serious diminution from year to year, until we shall have paid off so much of the principal of the public debt as will allow us to estimate the interest at a sum considerably less. It will of course be growing less and less from year to year. Three hundred and thirty-four million dollars, in round numbers $350,000,000, is a very large sum for a nation to pay annually. It is very large for us, in consideration of the fact that it is so much larger than we have ever before been called upon to pay or have any perfected machinery for raising the means to pay.

The aggregate revenues of Great Britain during the last year were but $354,000,000, and those of France but $350,000,000.

A MEMBER. Dollars or pounds?

Mr. RAYMOND. It is reduced to dollars. So that the three great nations of the world are substantially upon the same footing so far as the annual taxation imposed upon their people is concerned.

But we have the advantage of these nations in some respects, although both their population and their aggregate wealth are somewhat in excess of ours. We have a free Government, a Government which allows to every one of its individual members entire and perfect freedom of individual action; and that, sir, is a source of energy, of enterprise, of industrial vigor and elasticity which cannot well be overrated. Nothing more is needed to show the effect of this great principle of freedom upon the industry of a nation than a comparison of the rate at which the wealth of these three nations has increased during successive decades. I have not before me, nor have I in mind, the exact proportion of increase of population of Great Britain and France to the increase in their aggregate wealth. Our own has been very great. The increase in our wealth has been in much more rapid ratio than the increase of our population. During ten years, ending in 1860, the increase of our population was but thirty-five per cent., while in the aggregate wealth of the nation, it was one hundred and twenty-eight per cent. This is three times the disproportion which obtains either in England or France.

And more than that, our annual income is greater than theirs—in a much larger proportion. We have sources of wealth, moreover, sources of fresh vigor, sources of industrial productiveness to which none of the old nations of the world can make the least pretense. Immigration for one, and it is the only one I will mention, is itself a source of productive labor which cannot be estimated at less than two or three hundred millions dollars every year.

I refer to this to show that our debt, great as it is, is not beyond our resources; it is not greater than our people can bear. I may add that it is not greater than they will bear cheerfully and readily, because it is a debt incurred by the people themselves, and for the people themselves, for objects and blessings they have in hand to-day, and will have through all time to come.

Now, all we are asked to do—all the people ask us to do in adjusting this great burden, which is to recur year after for many years to come—is that we shall adjust it so the people may bear it easily; that we shall adjust it so that it will not cripple those energies upon which we rely for its payment; that we shall put it where they can bear it best, and not where it will rest heaviest upon them; that we shall put it upon their back and not upon their arms.

There are two great sources from which we have to meet these expenses. One is the customs; duties imposed on imported goods, and the other is excise duties, or duties imposed on goods of our own production. Both of these must be drawn upon from year to year. What either will amount to must be the result of estimates. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in the statement he has just submitted, estimates the receipts from customs at a sum less than that of last year. He looks forward, if I understood him aright, to a diminution of the duties on imports. Last year these were $84,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates them for the coming year at $100,000,000. I confess I cannot see the data upon which estimates so low as either of these sums can be properly based.

Mr. MORRILL. I referred to the estimate for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

Mr. RAYMOND. So I understood. The estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury is for the same year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, down to the year 1861, for the five years immediately preceding that year and the commencement of the war, the imports averaged about three hundred and fifty million dollars. I am sure they will not be less than that from this time forward. Our imports are always measured by the amount of our exports. Our capacity to buy usually determines the amount we do buy. We are bringing into direct contribution to our commerce a larger extent of country than ever before. A million and a half of men are going from the field into productive pursuits. The South is soon to be open to commerce, and the South will produce largely with proper encouragement and aid at the hands of the Government; and I was glad to hear the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means refer to this as one of the great reliances of the country for revenue, namely, encouragement of the industry of the South, and aid in developing the resources of that rich and productive region.

Now, sir, with all these sources of production I am sure we can fairly estimate our exports for the next year and for a series of years to come at not less than $400,000,000, and our imports will be at least as large as they were during the five years previous to 1861. What, then, will be the probable revenue from customs? The present average rate of duty I believe is something over forty per cent., probably nearer forty-five than forty. That is not likely to be reduced, and it gives us one hundred and forty millions. Indeed, the further imposition of these domestic excise duties will render it indispensable that we increase the duty on foreign imports in order to keep the balance even between foreign and domestic duties.

But, sir, without going into any intricate or close calculation on this subject, I adduce these facts merely to show that the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, $100,000,000, is exceedingly low, and that it is more likely to be one hundred and fifty millions than one hundred, at the rate at which imports are coming in now.

Estimating the custom duties at $100,000,000 will leave $250,000,000, or a little less, to be raised by domestic taxation. This bill now on our tables, upon which our action is invoked, proposes to provide for this sum each year for the expenses of the Government. Now, it is idle to conceal from ourselves the fact that this is a grievous burden, and it will always be felt to be a grievous burden by the mass of the people upon whom it rests. No matter how great may be their alacrity, no matter how determined may be their purpose to pay it, no matter how ready they may be to sacrifice all they have in maintaining the honor of the nation, it will still be felt now and always as a serious burden; and the extent of its weight will depend upon the manner in which it is distributed among the different classes and pursuits of the country.

Now, this is entirely a new subject for us. We have had no experience in devising ways and means to distribute duties upon domestic articles, so as to make them rest more or less lightly upon the mass of the people. The task was thrust upon us suddenly. The war came upon us suddenly, and with the war came taxes, out of which its expenses could alone be met. When the rebellion came upon us we all know how eagerly the people demanded that taxation should pay the expenses of the war for its suppression. Their determination to rescue the Government from the peril that threatened it prompted them to demand that taxation should be resorted to as the means of producing that result. My colleague from the northern part of the State of New York, [Mr. Hurlburt,] then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the Assembly of New York, will remember how universal the cry came to us, as it went to Congress also, that taxes should be increased and that the country should pay the expenses of the war as it went along instead of resorting to loans. Naturally enough Congress responded to that demand. It responded at once, and necessarily without much consideration. The laws of industry and of political economy were but little regarded. Congress issued its decree that everybody and everything should be taxed in every way. Upon all the processes as well as the products of industry, upon all work, and upon all tools by which work was to be done, upon all classes and conditions of men taxes were imposed without stint and without precaution. Every branch of trade, every kind of manufacture, raw material and net results—everything that could be made to pay was swept along in the vast dragnet of that first tax bill.

Now, while the people paid these taxes with the greatest alacrity and readiness, we must not fall into the error of supposing that such a system could be endured permanently. As a temporary necessity, they have borne it with a degree of courage and patience that could never have been exhibited by any other people on the face of the earth; and this is not an empty national boast—it is conceded by the highest authorities of England, that in this as in many other things the people of the United States have proved themselves entirely a people by themselves.

The London Economist, perhaps the highest financial authority in England, in speaking of the taxation through which the United States have passed during the last four or five years, says that "no other nation would have endured a system of excise duties so searching, so effective, and so troublesome." And it adds, that "to have imposed such taxes in England would have caused a revolution."

And it is to the eternal honor of the American people that in this, as in everything else connected with the salvation of their country, they have responded nobly to the calls of the Government. But this, as I have said, was from the necessities of the case a temporary provision. It became necessary, and the last Congress foresaw the necessity, to make provision for some permanent arrangement and system of internal duties. The first step which it took was a judicious step. It was to follow the example of that nation which has had more experience of internal taxation than any other, Great Britain. Great Britain always, in devising ways of taxation, appoints commissions or committees who take evidence carefully and elaborately; for taxation, even more than the ordinary action of government is an experimental science—purely deductive in its nature. There are no general principles which will instruct any nation as to the specific taxes it may impose. It must inquire into the facts and be governed by them. It must scrutinize each particular branch of industry, its bearings on all others and the bearing of the whole on the welfare and prosperity of the nation; and the system of taxation must be suited to the emergency in each particular case.

Congress authorized at its last session a commission of three gentlemen familiar with the subject from theoretical study and capable of making personal investigations of the facts relating to it. Those gentlemen have been engaged with assiduity, and intelligence, and, I think, with a degree of success far greater than could have been predicted, in investigating the whole of this great and novel subject. They have collected a vast body of evidence, which I am sorry to say has not yet been printed and delivered to Congress for its instruction, but the summaries made from it and published from time to time must have done much to enlighten all those members who wish to understand the subject in its details and the action proper to be taken.

Now, all that I propose to do upon this occasion is to recur briefly to two or three general principles which I think should guide us in acting on the tax bill which is now before us. In imposing taxes upon domestic industry there are certain great principles familiar to all readers of political economy which it will not be wise for us wholly to neglect. We are to impose taxes upon a great variety of articles. The present law, as I have said, taxes everything. We seem to be almost in the condition of England when she first began her system of taxation, so amusingly described by Sidney Smith, when every Englishman came into the world by the aid of a doctor who had paid a tax, and that he paid all the way through life, until he was finally buried in a taxed coffin, in a taxed grave, and by an undertaker who had paid a tax; and it was then, and then only, that his taxation ceased.

Now, I do not suppose that we can reach a full and thorough compliance with all the theoretical principles of taxation laid down by the writers on political economy; but we can keep them steadily in view, and we ought always to aim to come up to them as perfectly as possible. In the first place, it is always desirable to impose taxation upon the results of industry rather than upon its processes. The processes of the manufacturer, the tools of the manufacturer should not be taxed, but the results of the manufacture, when they make their appearance, in profits and income, are proper subjects of taxation. When a man is endeavoring by labor to produce certain products he should not be taxed in his efforts, in his labor, but only in the result, the products of that labor.

It is a very commonplace maxim, but a very true one, and one to be borne in mind in all these economical discussions, that labor is the source and the only source of national wealth. Productive industry feeds all the sources of national wealth. It is the fountain from which we draw all the moneys we need for maintaining the Government or for any purpose whatever. If we tax the processes of production we tax the fountain-head, and thus diminish the ability to keep up the supply. It is rather the duty of the Government not to diminish the force of this productive industry, but to stimulate it, to aid it, to increase it.

Suppose a man is engaged in the manufacture of engines or anything of the kind, like our friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. AMES,] who is so largely engaged in the manufacture of axes, shovels, and other agricultural implements, it is not wise to tax the processes of that manufacture, either in respect to the raw material that is used or the tools that are employed or the food of the workmen that are hired. All those things should be as nearly free from taxation as possible; but when the net results, the profits, the income, are produced, they are the legitimate subjects of taxation, and may be levied upon accordingly.

And that, in my judgment, is what is really involved in what is commonly called the free-trade policy of England. England found herself in a condition when her main and essential interest was the manufacture of goods for the markets of the world. She had to compete with other nations in those markets; and she found it absolutely indispensable for the production of those goods at such a rate as to enable her to successfully maintain that competition to relieve her manufacturers from taxation upon everything that entered into the processes of production. She took the duty off raw cotton because she needed raw cotton for the goods she manufactures. She took the duty off corn, for she needed corn to feed her workmen, and by taxing corn she obliged the manufacturers to increase the wages of their workmen to pay the increased cost of their support. And so everything that entered into the working of her looms, her forges, and her machine-shops was relieved from taxation.

It is idle to call that policy free trade. As it is very properly said by the commissioners of internal revenue in their admirable report upon this subject, and as it had been remarked before by some French economists, it is only a more subtle form of protection. Instead of taxing and excluding the goods of other nations, inasmuch as they went to the markets the ports of which she could not control, she very wisely reduced the cost of producing her own goods. That is a principle of universal application, one that we should apply just as rapidly as we can; for the same reasons that make it applicable to England make it applicable to us.

When we perfect our system of internal taxation; when we get it to a point where it will conform to the fundamental principles of political economy, the whole of this long list of manufactured articles that now figures on our tax bills will disappear, and we shall have left simply taxation upon the results of industry—upon the profits of labor; in other words, so far as the result of manufactures go, we will have taxation upon incomes alone. I consider incomes to be the fairest of all subjects for taxation, and I was a little surprised to hear the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. MORRILL] apologize for continuing the income tax a little longer. It seems to me that income is the first thing, so far as industry and the products of industry are concerned, which should be taxed; for in taxing income you tax that which a man has and nothing else, and that too in exact proportion to the amount of what he has.

If you encourage your people in their labor, in manufactures, in producing wealth, then after they have produced it and have the net proceeds in their pockets, it is quite just and fair and proper for the Government to claim a proper share of those profits to meet its own necessities. But the industry of the nation should be left unfettered; or if fetters have been imposed upon it, it should be allowed to regain its freedom at the earliest possible moment.

Of necessity, there are exceptions to this rule; and cases where it cannot be at once and fully applied. Cotton is undoubtedly one exception. In my judgment, it is proper to impose a tax upon cotton; and I think the rate proposed by the committee is not too high. However, that question will come up for more careful consideration when the bill comes to be examined by sections. I refer to it now, merely to say that although the tax upon cotton may seem to be an exception to the general principle I have laid down, yet the fact that cotton is a monopoly of this country, and must be bought from us by all other manufacturing countries, takes it out of the category.

It is not, for example, like iron. England has iron, and we have iron. We cannot, therefore, tax iron in the raw state, as we may tax cotton. Should we attempt to do so, we should expose ourselves to unfair, unjust, and injurious competition on the part of England. But if we tax cotton England must pay the tax also.

But, not to dwell upon this point, the next principle to which I ask attention for a moment is that we should tax, so far as possible, the superfluities and not the necessities of life. In the application of this principle to income is, I suppose, to be sought and found the justification of the exception of a minimum which is always made. In England, where an income tax has come to be one of the fixed taxes of the country, and will never be repealed, at least while she needs so large a revenue as she now does, I believe the tax is sixpence to the pound, and £100 of income are exempt from taxation. The cost of living in this country is somewhat higher, and especially for the working classes it is very considerably higher. Our present law exempts $600 of income from taxation. The committee recommend that the amount exempted be increased to $1,000, and in this I think they have recommended wisely, although it will subtract $3,000,000 from the revenue in the aggregate. An exemption of $1,000 will be but a just exemption. That amount will not maintain a working man and his family in this country in any better condition than that in which he ought to live. The Government should not trench upon the necessities of the great mass of its people. The absolute necessities of the people should be spared, should be held sacred from the hand of the tax collector. The people should be allowed to enjoy undiminished so much of their earnings as they need to supply those necessities.

In regard to the income tax, I observe also that the committee recommend a repeal of the extra five per cent. on income over $5,000. Incomes to the amount of $1,000 are to be wholly exempt. The amount of income above $1,000, up to $5,000, is to be taxed at the rate of five per cent. By the present law an additional tax of five per cent. is imposed on all over $5,000. I know that theoretical writers insist that it is unjust and impolitic to impose a graduated income tax; that every man should pay the same percentage on his income, whatever its amount may be. But there is this fact which, it seems to me, ought to be considered: that the second $5,000 of a man's income is generally much more easily earned than the first $5,000, when any business is entered upon that will insure large profits. Certainly a man can better afford to pay a second tax on all over $5,000 than to pay a heavy tax on the first $5,000 of his income. I confess that I do not think it wise, in the present state of the country, to exempt the second $5,000 of a man's income from a second tax. I know that this may fall heavily upon portions of the community, but fortunately they will be those portions of the community which can best afford to bear it, and those portions of the community, I will add, which have thus far borne all taxation with the utmost readiness, and which show no signs of complaint at the taxation to which they are subjected. Even if it should be deemed wise to reduce somewhat the percentage of tax on the second $5,000 of income, I hope the House will not think it wise to release it from extra taxation altogether.

The same principle of taxing superfluities and incomes instead of necessities applies to the taxation proposed upon commodities, upon beverages, upon articles consumed. I know that it is somewhat difficult, theoretically, to define what are necessities and what are superfluities. What is a necessity to one man is a superfluity to another, and what is a superfluity to any man at first becomes soon a necessity of life. But at the same time there are certain things which are used merely to gratify artificial tastes; and such things, I think, may very properly be called superfluities of life. And among these all nations recognize distilled spirits, whisky, fermented liquors, tobacco, and to a certain extent, tea and coffee. These, especially distilled spirits, are always made the subjects of heavy taxation.

In England distilled spirits are heavily taxed, and yield a very large portion of the revenue. Four of these articles—sugar, tea, tobacco, and spirits—yield $97,000,000 out of $112,000,000 received from customs in England; and licenses, malt and spirits, yield $92,000,000 out of $97,000,000 received as excise. They are always resorted to, and bear a very large proportion of the burdens of taxation. Our own tax bill aims at the same thing and goes upon the same principle. Under the law now upon your statute-book whisky is taxed two dollars a gallon, and in England it is taxed $2 50. There is no rate upon these articles which can be so high as to be objectionable. On the contrary, the higher the tax the greater the indirect benefit in diminishing consumption, for all concede that a law which should largely increase the domestic use of spirits as a beverage would not conduce to the welfare and morality of the nation at large.

The only limit, in my judgment, to the amount of duty to be imposed upon whisky is the practical enforcement and collection of the tax. There we encounter a serious difficulty, for if we put the tax so high as to make the profit on illicit distillation very great we shall tempt or force men into that illicit distillation. I suppose the cost, the prime cost, of producing whisky is about twenty-five cents a gallon, and when you put a duty of two dollars on that the profit on every gallon a man can sell in evasion of the law becomes immense. If we get the duty so high as to lead men to see that such enormous profits can be made we shall render it certain that this illicit distillation will be largely resorted to. This has been experienced everywhere. There is but one way to prevent it, and that is by the enactment of severe and rigid laws. We must have one of two things: either the tax shall be so low as not to tempt men to go into illicit distillation, or the law must be so severe that they will not do it.

Since the original internal tax law was enacted, we have made various experiments in the tax on whisky. I believe it began at twenty cents a gallon, then rose to sixty, then to $1 50, and then to two dollars. I do not know whether any one of these taxes continued long enough to enable us to arrive at any general inference as to the rate that would yield the largest returns. It is certain that the present tax of two dollars is promoting illicit distillation to a degree which threatens the collection of any revenue whatever on whisky. In one single collection district in the city of New York, where two years ago there was not a single distillery, there are now thirty illicit distillers in cellars and out-of-the-way places, each making whisky, from one to five gallons a day, on which, of course, they pay no duty and make an enormous profit. I understand that in one district of Virginia, in the neighborhood of Richmond, where there were no distilleries two years since, there are now three hundred making whisky in evasion of the law. And in the State of Georgia, where there were but few a short time ago, there are now fifteen hundred.

How is this to be remedied? It can only be done by making the law so stringent that it will not be evaded. That is almost impossible in this country. The English Government has succeeded by looking into the detail of every man's business, by having an inspector in every man's distillery. In our country the facilities for evasion are so great that it is impossible to provide these remedies. I do not know what particular remedy the committee has recommended, but I cannot think of any likely to be more effective than a very heavy license tax and a very severe punishment for evading the law. If none are allowed to distill except those who pay a heavy license, all who evade or defy the law may be subjected to severe punishment. Large distilleries are willing to pay a license as large as may be demanded, provided they can be protected against illicit distillation. But how many of these same large distilleries which pay the taxes on their products have been forced to suspend. They cannot pay the tax of two dollars a gallon and carry on their business in competition with illicit distilleries all over the country, which make and sell their whisky and pay no tax whatever. This House has to choose, after deliberation, between these two things: either to reduce the tax on whisky so as to destroy this enormous temptation to illicit distillation, or to enact laws so stringent as to prevent the evasion of the law and the entire destruction of those who pay the tax.

I believe the manufacture of whisky is not less than from forty to fifty million gallons a year. Last year it reached the enormous amount of eighty million gallons, as the chairman of the committee has just stated. But forty millions may probably be regarded as the minimum production of the country. At two dollars this would yield $80,000,000, and at one dollar it would yield $40,000,000; but certainly, as the law is now enforced, it is not likely to yield even half of that amount. This matter should demand careful attention, and I trust the House will act upon it with due and sole regard to the interest of the revenue. The commissioners of revenue are of opinion, I believe, that one dollar per gallon will actually yield more revenue than the proposed tax of two dollars, until or unless the proposed tax of two dollars is better enforced and more rigorously collected.

I have dwelt longer on that point than I intended. Tobacco is another article which demands careful attention, and it is one of the superfluities which can be heavily taxed.

But the next principle I desire to refer to, and I think it will be the last, is this: that taxes should be imposed upon as few articles as possible. A tax is a blow at best. It is a hurt, an injury inflicted upon somebody by the Government. It must fall somewhere, and wherever it falls it will create complaint and produce injury. It is therefore evident that it should fall upon as few as possible. The expense, moreover, of collecting the revenue depends far more on the number of articles taxed than upon the amount of the aggregate collection. Our present tax law imposes duties upon a great variety of employments which scarcely pay the expenses of collection. Take all the small trades, the tailor, the shoemaker, the milliner, the dress-maker, all the small traders of that sort, and you will find that the amount of tax imposed upon them scarcely pays the expense of collection.

In a note to one of the pages of the report of the commissioners of revenue is inserted an extract from the books of one of the tax collectors in the city of New York, from which it appears that there are many milliners, dress-makers, manufacturers of cloaks, &c., whose monthly taxes amount to $1 04, another to $1 20, in another to $1 58, in another to $1 75, and in another to only forty-two cents, &c. I need not say that this scarcely pays omnibus fare to collect these taxes. All these and all like them should be, it seems to me, dismissed from the tax bill at once.

So I think in regard to all manufactures of articles of indispensable necessity for the great mass of the community. Clothing has been taxed five per cent. during the past year, and the chairman of the committee reports this year a reduction to one per cent. Now, one per cent. will simply vex the producers and yield very little revenue. Clothing is an article of universal use; it is consumed by all classes. But any considerable tax upon it must operate unequally, because the poor man or the man in middle life wears just about as much clothing as the rich man, and has to pay substantially the same amount of tax.

It seems to me, therefore, that we could relieve the great mass of the community from that tax without interfering materially with the revenue. Last year it yielded something like six million dollars. This year it would no doubt yield much more at the same rate. But at one per cent. it will yield but little. And if no one else does so, I shall submit, at the proper time, an amendment to the bill to strike out clothing from the list of taxable articles altogether. So, I think, taxes upon paper, upon type, upon books, and upon newspapers as taxes upon knowledge, and taxes upon advertisements as checking free interchange of communication on business matters, and taxes upon insurance and savings as tending to discourage prudence and forethought; and all other taxes, of which these are samples, should be swept away as speedily as possible.

The effect of our present system of imposing taxes upon every article that is manufactured, and upon every part of such article, is very important in increasing prices by duplicating taxation. I will not dwell upon this branch of the subject, which you will find discussed clearly and fully in the report of the revenue commissioners to which I have referred.

They cite the instance of an umbrella as an illustration. Formerly an umbrella was made at a single manufactory. Now it is made by putting together the various parts, each made by a different process and each paying a separate tax. The stick of wood is one article, part domestic and part foreign, the foreign article being already taxed. Then the wire comes from another establishment; the handle of bone, ivory, or horn, then the brass tube, then the elastic band of rubber, then the silk tassel, then the button and the cap—each of these may come from a different manufactory and is subject to a separate tax; and when they are all brought together and made into an umbrella, then they are taxed again.

More than that, the manufacturer of each one of the various items composing the whole avails himself of the fact that the article is taxed to add to the price of that which he supplies, and not only to the amount of the tax, but so as to give him a little additional profit. He takes advantage of the tax to increase his profit. It is so in every department of business. You find that the price of everything is raised, and raised beyond the amount of the tax imposed upon it. They manage the matter pretty much as the owners of the city railroad cars did when they were authorized to add to their fare the amount of the tax. The amount of the tax was one fifth of one cent, and they added one cent. And it is so in all departments of business. It is in human nature, and we cannot by any act we can pass here expel human nature from the masses of our people.

Now, apply this rule to all the products of manufacturing industry. Consider that, on all these processes this duplication is going on, and that each man adds something in addition to the tax to his part, and you will see a much more potent reason for the enormous prices that obtain to-day for everything than is to be found in the high price of gold. Why did not the price of everything fall when gold fell from 280 to 130? Simply because the price of gold and the inflation of the currency had comparatively little to do with the exaggerated prices at which all articles were held, not nearly as much as the fact of the duplication of taxes, and the exaggeration of profits which followed upon it.

Now, by abolishing all these taxes on manufactured articles the tendency would be to correct this most serious evil. When England began her system of internal taxation, the list of taxed articles was enormous; everything she had was taxed, and taxed roundly; but gradually, year by year, she has gone on reducing the number of articles on which internal taxes are imposed.

Her internal revenue now amounts to $161,000,000. It is drawn from three great sources: excises, stamp duties, and assessed taxes. The excises amount to $97,000,000, and of that sum more than ninety millions are raised from three articles, and there are but nine articles embraced in her whole list of excise duties. So, too, of her stamp duties. Her assessed taxes amount only to $10,000,000 a year in all, and of these one half are raised from two items—inhabited houses, and carriages. This shows that a reduction of the number of articles taxed is quite consistent with an increased aggregate amount of taxation, provided the distribution is properly made. By nursing the great sources of internal revenue, by imposing taxes only where they can be easily borne, by putting them on superfluities, by not taxing processes, but income, we should obtain the means, gradually, of reducing more and more the number of articles upon our list for taxation.

Now, sir, I do not go into any examination of other items of this bill. These are the main principles which I think it would be well for us to bear in mind.

But, after all, nearly everything will depend upon the administration of the law. There is no department of law in which administration, execution, rigid execution, careful execution, honest execution, is so important as it is in connection with our internal revenue. If it is honest, vigilant, and correct, revenue can easily be collected so as to yield large returns. If it be lax, negligent, and still worse, if it be corrupt, there is no end to the losses which the Government will sustain. With a rigid system of collection, which involves the necessity of employing capable men at remunerative prices, and having a good, efficient, and energetic staff, without reference to its cost—with such a system the people of this country can bear all the burdens of taxation now imposed upon them, or which any unforeseen emergency may hereafter require.

I hope the House, in discussing this bill, will have due and careful reference to that fact, as well as to the details of the tax itself. With a proper adjustment of this law, to be made from year to year, I am confident that this nation, with its resistless enterprise, its boundless resources, its rapidly increasing population, will meet the emergency for which it is now required to provide with the same degree of honor and success that has attended its conduct of the war which has just been closed.

The first reading of the bill having been dispensed with by unanimous consent, the committee proceeded to reconsider it by sections for amendment.

The first section was read, as follows:

That on and after the 1st day of July, 1866, in lieu of the duties on unmanufactured cotton, as provided in an act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes, approved June 30, 1864, as amended by the act of March 3, 1865, there shall be paid by the producer, owner, or holder, upon all cotton produced within the United States, and upon which no tax has been levied, paid, or collected, a tax of five cents per pound, as hereinafter provided; and the weight of such cotton shall be ascertained by deducting four per cent, for tare from the gross weight of each bale or package; and such tax shall be and remain a lien thereon, in the possession of any person whomsoever, from the time when such cotton is produced as aforesaid until the same shall have been paid; and no drawback shall in any case be allowed on raw or unmanufactured cotton of any tax paid thereon when exported in the raw or unmanufactured condition. But no tax shall be imposed upon any cotton imported from other countries, and on which an import duty shall have been paid.

Mr. LYNCH moved to amend the section by adding the following:

Provided, That any producer may procure an exemption of not more than six hundred pounds of cotton in any one year, as follows:

Upon exhibiting the same to the assistant assessor of the district where said producer resides and where the cotton was raised, at the place of production, and making oath that he raised and now owns said cotton, and satisfying the assistant assessor that his sworn statement is true, the assistant assessor shall file mark the bale or bales of said cotton with the number of pounds, being not more than six hundred as ascertained by weight then and there, and with the following words: "Cotton produced in the — assessment district is the — collection district in —, by —, and owned by him on the — day of —, 18—, and exempt from taxation." Filing said blanks with the designation of the assessment district and also of the collection district, the name of the State, the name of the producer and owner, and the date when said exemption is so ascertained and marked thereon. The assistant assessor shall give to said producer a certificate of such exemption setting forth the above facts, and also the place of production as near as can be, and the payment of his fee. He shall also make a full record of all such exemptions and transmit a transcript of the same to the assessor. The assistant assessor shall be allowed a fee of two dollars for all his services in each case of exemption, to be paid by the producer. Any person swearing falsely in procuring such exemption; and any person using or attempting to use the exemption certificate or marks provided for in this section with intent to procure exemption for any other cotton than that which was lawfully exempted, as such certificate and marks set forth; also, any person selling or giving away, purchasing or receiving such certificate or marks with intent to defraud or to aid in defrauding the revenue shall be liable, upon conviction thereof, to a fine of fifty dollars or to not more than three months' imprisonment. Under the provisions of this section no cotton in its unmanufactured state shall be exempt from taxation for more than ten months after the date of its marks or certificate of exemption. Any person other than the producer named in the certificate and marks aforesaid, who shall subsequently to such exemption claim property in any cotton so exempted, by virtue of an ownership prior in date to such exemption, shall forfeit all such cotton; and any cotton with reference to which the owner or his agent shall commit any violation of this section shall also be forfeited.

Mr. LYNCH. The object of the amendment I have proposed, as will be seen, is to encourage the smaller producers of cotton. It is following the general spirit of this bill, which exempts all incomes of less than $1,000 a year. It also exempts all manufacturers of less than $600. And the incomes of miners who do not produce $1,000 are exempted from taxation. The amendment I have proposed follows out that same general principle.

There is a great deal of machinery connected with it, for the same reason that there is a great deal of machinery connected with this section levying a tax upon cotton. By referring to the bill it will be seen that sections two, three, four, and five, all long sections, relate to the collection of this tax on cotton. There is necessarily a great deal of machinery connected with this subject, for the reason that the collection of the tax is provided for by a lien upon the cotton produced, instead of, as in the case of manufactures, relying for the payment upon the responsibility of the manufacturer. This amendment is intended simply to encourage the small producers by exempting this small amount; thus following out the general spirit of the bill. I think there should be no objection to it.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the amendment proposed by my friend from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] will not be adopted. In the first place, it will open the door through a vast region of country for any quantity of fraud. The owner of a large plantation, for instance, might employ any number of men, each of whom would get the benefit of this exemption.

In addition to this, I think the gentleman from Maine proceeds upon an entirely wrong theory with reference to who pays the tax. On whatever is consumed here in this country we, the consumers, pay the tax, and on whatever goes abroad we expect, of course, to compel foreigners to pay the tax.

The amendment is so voluminous and opens the door to so great a variety of frauds that I think my friend from Maine must on reflection himself see the impropriety of its adoption.

Mr. LYNCH. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to the machinery which the committee have found it necessary to provide, in order to prevent frauds in the collection of this tax upon cotton. While the amendment is somewhat lengthy in its provisions, yet the only point of it is the exemption of six hundred pounds of cotton from taxation. Its lengthy phraseology is designed to secure the Government against frauds in connection with that exemption. If the honorable chairman of the committee will examine the provision of the old law with reference to the exemption of manufacturers to the amount of $600, he will find that that provision is liable to the same objections which he urges against this amendment. The only question is whether the proposition is so guarded that the Government will not be defrauded. I suppose the gentleman will agree that now when the labor of the South, the cotton-producing portion of the country, is revolutionized, it is desirable that if this tax be imposed on cotton, the small producers there should have some encouragement.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question: does he think that, if his amendment should be adopted, it would help in any way the man who raises only six hundred pounds of cotton?

Mr. LYNCH. It would help him certainly to the amount of the drawback which he would receive—five cents per pound. It would help him to the extent of thirty dollars on the six hundred pounds.

Mr. GARFIELD. The whole of this tax would eventually be paid by the consumer, not by the producer. The amendment would multiply greatly the number of those who would be tempted to swear falsely in order to escape the tax.

Mr. LYNCH. I would say in reply to the gentleman that the same objection would apply to the whole bill, for it all depends upon whether the machinery adopted is such as to protect the Government against frauds in the collection of the revenue. The amount proposed to be exempted by the amendment is, it is true, small; but the same might be said with regard to manufacturers to the amount of not more than six hundred dollars. The same may be said also with regard to the exemption of $1,000 from income tax. The amount of tax exempted would be large to those who would have to pay it. This amendment proceeds upon precisely the same principle which is carried out all through the bill with reference to other products. The gentleman must see that whoever finally pays the tax, the producer must get the benefit of just this five cents per pound on the six hundred pounds.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say one word further with reference to this amendment; but before doing so, I will move that the committee now rise, as I wish to submit a motion to close general debate.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 513) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, sir, that when the House shall again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the bill No. 513, all general debate upon the bill terminate in one minute, leaving the five-minute debate upon amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a point of order. Upon a bill which we are considering in this manner, section by section, is it in order to close debate upon the whole bill? Can the closing of debate extend beyond the pending section?

The SPEAKER. General debate on the bill can be terminated; but that does not interfere with five-minute speeches for and against amendments. The House cannot close debate entirely except upon the pending section.

The motion of Mr. MORRILL was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty-five minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. BANKS: The petition of Nathaniel Swift, Moses Foster, William Chickering, W. S. Slevers, Samuel Merritt, Marcus Morton and others, for amendment of tax law on savings banks.

By Mr. CONKLING: The petition of citizens of Otsego county, New York, asking passage of laws regulating inter-State insurance.

By Mr. COBB: The memorial of George Cottingham, in relation to his pursuit of the assassins of President Lincoln, dated May 4, 1866.

By Mr. DELANO: The petition of J. B. Fellows & Co., of Mobile, Alabama, praying indemnity for 47,660 pounds of cotton taken at the capture of Mobile by the Government, sold at New York, May 13, 1865, for $14,298 in gold.

Also, the petition of Mrs. Martha A. Booth, widow of Dr. William A. Booth, of Canton, Mississippi, who was a Union man murdered by the enemy, praying indemnity for losses of property by the war.

Also, the petition of Timothy Lyden, of West Virginia, praying compensation as wagoner in the quartermaster's department while he was in captivity and prison by the enemy.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE: The petition of citizens of Dodge county, in the State of Wisconsin, for national insurance law, &c.

By Mr. HULBURN: The petition of H. R. James, and others, citizens of Ogdensburg, New York, asking an increase and an ad valorem duty upon foreign flax imported.

Also, the petition of A. B. James, and others, citizens of St. Lawrence county, New York, on the same subject.

By Mr. LONGYEAR: The petition of A. C. Blodget, and others, citizens of Ypsilanti, Michigan, asking for a bureau of national insurance.

By Mr. ORTH: A petition from James Heaton, and others, praying for legislation on the subject of insurance companies.

By Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts: The petition of Josiah Brown, and 131 others, tobacco-growers in the town of Deerfield, Massachusetts, asking for increased protection against the importation of cigars.

Also, the petition of Charles Haywood, and 51 others, tobacco-growers of Gill and Northfield, for the same purpose.

Also, the petition of Lemuel Cooley, and 59 others, tobacco-growers of Whately and Hatfield, Massachusetts, for the same purpose.

Also, the petition of H. H. Mayhew, and 52 others, tobacco-growers of Charlemont, Massachusetts, for the same purpose.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

The following notice for leave to introduce a bill was given under the rule:

By Mr. JULIAN: A bill entitled, "An act concerning the elective franchise in the Territories of the United States, and the admission of new States hereafter to be formed within the same."

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 8, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating a second dispatch from the minister of the United States in Paris to the Secretary of State, relative to a proposed exposition of fishery and water culture at Arcachon, in France; which, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a message of the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 19th ultimo, a report from Benjamin C. Truman relative to the condition of the southern people and the States in which the rebellion existed; which, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of Enos Kellsy, of the town of Napoli, Cattaraugus county, New York, who states that he is sixty-six years of age; that he has not a dollar's worth of property in the world; that at the outbreak of the rebellion he had seven sons, all of whom enlisted in the Army; two of them were killed on the field of battle; another died in a rebel prison; another lost a leg at the battle of Gettysburg, and prays for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Washington, District of Columbia, praying that Congress will enact such just and equal laws for the regulation of inter-State insurances of all kinds as may be effectual in establishing the greatest security for the interests protected by policies and promotive of the greatest good and convenience to all concerned in such transactions; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented two petitions of mechanics and laborers in American manufacturing establishments, praying that the tariff may be so amended as to protect their labor to the extent of the difference of the cost of capital and labor here and abroad, with the addition of the taxes paid by American industrial products, from which the foreign are free; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the petition of citizens of New Bedford, Massachusetts, setting forth that St. Catharines, in Brazil, is an important place of resort for our whaling fleet; that it is essential to our interests that the consulate at that place should be filled by an American citizen competent to the performance of its duties. They go on to say that with the close of the war the salary for the consul there will be stopped. They recommend, in the interest of commerce, that a salary of at least $1,500 be provided for the consul there. This petition is numerously signed by the most eminent and respectable citizens of New Bedford. I ask its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

It was so referred.

Mr. MORGAN presented the memorial and proceedings of a meeting of the medical profession held at Baltimore on the 4th day of May, in obedience to a call numerously signed by physicians from every portion of the United States, praying Congress to adopt prompt and efficient measures for protecting the community against the approach of the Asiatic cholera; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask leave to present the memorial of O. D. Mesnil, a citizen of Belgium, who respectfully represents that he is desirous of introducing into the United States a new mode for the towage of boats on navigable rivers. The proposed plan is fully explained and its advantages set forth in the printed summary accompanying it. I ask that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Did the Chair understand the Senator to say that the petitioner was a citizen of Belgium?

Mr. MORRILL. I believe he is so described; I am not sure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule a petition from a foreigner residing in or belonging to any foreign Government cannot be received.

Mr. MORRILL. It is sent to me, not by himself, but by a very well-known citizen. I will withdraw the petition until I am able to ascertain the fact.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CRESWELL, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers of Rebecca Scott, praying for a pension, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 213) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of James Pool, praying to be reimbursed for money paid by him for supplies for the Shawnee tribe of Indians, reported a bill (S. No. 311) for the relief of James Pool, which was read and passed to a second reading.

EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 133) relative to the attempted assassination of the Emperor of Russia, have had it under consideration and directed me to report it back with amendments; and as the resolution is one which I think will interest the Senate, and perhaps ought to be acted upon immediately and unanimously, I will ask that it be proceeded with now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the following joint resolution:

Resolved, &c., That the Congress of the United States of America has learned with deep regret of the attempt made upon the life of the Emperor of Russia by an enemy of emancipation. The Congress sends their greeting to his Imperial Majesty and to the Russian nation, and congratulates the twenty million serfs upon the providential escape from danger of the sovereign to whose head and heart they owe the blessings of their freedom.

The first amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was to strike out the word "their" before the word "greeting," so that it will read: "The Congress sends greeting to his Imperial Majesty," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add as an additional section the following:

And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to forward a copy of this resolution to the Emperor of Russia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the vote is taken I will take the liberty of making one remark. In considering the resolution in committee, it seemed in some respects inadequate to the occasion, and yet the committee did not think it advisable to attempt any further amendment. The public prints have informed us that an attempt was made on the life of the Emperor of Russia by a person animated against him on account of his divine effort to establish emancipation. That report, I am inclined to think, has not disclosed completely the whole case. It does not appear, from what we are told, that the special ground of animosity to the Emperor, at the present moment, is so much the original act of emancipation as the courage and perseverance and wisdom which he has displayed in carrying it forward to its practical results.

I have had occasion, formerly, to remind the Senate how completely the Emperor has done his work. Not content with issuing the decree of emancipation, which was in the month of February, 1861, he has proceeded, by an elaborate system of regulations, to provide, in the first place, for what have been called the civil rights of all the recent serfs; then, in the next place, to provide especially for their rights in court; then, again, to provide for their rights in property, securing to every one of them a homestead; and then, again, by providing for them rights of public education. Added to all these, he has secured to them also political rights, giving to every one the right to vote for all local officers, corresponding to our officers of the town and of the county. It is this very thoroughness with which he has carried out his decree of emancipation that has aroused against him the ancient partisans of slavery, and I doubt not it was one of these who aimed at him that blow which was so happily arrested. The laggard and the faithless are not pursued by assassins.

The Emperor of Russia was born in 1818, and is now forty-eight years of age. He succeeded to the throne on the death of his late father in 1855. Immediately after his accession he was happily inspired to bring about emancipation in his great country. One of his first utterances when declaring his sentiments, was, that it was important that this great work should begin from above to the end that it should not proceed from below. Therefore he insisted that the Imperial Government itself should undertake the blessed work, and not leave it to the chance of insurrection or of blood. He went forth bravely, encountering much opposition; and now, that emancipation has been declared in form, he is still going forward bravely in order to crown it by assuring all those rights without which emancipation is little more than a name. It was, therefore, on account of his thoroughness in the work that he became a mark for the assassin; and, sir, our country does well when it offers its homage to the sovereign who has attempted so great a task, under such difficulties and at such hazards, making a landmark of civilization.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "by an enemy of emancipation;" and upon this amendment I will submit a remark. The Senate of the United States, sir, is called upon to vote for this resolution as it stands, and to assert by its vote that the attempt made upon the life of the Emperor of Russia was "by an enemy of emancipation." Now, sir, I ask you, I ask any member of the Senate, whether there is one particle of evidence before this body, or whether there is a particle of evidence extant in this country, and accessible to the people of this country, which shows that such an attempt was made by an enemy of emancipation. I have seen none such. The statement that I have seen in the papers is that it was by a man in the humble walks of life, and I presume by a man that did not own many serfs. If it be the fact that this attempt at the assassination of the Emperor of Russia was made by an enemy of emancipation, that fact can be easily ascertained, for Russia is represented here by a minister. Inquiry could have been made of that minister; and if the fact be as alleged in the resolution we could have had knowledge of that fact from a proper and reliable source.

I do not suppose there is any person in this Chamber, or any person in this country, who approves of the attempt to assassinate the Emperor of Russia, or anybody else; but when we come to record our votes in favor of the passage of the resolution, ought we not to be properly informed whether the resolution states a fact, or whether it does not state a fact? Sir, I sat in this Chamber in 1861, and I saw a resolution pass this body, which I supposed at the time was true, which affected a warm personal friend of my own, formerly a member of this body, declaring that he had joined the enemies of his country, and evidence was brought forward that he had subscribed some two hundred dollars to establish a newspaper to aid the southern cause, and that he had left Missouri and had gone over into the enemy's lines. Even my colleague, (Mr. Bayard,) a member of the Judiciary Committee at that time, was betrayed into the belief that that was the fact, and joined in the report. And yet, sir, I know the fact that on the very day that resolution passed the Senate of the United States, that gentleman was living quietly in the State of Missouri, at the house of a friend, had taken no part in any movement against the United States, and never did subscribe one dollar to establish a paper to aid the confederates. It is true that in 1860, during a political canvass, he subscribed $200 to establish a Democratic newspaper, and that fact was used to found upon it the charge that he had given $200 to establish a paper to aid the confederates, and that he had gone over the lines and joined the enemy. Sir, I have seen that Senator since, and I know the fact that at that time he was quietly living in the interior of Missouri, and had done no act against the Government. Well, sir, gentlemen honestly believed that was true. Now gentlemen may honestly believe that this is true, that the attempt upon the life of the Emperor of Russia was made by an enemy of emancipation. I want to know the facts. I am willing to vote for the resolution; I condemn the act as much as anybody else; but I want to be informed of the truth of the allegation that it was done by an enemy of emancipation. Why, sir, it seems, nowadays, that no crime can be committed, that no law can be violated, that no moral principle can be outraged, but that it is some slaveholder that does it, or some friend of slavery, some enemy to emancipation! If it be true that the act was done by an enemy to emancipation, we can readily be informed of that fact. Being informed of that fact, I will as readily vote for the resolution with that clause in as with it out; but I want to know whether I am voting for a fact. I therefore move the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, it is impossible for the Senate of the United States on this occasion to send out a commission to Russia in order to ascertain the precise facts in this historic case. Sir, it is a historic case, to be adjudged by the rules of history and not according to the practice of a justice's court. I do not think the Senator will expect that we shall introduce witnesses on the floor on this occasion to prove what the Senator requires. Suffice it to say, sir, that the same testimony which tells us that the attempt to take the life of the Emperor was made, discloses also the character of the assassin. The Senator from Delaware must doubt that the attempt has been made, if he doubts the attempt was made by an enemy of emancipation. The same report that announces one fact announces the other; and if the Senator sets aside one fact he must set aside the other. They both stand on the same authority. I presume, therefore, that the House of Representatives, from whom this resolution proceeded, went on the original report as it came to us from Europe, even from the Russian authorities; they did not go behind that; and assuming that the attempt was made, they went further and assumed that the same authority which declared that the attempt was made was truthful when it disclosed the character of the author of the attempt. I do not think that the Senate can go behind that.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not desire that this body should send out a commissioner or that they should introduce witnesses upon the floor of the Senate; but the Russian minister resides in this city; if it be a fact he knows of it; he has information from his Government disclosing all the circumstances of this matter. It will not injure this resolution, it will not spoil the compliment, if compliment it be, to wait for one day until the fact can be ascertained. Now, sir, I am just informed by my friend on my left, the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. VAN WINKLE,] that the papers stated last evening that the man who made this attempt on the life of the Emperor was a hypochondriac. Here are conflicting statements. It may be that the offender was some crazy man, that does not know what emancipation means; and we are called upon solemnly to send to the Emperor of Russia our regrets at an attempt upon his life by an enemy of emancipation, which, perhaps, when it gets there will be all news to him. What would he think if it was to turn out that the person was not really an enemy to emancipation, but was some crazy monomaniac that attempted his life, as was the man who attempted the life of General Jackson? He would laugh at our folly.

If gentlemen are satisfied to vote in the dark, or if they have information on this subject that satisfies their minds that this was done by an enemy of emancipation, let them so vote. I cannot vote for any such fact. I do not know it; I doubt it. It may be true or it may be false. I will not say that I doubt it. I have no opinion about it. I have seen no evidence of it. The latest news states that the man was a monomaniac, as I understand. It is for this reason that I made the suggestion to the Senate that before a resolution goes solemnly from the Congress of the United States stating a fact, the Congress of the United States ought to be satisfied that the statement is true. That is my object, and my only object.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I do not see that it is very material to go into an inquiry respecting the particular facts connected with the attempted assassination of the Emperor of Russia. We are acting on the evidence brought to us by foreign journals. That is the best evidence we can have at present; and whether it is in all respects perfectly accurate, I regard as entirely immaterial. That an attempt has been made upon the life of that most excellent and magnanimous prince, Alexander II, of Russia, is, I suppose, beyond all doubt; and I shall, for one, vote for this resolution with a great deal of pleasure. He happens to be one of the very few of the princes of Europe who has maintained his position of firm friendship to the Union and his attachment to the success of our great cause; and I feel, for one, that this resolution is but a fair, reasonable expression of the gratitude of the nation for the high, heroic stand which has been taken by that Emperor toward our own country. I hope the resolution will pass without this amendment. I regard the mere fact implied in the mere reciting part of it as immaterial to the real purpose which we have in view. Our great object is to express our respect for that prince.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall say one word more, and then I shall not detain the Senate further on this subject. There have been frequent attempts made in Russia heretofore to assassinate sovereigns, but it has never been alleged on any former occasion that the attempt at assassination was done by an enemy of emancipation or by persons in favor of retaining a portion of the people as serfs. What right have we to assert that this arises from an opposition to emancipation, when it seems to be rather approved in Russia to attempt the assassination of a sovereign?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware to amend the resolution by striking out the words "by an enemy of emancipation."

The amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the joint resolution be read a third time; it was read the third time and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 310) to change the place of holding the courts of the United States for the northern district of Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

APPROVAL OF A JOINT RESOLUTION.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. COOPER, his Secretary, announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on the 7th instant, a joint resolution (S. R. No. 80) extending the time for the completion of the Union Pacific railway, eastern division.

ASIATIC CHOLERA.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 116) to prevent the introduction of the cholera into the ports of the United States, have directed me to report it back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Commerce report the joint resolution with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof a substitute. The substitute alone will be read unless the reading of the original resolution is asked for by some Senator.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be inserted in lieu of the original resolution, as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, with the cooperation of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury, whose concurrent action shall be directed by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, to cause a rigid quarantine against the introduction into this country of the Asiatic cholera through its ports of entry whenever the same may be threatened by the prevalence of said disease in countries having direct commercial intercourse with the United States.

Second. That he shall also enforce the establishment of sanitary cordons to prevent the spread of said disease from infected districts adjacent to or within the limits of the United States.

Third. That said Secretaries are hereby authorized to use the means at their command to carry out the foregoing provisions.

Fourth. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to open a correspondence with the foreign Powers whose proximity to the United States will endanger the introduction of Asiatic cholera into this country through their ports and territory, soliciting their cooperation with this Government in such efforts to prevent the introduction and spread of said disease.

Mr. CLARK. That resolution is a very general statement, and I shall be glad to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce what is proposed to be done under it, and what is the plan, if there is any, before the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. The intention is to establish a uniform system of quarantine throughout the whole country. The proposition is drawn with very great care, and is deemed by the most eminent physicians of the United States to be an efficient plan. We have had before the committee some of the most eminent surgeons of the country; among others, the quarantine surgeons of New York; and the intention is to make the system uniform throughout the United States, and place power in the hands of the Secretaries to enforce it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senator from Michigan the meaning of that part of the resolution which declares that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall use the means at their command to enforce these provisions. Does that mean that they shall use military power, the Army and the Navy, to enforce quarantine?

Mr. CHANDLER. They are to employ the vessels at their command, and all the powers at their command may be used, if necessary. I suppose that in the case of New Orleans, or any southern port where soldiers are employed, and it may be necessary to use them as a guard, they could be used under this resolution. In other words, all the powers at the command of the Secretaries may be used at their discretion.

Mr. ANTHONY. Can they declare martial law?

Mr. CHANDLER. They may use any power requisite to stop the cholera.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would rather have the cholera than such a proposition as this. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. It seems to me that this resolution is nothing more than making the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy and others a board of health for the whole country, with the resources of the whole country at their command to carry it out. I am very slow, the first morning that the report comes to us, to vote for any such resolution. I think we had better consider it. We had better have some plan. I think the resolution had better go over until the committee can tell us more about it. It may be right; it may be that something will be necessary to be done to establish some uniform system of quarantine; but I think the system should be pretty well developed before we place such great powers in the hands of any person. I think it is hardly necessary to do so. There is certainly no such haste about it that we need pass this resolution on the morning it is reported, without some consideration or some information as to what the plan is. It is said the resolution is drawn with very great care; and it may be as to its wording; but nobody seems to be able to tell us what the scope of it is, or what is contemplated. It may be a uniform system of quarantine, but what kind of a quarantine, where established, how rigid? What do they propose by it? I doubt whether it is desirable. It is suggested to me that these Secretaries can do anything under the resolution. I have no doubt they can, but I doubt whether it is desirable to give them that power at once. I think we had better consider it.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator has had this identical resolution on his desk since the 6th day of March last, and if he does not know anything about it, it is time that he did. If the resolution is of any use at all, it is of immediate importance. If it is not of any use, kill it. We have had, as I said, before the Committee on Commerce the most eminent surgeons in the United States, and on consultation with those eminent surgeons and in consultation with the heads of Departments we have introduced this resolution. Put it over if you like; but if it is of importance at all, it is of importance now. The cholera is in New York harbor to-day. I do not think it will land; I hope not; but it may. You can wait a month; you can wait until the middle of July; you can wait until next December. If the Senator could not learn what this resolution means between the 6th of March and the 8th day of May, it takes him a great while to learn. That is all I have to say about it. It has lain on his desk the whole time ever since the 6th of March.

Mr. CLARK. I have always found that when a man forsakes his argument to attack a person he confesses the weakness of his cause. It may be true in this case. Now, it may be that this resolution has lain upon my desk, and it may be that it has been lying on the desk of every Senator in the Chamber; but you know, Mr. President, and all Senators know, that it is not usual for Senators to pick up the bills and resolutions that are laid on our tables, and examine them seriatim, and we do not care to see what their provisions are until our attention is called to them by some committee that reports upon them, and then, when a bill or resolution comes up and is read at your table, we listen to it, we hear its provisions, and we begin to think about it. It is not strange that after a man hears it read at the table in that way, when he sees that it has such sweeping powers that it goes from one end of the country to the other, and puts all the resources of the Government into the hands of this commission, he should say, "You had better be careful, you had better wait."

Now, the Senator from Michigan may desire to push this resolution through, and for aught I know he may be in such fear of the cholera being in New York that he thinks he can prevent it by a sanitary regulation of this kind; but I do not quite so apprehend, nor do I apprehend that we are in so much danger that we should be justified in passing a resolution of this kind for any reason of that sort.

The Senator says that if we choose to put it over, we can do so. That is very important information; it is very important information that the Senate can put a measure over when they choose. I had learned that some time ago. I supposed they could do so if they thought well, even in regard to a measure which was reported from the Committee on Commerce. The suggestion I made was, whether it had not better lie on the table for one day until we can have some development of the plan, until we can consider the scope of what is proposed, and see what is best to be done. I am not alone in that particular, and the Senator need not show quite so much feeling in regard to me, because I heard Senators around me say, "It is better to put that over and consider it." I have no personal choice about it; I only desire that we should not legislate in such hot haste upon such grave and important matters.

Mr. CHANDLER. As I said a moment ago, the Committee on Commerce have had this subject under consideration for more than two months; they have consulted many eminent surgeons; they have thoroughly considered the joint resolution; but in regard to this, as in regard to many other projects that came before the body, we met with opposition from men who had given the subject no consideration. It is under the control of the Senate; if the Senate sees fit to postpone or to defeat it, it is a matter of no concern to the Committee on Commerce or to myself any more than it is to any other man in the United States. As I have said before, we have consulted the most eminent surgeons in the United States; we have had before us the health officers from New York, Baltimore, and Philadelphia; the provisions of the joint resolution have been thoroughly considered; and now the Senator from New Hampshire wants some plan proposed. We have proposed a plan. We propose to place this power in the hands of the heads of Departments, to be exercised at their discretion. I simply ask for a vote on the subject, and it is immaterial to me whether the Senate postpones it till to-morrow or kills it. I only say we have thoroughly considered it.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope this measure will not be acted upon to-day. As I understand, its effect will be to bring on a collision between the Federal authorities and the State authorities. I suppose if it goes into operation its effect will be to supersede the quarantine regulations of the State of New York over the harbor of New York; to take the power of the State of New York out of the hands of the officers appointed by that State, their board of health, their officers of quarantine, their efficient regulations, and place them all in the hands of the Federal authorities. If that is to be the effect of the joint resolution it had better be considered a little before it is adopted. I move that it be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope not. I hope it will be acted upon now, and either rejected or passed.

Mr. HOWE. Perhaps it is not very important whether the Senate acts upon this question to-day or to-morrow; but before the Senate votes to postpone action upon it at all, I should like to make a suggestion. I do not think it will be the practical operation of this joint resolution to bring about a collision between the authorities of the United States and those of any State or any municipality. We understand that there is a general desire that there should be a uniform system of quarantine established; that is, a system of quarantine established which should be uniform at all ports and at all points of entrance. It is said that an effective quarantine before the harbor of New York is really of no considerable practical value to New York itself, if the ports of Philadelphia and Boston and New Haven are left without any system of quarantine. And it is said, too, that quarantine regulations established for all these ports do not protect the United States nor those several cities against the introduction of those diseases which are said, upon the authority of medical gentlemen, to be portable diseases. They pronounce that this disease of cholera is a portable disease, and can be transferred from one point to another, and although you may establish a most effective quarantine before each of the ports to which I have alluded, yet it may be brought into some port on the Gulf, some port on the Mississippi, or over some railway connecting us with the Canadas. Now, it is very evident that the authority of the State of New York is confined to her own limits in establishing these regulations, and however effective they may be within those limits, they are useless, unless the regulations are just as effective in other States.

Mr. GRIMES. Permit me to make an inquiry. Is it contemplated by the Committee on Commerce that there shall be quarantine established on the various railroads connecting this country with Canada, at Niagara falls, at Portland, and at the other termini of these roads; that there shall be the same quarantine regulations established at these various points that are established at New York.

Mr. HOWE. Perhaps not that every provision shall be made in a small port as in a large port, but there shall be the same system; that is, the regulations adopted to keep a suspected vessel out of New York shall be adopted to keep a suspected vessel out of every other port, but the measures necessary to protect a small port against the entrance of a suspected ship may be different at different points. I do not know how that is. It is very evident that if we are to have a uniform system, it must be provided by the national authority, or by compact, agreement between the different States or different municipalities in the several States. Whether the United States will undertake to secure this uniformity, is a question that we have got to pass upon. Something we have done in that direction already. We have passed certain bills which tend to charge us with the care of the health of the United States.

Mr. GRIMES. What are they?

Mr. HOWE. Such as appropriating certain vessels of the Navy to this work, dedicating certain ships for this purpose. If you will have a uniform system you can only have it by the national intervention. That seems to me very certain; and medical gentlemen agree in the testimony that a system which is not uniform is of no sort of value; and it was said to the committee that if the United States would undertake the work of providing a uniform system for all its ports and all its avenues our neighbors in Canada would conform to it and establish just such an effective system there, and the same system that we have here, so that there shall be no favoritism shown to one port over another, either in the different States of this country or in the neighboring States. I do not understand that any arrangements have been made with our neighbors to the south in Mexico; and if no arrangement can be made with them we shall have to protect our southern border when it becomes necessary.

Mr. GRIMES. I think I am not open to the rebuke of the Senator from Michigan, that I have not examined this bill. I read it several days ago, and I am as ready to vote upon it now as I shall be at any future time; and if the committee are anxious that it should be taken up, I am willing that it should come up and I am prepared to vote against it. I do not recognize the obligation on the part of Congress that because certain physicians in the city of New York believe that it is necessary that there should be a cordon established in order to keep the cholera away from this country, therefore we shall be justified in abandoning all the powers of Congress into the hands of a commission and in conferring upon the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy all control over the military arm of the Government and over the Treasury, which this bill virtually does. I addressed an inquiry to the Senator from Wisconsin to learn from him, if I could, what was the full scope of this measure. I understand that it confers upon these officers—

Mr. HOWE. I did not understand that to be the inquiry.

Mr. GRIMES. I understood from the Senator from Wisconsin that this bill conferred the power on this commission, these three Secretaries, to establish quarantine regulations similar to those they have in New York, although not to so great an extent perhaps, because to such an extent it might not be necessary, anywhere on this continent. The bill does not require that the Government shall adopt the quarantine officers of the State of New York. Oh, no; they are to be new appointees, appointed under this law. The organization of the city of New York or of the State of New York is to be entirely ignored and is ignored by this bill. We are to have another batch of office-holders, innumerable in number if it is to be extended uniformly over the country according to the idea of the Senator from Wisconsin, which I understand is the idea of the committee.

I have not any such fear of the cholera as to induce me to vote for a bill like this. I believe that it will be attended with infinitely worse consequences to the country than the most malignant type of cholera that ever prevailed upon this continent. As my friend near me says, one thing would certainly result from it, and that is that it would give the cholera to the Treasury of the United States if it should be enacted into a law. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, it may perhaps be owing to the fact that I have no very great fears of the cholera, having had some experience in regard to it from having lived in a town with it three years, that I am not willing to break down all the barriers around the Treasury, which some gentlemen seem to be disposed to do. There is nothing, according to the provisions of this bill, as I understand it, that it does not authorize the three Secretaries to do. I trust that the time has gone by when we are going to be called upon to legislate in the manner in which this bill proposes. During the prevalence of the war we drew to ourselves here as the Federal Government authority which had been considered doubtful by all and denied by many of the statesmen of this country. That time, it seems to me, has ceased and ought to cease. Let us go back to the original condition of things, and allow the States to take care of themselves as they have been in the habit of taking care of themselves.

Mr. HOWE. Take care of their own cholera!

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir, take care of their own cholera. My State will take care of its cholera. I do not want to have a cordon, as they call it, against the cholera established between my State and the city of Chicago. I do not want officials, either of the Treasury or of the Army or the Navy out there to prevent a citizen from traveling from one place to another, either on the lakes or on the Mississippi river, which authority is conferred by the provisions of this bill. In my locality we are familiar with this disease; we know that it has not got such terrors as it seems to have to gentlemen who are not familiar with it, and we do not want to have our liberty restrained, nor do we want to have our privilege of locomotion restrained, nor do we want to have the Treasury afflicted by any such bill as this.

Mr. COWAN. I can only add to what has been so well said by my eloquent friend from Iowa, that in the present condition of the medical science nothing can be more absurd than this legislation. If there is any one thing I think well settled, it is that cholera is not contagious in that sense of the word which would enable you by means of some legislative enactment to keep it out of the country. I think for the credit of the body in that respect we ought to avoid this mode of dealing with that which is now pretty well understood. I should just as soon think of legislating against coughs and colds as against cholera. As has been said, we have large experience in it now in this country; I have been myself two or three times in places where large numbers of people were dying of cholera; and I think the universal sentiment of the profession, the learned sentiment of the profession, is now that no kind of quarantine regulations can prevent the appearance and prevalence of this disease. It is an epidemic instead of a contagion. It exists in the air; and hence there was great propriety in the jest of some Senator the other day who proposed to refer the whole subject to the ventilation committee. If you could prevent the introduction of that air from which the disease arises, if you could prevent it from traversing its circle around the world every sixteen or eighteen years and from coming into our atmosphere, perhaps something might be done; but I am satisfied no kind of regulation other than that of cleanliness and care when the poison is in the atmosphere will have the slightest effect to stay the ravages of the disease.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is House bill No. 280.

TAX ON PETROLEUM.

Mr. COWAN. Before the Senate proceeds with the unfinished business of yesterday I desire to ask for the passage of a joint resolution which is now upon the table. Yesterday a joint resolution was received from the House of Representatives and laid upon your desk, sir, to take off the internal revenue from crude petroleum. It was not referred to the Finance Committee regularly and formally, but the matter was before that committee this morning, and was fully considered. I ask now that the joint resolution be referred to the committee, and that I have leave to report at once that the committee have considered it favorably and recommend its immediate passage; and I ask that it be put on its passage, as I think the matter is of great importance to the production of the oil regions, particularly of my State.

At the time when this tax was imposed, petroleum was worth ten or eleven or twelve dollars a barrel. At that time it was hoped that it would retain these prices in competition with the production of foreign oils, but that hope has not been realized. From a variety of causes the price has been reduced from ten to about three dollars, and when the producer pays the tax, and pays, as in a great many instances he has to do, a great expense for machinery, where the well is not a flowing well but pumping and falling, it leaves him nothing, and the wells are being abandoned, and the whole region is in a condition of desolation and panic. They are liable to such accidents as very often destroy the proceeds of months in a single night by fire; and those fires are sometimes the work of incendiaries, growing out, it is said, of changes which have taken place in carrying on the business, throwing many persons out of employment. For instance, it is alleged that a very great amount of oil has been consumed recently by carters, draymen, wagoners, and others, who were thrown out of employment by the introduction of pipes to carry the oil to the depositories, some of those pipes being seven or eight miles long.

The expiration of Young's patent in England and Scotland for procuring the petroleum from Scotch shales has reduced prices there, and it is utterly impossible for our people now to compete with those oils, they bearing the burden of this tax. We must consider further that the imposition of a tax upon this commodity is itself against all principle. It goes into the families in every part of the land; it is an article of prime necessity, an article as necessary as air and food to life; and I believe some political economists always, or at least since the days of Adam Smith, have recommended that articles of that character be freed from the imposition of burdens of this kind unless in case of absolute necessity; and upon that principle the producers think they are entitled to the indulgence of Congress for this commodity. If it is refused, the revenues will not be the gainer and the people through those regions will be very largely the losers.

I may remark another thing, Mr. President, that just at this season of the year is the time when new wells are put down, and in the condition in which the business is now found nobody will embark in it; there is a stagnation all through that region of previous activity, which is distressing indeed to look upon; and without new wells, and without the investment of the capital necessary to put them down, the production of oil ceases to be a matter of any moment to anybody; because there is no well, no matter how good a one it may have been at the outstart, how freely it flowed or how profusely it could be pumped out, that is not in time exhausted; and hence to procure the commodity new wells have to be continually sunk and followed up by the investment of very considerable amounts of capital. This is now stopped entirely, owing principally to the imposition of a tax of one dollar a barrel upon oil. I hope, then, the Senate will concur with the House of Representatives in relieving from this burden.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the permission of the Senate, the Chair will lay before the body the joint resolution from the House of Representatives referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 137) to provide for the exemption of crude petroleum from internal tax or duty, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope it will not be referred. I trust the Senate will proceed to consider the resolution now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider it at the present time.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to exempt from internal tax or duty paraffine oil not exceeding in specific gravity thirty-six degrees Baumé hydrometer, the product of a residuum of distillation, crude petroleum, and crude oil the product of the first and single distillation of coal, shale, asphaltum, peat, or other bituminous substance.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg to say one word on the motion that I have made to proceed to the consideration of this measure now. When the question was before the Senate hitherto, and this tax was imposed, I for one was not in favor of it. Living as I had lived for many years in a mining country, where perhaps one in a hundred enterprises succeeded, I understood well the nature of the enterprise of seeking for oil. I believed then that the imposition of this tax would prove precisely what it has proven to be—a tax rather upon effort than upon property. Such has proved to be the result, and I hope that no person will object to remitting it, so that this great interest may be relieved from a burden which is really intolerable to those engaged in it.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 563) to regulate the time and fix the place for holding the circuit court of the United States in the district of Virginia, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to take up Senate bill 109.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that will not be done. I desire to have the unfinished business of yesterday disposed of.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not think this bill will take much time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we can dispose of the Post Office appropriation bill, which is the unfinished business of yesterday, in a little while. The debate is exhausted, I imagine, and we can take the vote.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is the bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

Mr. WADE. I ask the Senate once more to take up the resolution granting the use of the Chamber to Mrs. Walling. I suppose there will be no debate upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us take a vote on this question.

Mr. WADE. On what question?

Mr. SHERMAN. The question debated yesterday.

Mr. WADE. This will not take a moment to decide it one way or the other. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take it up. I only desire to have a vote upon it. If there is any debate upon it, I will let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the resolution granting the use of the Chamber to Mrs. Walling for the purposes of lecturing. No objection being made, the resolution is before the Senate, and the question is, Will the Senate reconsider its vote rejecting the resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WADE. I barely wish to say this before the vote is taken on the reconsideration: this lady, I believe, was in Texas when the war broke out. She has three young children dependent on her for support. She lectures, as I understand, very much to the acceptance of the people, and she endeavors to support herself in this way. She is exceedingly anxious that she should have an opportunity to lecture here at once, more, I believe, on account of the prestige it will give her to have this Hall than for any other reason. I hope this privilege will be granted to her. That is all I wish to say about it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Guthrie, Howard, Howe, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Riddle, Sumner, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Morgan, Norton, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Foster, Hendricks, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Wright, and Yates—19.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "Monday evening, the 7th instant," and inserting, "Thursday evening, the 10th instant."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to have the resolution read, as amended.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the use of the Senate Chamber be granted to Mrs. M. C. Walling for the purpose of delivering therein an address on Thursday evening, the 10th instant; the floor of the Chamber to be for the exclusive accommodation of members of the Senate and House of Representatives; and that hereafter the Senate Chamber shall not be granted for any other purpose than for the use of the Senate.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now call for the order of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, is now before the Senate, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.]

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Illinois by striking out the last clause, I think it is, which provides for a report of the cause of removal to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves to amend the amendment by striking out the words "the cause, in case of removal, to be reported to the Senate at its next session;" so that the amendment, if amended, will read:

And be it further enacted, That no person exercising or performing, or undertaking to exercise or perform, the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall, before confirmation by the Senate, receive any salary or compensation for his services unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened during the recess of the Senate, and since its last adjournment, by death, resignation, expiration of term, or removal for acts done or omitted in violation of the duties of his office.

Mr. HOWARD called for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment, and they were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say a single word on this subject. I intimated the other day that as the amendment stood originally I had made up my mind to vote for it, and I gave some reasons why I thought we might with propriety pass something of that description with reference to what has been done heretofore, which I deemed to be very improper; but I could not vote for it with that clause in it. My colleague now proposes to remove that objection, so far as it existed to that particular clause, by striking it out. I shall vote to strike it out, because I think if the amendment is to be passed at all it would be much better without that clause, and if that is stricken out it would take away the most offensive part of it.

But I desire to say that on further reflection I have come to the conclusion not to vote for it as an amendment to this Post Office appropriation bill, whatever particular form it may assume, and for a reason which I will state. If this was very important—and I deem it important that something of the kind should be done—I would vote for it as an amendment even to an appropriation bill if we were at the very last of the session, and we had not time to legislate on the subject in another way; but I deem the suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] in relation to a bill upon the subject, which might be well considered and digested, to be the proper course to be taken with regard to it. Undoubtedly this is a matter which needs consideration, because we have felt at various times that there were evils growing out of it, but it should be done with consideration, and embrace the whole subject. We have ample time to do it left us. We are not at the heel of the session. The thing may be well adjusted and well considered; and for a well-considered bill I should be very willing to vote, for the reasons that I gave the other day.

But I do not think it wise in any point of view, either as a matter of general legislation or, if Senators please, in a party point of view, to put an amendment of this sort, at this time and under existing circumstances, upon an appropriation bill, more especially upon the Post Office appropriation bill, which may very much embarrass it, and with which the dealings of the country are very much interested. If I had had any doubt on the subject the argument that was made by my friend who has charge of the bill, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and whom I feel in some measure bound to follow in relation to it, was such as to convince me that the course which I have now suggested is the proper course to take in relation to it.

Under the circumstances I have deemed it proper to make this explanation, as otherwise I might be considered as acting in the face of what I remarked the other day; and that is that without this addition to it I should be disposed to vote for this proposition. As it is, I think it had better be struck off the bill altogether.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRIMES (after first voting in the affirmative) said: Yesterday I paired off on this bill and all the amendments to it with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. DIXON.] I understood that the pair only extended to yesterday; but as he is not here to-day it is possible that he may understand that it extends beyond yesterday. I therefore desire to withdraw my vote. I voted "yea." I do not know how he would vote if he were here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the Senator from Iowa be permitted to withdraw his vote? No objection being made, his vote will be erased.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Harris, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Davis, Guthrie, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wade—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Grimes, Hendricks, Johnson, Kirkwood, Wright, and Yates—11.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the Senator from Illinois will now withdraw the amendment. I think there is nothing in the amendment now except the admission of the power of the President to make removals, and I certainly will not vote for it.

Mr. HOWARD. The reason which the honorable Senator from Missouri has for voting against this amendment is the same reason that will prevail with me. I regard it as a plain recognition by Congress, or by the Senate at least, of the absolute and unconditional power of the President to make removals from office, and I cannot concede such a principle.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to have the amendment reported as it stands now.

The Secretary read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That no person exercising or performing, or undertaking to exercise or perform, the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall, before confirmation by the Senate, receive any salary or compensation for his services unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened during the recess of the Senate, and since its last adjournment, by death, resignation, expiration of term, or removal for acts done or omitted in violation of the duties of his office.

Mr. HOWE. I think there is enough left to vote "yea" upon it, and I believe I will stick to it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE called for the yeas and nays on the amendment as amended, and they were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think as the proposition has now been amended, striking out a part of the clause in reference to removals, it would be better to strike out all about removals and present it in the form in which it was originally offered. The proposition as originally offered was refusing to pay to any person put in office in a vacancy which existed during the session of the Senate. It is clearly not within the constitutional power of the President to fill a vacancy which does not occur during the recess of the Senate. I prefer, as a part of the amendment has now been stricken out, to put it in that form, and let us see whether the Senate is prepared to vote to pay men who are put into office without the consent of the Senate, when the vacancy existed while the Senate was in session, and it could have been consulted; in other words, whether it is proposed to repeal the existing law.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask my friend from Illinois if the law of 1863 does not cover that very case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It does not cover all the cases.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I suggest to the Senator to modify his proposition.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will modify it in that form by withdrawing the last clause.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator will reach it by striking out the clause "or removal for acts done," &c.

Mr. CLARK, (to Mr. TRUMBULL.) Move to strike out and insert your original proposition.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; I will move to strike out the amendment as it now stands and insert the original proposition as printed:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That no person exercising or performing, or undertaking to exercise or perform, the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall before confirmation by the Senate receive any salary or compensation for his services, unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened by death, resignation, or expiration of term, during the recess of the Senate and since its last adjournment.

Is the pending amendment now under my control? If it is I withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not, having been amended by the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the question is put, I wish to show the precise legal meaning of this amendment. The Senator has read it, and I ask him to say whether in case of removal after the adjournment of the Senate, the amendment would not still prevent payment to the officer who takes the place of the person removed. Undoubtedly it does, and therefore it is subject to all the arguments that were urged against it yesterday. The amendment as it now stands only provides that in case of a vacancy caused by death, resignation, or expiration of term during the session of the Senate, the President shall have the power to fill the vacancy; but if the vacancy happens by a removal made during a recess of the Senate, then the person who is appointed to fill the vacancy, under the amendment as it now stands could receive no compensation until the Senate acts upon his nomination. It is therefore subject to all the objections I have named, and indeed more, because the Senator, in order to obviate some of the objections named endeavored to qualify the amendment by providing for certain cases of removal for cause. But take the case of a defaulter who is removed after the adjournment of the Senate, and some one is appointed to fill his vacancy; that is not a vacancy caused by death, resignation, or expiration of term, but it is a vacancy caused by removal for cause. In such a case as that, the incumbent who is legally appointed to a vacancy caused by a removal would not be able to draw his salary. I therefore trust that the Senator from Illinois will adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, and withdraw this amendment, and let the subject be referred to the committee of which he is chairman, to frame a law on the subject. There is no difficulty in doing so. This amendment is still subject to all the objections that have been made to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have two answers to the Senator from Ohio. The first is, that there is no such thing as a vacancy in the case that he speaks of. A removal is not made and a vacancy occasioned, and then a person appointed; the President does not remove and then appoint, but he appoints to the office, and until the man is commissioned and qualified, the office is not vacant. That is the way where the removal is made by the appointment of a new man. It is not done by removing an officer and leaving the position vacant. Now, where a nomination is sent to the Senate—and it is occurring here every day—A B is nominated for marshal in one of the districts of Ohio in place of C D removed. The Senator from Ohio is aware that C D goes on exercising the duties of that office, and is not out of the office until A B is confirmed and gets his commission and qualifies; and does not turn over the papers of his office until then. The removal is consequent on the confirmation and acceptance of the office by his successor. If we reject the new, the old marshal continues and is not out of office at all. That is an occurrence which happens here daily. That is not a vacancy contemplated by the Constitution.

It is the same way in the recess of the Senate. Suppose the President thinks proper to remove the postmaster at Cincinnati. How does he do it? By the appointment of another person to that position, and the man in the position at Cincinnati continues to exercise the duties until his successor is commissioned and qualified, and then the papers are turned over to him. In the case of post offices, the Post Office Department—I think there is a law to that effect; I am not very familiar with the statutes on that subject—have a way of sending out a special agent, sometimes without any appointment at all as postmaster, to take charge of the office; but the mode of creating a vacancy by removal is by the appointment of another person to the office. That is the practice. That is one answer that I have to make to the suggestion of the Senator.

In answer to the suggestion which has been made during all this discussion in reference to this measure, that it should not go on an appropriation bill, but that we should have a general bill on this subject, I beg leave to say that no such bill will ever become a law. That is very clear, and everybody, I think, in the Senate must be fully aware of it. There are differences of opinion upon that subject which I am quite satisfied would prevent the enactment of a law. The Senator from Maine is for such a statute made perfect so that he could vote for it; but when it was perfected and made perfect so that the Senator from Maine could vote for it there would be a great many members of the Senate, I apprehend, who would not vote for it in that shape. I have had some conversation with Senators, and I am quite aware, I think, from the conversations I have had, that no general bill limiting and defining the power of removal from office by the President would receive even the sanction of a majority of the Senate, and if it did of a majority I am quite sure it would not of two thirds, and unless it had two thirds there would be very little probability of its ever becoming a law.

The constitutional question is not involved in the payment of an officer. Every one admits—the Senator from Ohio admits—that we may control the money of the Government; that we may appropriate to the payment of officers what we please, and when we please. I believe the practice of the Government is to pay most of its officers quarterly. I am not sure about that, whether all the salaries are paid quarterly or annually. This provision that is proposed would not prevent the salary from being paid annually. It would prevent the salary from being paid for a short time. As the law now stands I think it will be found that salaries are never paid oftener than quarterly. Perhaps I ought not to say never; but I think the general practice of the Government is to pay salaries quarterly. I may be in error, though, in reference to that. I am not sure what the period is, but if it is quarterly they have to wait three months for it, and the longest recess that ever takes place—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Some are paid monthly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Are the judges paid monthly?

Mr. SHERMAN. All revenue officers are paid monthly, and postmasters quarterly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How are foreign ministers paid?

Mr. SUMNER. Quarterly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand foreign ministers are paid quarterly and postmasters quarterly. I presumed that was the general law, though I had not referred to it recently with a view of ascertaining how that might be. The longest possible period they would have to wait would be nine months. The average period when Congress is not in session is not over six months; and taking the average, it is possible, if an officer was appointed the day after Congress adjourned, that he might have to wait three quarters for his salary instead of waiting one quarter. That would be no very great hardship upon any one. As the law now stands, he may have to wait a quarter for his salary;

so that the proposition, in the form in which it is pending, involves no constitutional question whatever. It is certainly competent for Congress, if it thinks proper, to declare that all salaries shall be paid annually or semi-annually. Would the Senator from Ohio think that a very great hardship? I do not suppose there would be any great controversy if a proposition was made in the Senate to pay salaries every six months or every nine months instead of every three months, if it was found more convenient in the transaction of the business of the Government.

That is all that this proposition amounts to, and the object had in view is simply to obtain the advice and consent of the Senate upon these appointments, which is the spirit of the Constitution. The intention of the framers of the Constitution was that officers should be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Whenever that is not done, it is an exceptional case. There are some exceptional cases. What are they? They are cases where vacancies happen during the recess of the Senate. It is not proposed by this amendment to interfere with those exceptional cases. The framers of the Constitution thought they were the only cases it was necessary to except from the general rule which they prescribed for the appointment of officers, which was by the action of the President and the Senate conjointly. That is all there is to this amendment. I have no sort of feeling about it. As I believe I have once before remarked, I was led to take some part in it in consequence of the amendment first proposed by the Senator from Missouri, and in endeavoring to aid in perfecting that amendment. It is for the Senate to determine.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly will not prolong this debate, because nothing new is elicited by it. I will simply refer to the last point stated by the Senator from Illinois, that this does not operate as a great hardship. It does operate as a great hardship. For instance, suppose the Senate should consider the nomination subsequently, when it is before them, and should reject it, then the man is without his pay entirely, and we have the spectacle of a public officer holding an office, performing the duties of that office, and getting no pay. Take the case of a Cabinet minister. Under this provision, if a man is appointed a Cabinet minister during the recess, he cannot get any pay until we meet at the next session, with a prospect over him of being rejected. A poor man could not hold the office, requiring a large expenditure. It is not the mere delay of payment. If it was certain that he would get the pay when the Senate acted, he might possibly borrow the money and pay his expenses; but this amendment provides that no money shall be paid out of the funds appropriated unless he shall be confirmed by the Senate. That certainly is a great hardship, for a man to hold an office the pay of which is contingent on the action of a political body.

Then again the Senator says that the amendment, as it now stands, does not effect anything more than to prevent the President from unconstitutionally filling a vacancy that occurs during the session of the Senate. That certainly is not the meaning of it. It provides that if a vacancy is caused by any other reason than death, resignation, or expiration of term, it shall not be filled until the incumbent is confirmed. Take the common case of a removal. Suppose after this session is closed the President should see fit, for good cause, to remove an officer. He may remove him. That is one act. He may appoint another. That is another act.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is that ever done?

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot say that it is ever done, but the act of removal and the act of appointment are separate and distinct things. It is the usual practice to appoint a new incumbent when you make a vacancy; but the vacancy may be made and then the new appointment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That was the very point that I made, that the vacancy is not made until the new incumbent is appointed. Is not that the universal practice? And the vacancy does not occur if the new appointment fails to be confirmed.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Constitution provides very clearly that the President shall have power to fill up vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate. The vacancy must first happen; but how? This amendment points out three ways by which it may happen—death, resignation, or expiration of term. All of them must be before the appointment. Now, add to that the other cause of vacancy, a removal—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is that a vacancy?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly, it is a vacancy caused by removal; so that it seems to me we ought not to deceive ourselves with the language. Indeed the proposition as it now stands is broader than it was before, when we voted upon it yesterday; that is, it does not provide for the case of a removal for cause. I hope we shall come to a vote upon it and vote it down.

Mr. STEWART. I think I understand the point intended to be made by the Senator from Illinois, but I do not think it is well taken. He says that an appointment to fill the place of an officer removed is not an appointment to fill a vacancy, for the reason that the vacancy does not occur until after the appointment has been confirmed, if I understand him correctly. Now, I submit that the President cannot fill the office unless a vacancy occurs at the same time, because if the incumbent remains in the office the appointee cannot fill that office. Then he is appointed for the purpose of filling a vacancy which shall occur, although it may not be in existence at that particular moment, by reason of removal which is to take place. I do not think it matters whether that vacancy exists in present, or whether it is to be created by a subsequent removal; the practical operation is the same, so far as I can see.

Mr. SUMNER. There seems to be an abuse that has grown up recently which all have recognized in the course of this debate, and I believe there is no one who is not willing to apply a remedy; I mean the irregular exercise of the appointing power by the President during the recess of the Senate; and there are at least two different classes of cases in which that irregular application of the appointing power appears. The first class is where offices have been left vacant by the Senate at the time of its adjournment, and yet the President after the adjournment has proceeded to fill them up. It is a mild expression to say that the course of the President under such circumstances is irregular. I insist that it is positively wrong, that it is a departure from his duties, and an infringement of the rights of the Senate as a coordinate branch of the Government. All will agree that that class of cases may be treated under the head of abuse. I insist that it is our duty if possible to apply a remedy. I think all who hear me will agree that it is our duty if possible to apply a remedy.

Then there is another class of cases, and that is, where the President, to gratify, perhaps, a party spirit, without adequate cause, without any malfeasance or misfeasance, undertakes to create a vacancy. We feel that that course is at least irregular, and that it is an abuse.

Now, I take it we are all disposed to apply a remedy to these two classes of cases, and the question is how we are to reach them. There are two ways proposed. One is by a bill which shall undertake to regulate the whole subject of removals and secure to the Senate its share in that power; in other words, secure to the Senate the same power over removals which it has over appointments, and it is insisted that that is constitutional. Sir, I am disposed to agree with those who insist that the Senate ought to have a share in the power over removals. When Senators, however, go further and say that in endeavoring to apply a remedy for the abuses to which I have referred, we should wait for the passage of that bill, I must be permitted to say that I cannot join them. I am not willing to postpone a remedy for existing abuses to so distant a day.

The general bill which it is proposed to introduce, and which my excellent friend from Missouri has in charge, and which we know has been commended by a distinguished citizen not in public life, Mr. Hamilton, of New York, in a pamphlet which is on some of our tables, raises a great question of constitutional law which has been under discussion from the days of Washington. I know not how the Senate, even after debate, in our day and under the pressure of recent events, will be disposed to pass upon it. It is a great question, I say; a question of constitutional law. Do not, sir, postpone the remedy for existing abuses till the final decision of that great question. When that bill is introduced, I, for one, shall be ready to meet it and discuss it at all points, whether on grounds of constitutional law or on grounds of expediency; but I am unwilling that a case of practical duty shall be postponed thus indefinitely; and that brings me to the precise question before the Senate, what shall we do? Why, sir, act at once and according to the best of our ability in order to apply the remedy to the abuses which I have indicated.

And, sir, what is the remedy which may be applied? I insist that after ample discussion in this Chamber we have substantially arrived at the statement of law made in the proposition of my friend from Illinois. I doubt if now we can do better than that. I believe if that be adopted it will, to a certain extent, apply a remedy. I do not think the remedy will be complete; but there will be something in it which will operate as a check upon the exercise of this irregular power by the President, and which will help to remove those abuses that we all recognize. For one, I am glad that the Senator from Illinois has brought forward the proposition, and I hope that he will not now, at this last moment, be a laggard. I hope that he will persevere, and press it to a vote. If the Senate will not adopt it, then let the Senate be responsible, as I shall think, for this abandonment of duty. I know that Senators may hesitate because they may think it inexpedient, or because they think the remedy does not go far enough; but no one, as I understand, hesitates on grounds of constitutional law. No one doubts that the proposition of the Senator from Illinois is in all respects completely constitutional. It is said that certain inconveniences may grow out of it; but do not inconveniences, and more than inconveniences, grow out of the system as we have it now? Not on account of those inconveniences, not on account of anything which has been said in this debate, can you hesitate. All that you are called now to do is to take advantage of your power over the purse-strings of the nation. It belongs to you to say when an officer shall be paid and when he shall not be paid. Nobody can doubt your constitutional power to that extent. Take advantage of it, then, and in that way, if in no other, place a proper limitation upon this admitted abuse. It is on this ground that I shall persevere with my excellent friend from Illinois to the end in voting for his proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose there is no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, on the amendment itself I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have already been ordered.

Mr. COWAN. I ask for the reading of the amendment, as amended.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That no person exercising or performing, or undertaking to exercise or perform, the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall, before confirmation by the Senate, receive any salary or compensation for his services, unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened by death, resignation, or expiration of term during the recess of the Senate and since its last adjournment.

Mr. CONNESS. I have not spoken on this subject since it has been before the Senate, and do not desire now to do more than explain the vote I shall give. I have voted consistently for the amendment offered and as perfected by the Senator from Illinois; but in the shape in which it now is I think it is reasonably obnoxious to the objections made by the Senator from Ohio, that great injury, and really a wrong that we have not a right to perpetrate, may result from its adoption, as against persons appointed who would be entitled to the offices to which they were appointed, and to the salaries belonging to those offices. The amendment would be particularly severe as against such persons legitimately and properly appointed on the Pacific coast. The distance between that country and this makes it already a matter of the greatest possible inconvenience, often very serious hardship, in regard to the payment of salaries due. In the shape in which the amendment stands, I cannot conceive that there is enough to be gained compared to the objections that are properly, as I think, made to it. I should like to still continue and vote for a proposition which should regulate this question; and whether others support such a proposition or not, when properly prepared and brought before the Senate, as we are now promised that it will be, it shall receive my vote and support.

Mr. WILSON. I voted yesterday with great reluctance for the reconsideration of this measure, because I did not desire to separate from gentlemen in whose judgment I have great confidence. My own judgment is that it is unwise to press this measure upon this bill at this time. I do not deem it wise to press it for this reason: the member of the Finance Committee who has the care of this bill [Mr. SHERMAN] is opposed to it. That gentleman we all recognize here as one of our true and reliable friends. The Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, objects to putting it upon this measure. Other Senators, true and tried men, in whom we have confidence, make this objection. It did not seem to me wise to press this measure upon this bill with a divided vote among our friends, so I voted for reconsideration. I will go as far as any member of the Senate in the proper legislation to correct a great abuse; but we have time enough to mature and act upon such a bill, and if we pass such a bill, and it fails to become a law, there will be other bills upon which this same proposition may be moved, and upon which the Senate may put it with at least as much propriety as upon this bill. I believe that it is necessary that some action should be had by the Congress for the protection of our friends throughout the United States, and yet I do not entertain any great apprehensions in regard to the political influence of the appointments which are made and which are threatened to be made.

A person going into an office, recognized as a man of capacity and character, representing the sentiments of the community in which he lives, of those who have come into power, will exercise a certain degree of influence; but the putting in of a man against the sentiments of the men who made this Administration, a man who wears simply the collar of the Executive and violates his faith, will have no other influence than to excite the scorn, contempt, and indignation of the people. I tell Senators, and I tell the President, that the American people are in no condition to be bought or sold by Government patronage, and I believe the use of it for any such purpose will weaken whoever undertakes to use it, whether in the executive branch of the Government or in these Halls. I believe that ninety-nine out of every hundred of the men who put this Administration in power agree in principle and in policy, and I believe that any attempt to use the offices of this Government to control the elections against them will signally and ignominiously fail.

I am, therefore, in favor of going just as far as we can go in maturing and passing a proper measure to correct abuses, and to protect the men who are filling the public offices against the attempt, whether it come from men in this Chamber or out of it, to remove faithful officers who adhere to their opinions, and appoint such men as the postmaster at Hartford, whom we have confirmed this year, and who has turned his back upon us—a man who was lingering around here last year with $40,000 of money in his pocket to influence and control Congress.

I think we have time enough, as was said by the Senator from Maine this morning, to prepare such a bill and act upon it; and if we fail in that we shall still have time enough to take up the measure now proposed or some other measure of a similar character, and put it upon some other appropriation bill. We can do that toward the close of the session; we can do it after we have done what was suggested yesterday by the Senator from Nevada, after we have developed a plan that we approve and that will be conducive to the interests of the country.

For this reason I do not think there is any haste in this matter or any occasion for pressing this amendment now; and I am very much surprised at the earnestness with which it is pressed. I think it of far more importance that whatever measure we agree upon shall receive the careful and deliberate judgment of our friends, and that they shall act together, rather than that we shall press this amendment by a divided vote, with some of the ablest and most trusted members of the Senate opposed to putting it upon this bill.

It is said that if this bill does not become law because of the putting of this amendment upon it, somebody else will be held responsible for its failure. I do not agree to that doctrine. If we pass a bill and it does not become a law, the country will judge upon its merits as between us and any other branch of the Government. If we put it upon an appropriation bill, and the appropriation bill fails, the people will judge not of the proposition itself, but of the propriety of putting it upon an appropriation bill. That is my judgment on this bill; and so feeling, though it is with a great deal of reluctance that I differ from friends in whom I have the greatest confidence, and whose wishes I always like to comply with if possible, I shall vote against putting this amendment upon the bill now pending.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I am not a little surprised at the character of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] I will endeavor to notice his objections to this amendment, each of them, but his main one I will notice a little more at length. His first objection, as I understood him, was that the member of the Finance Committee having charge of this bill [Mr. SHERMAN] objected to this amendment, and therefore he was not inclined to put it upon this bill. The Senator from Massachusetts knows that the member of the Finance Committee having charge of an appropriation bill objects to any amendments proposed to be put upon it always. He considers it his duty, having charge of the bill, to object to extraneous matter being put on it; but I think there is no member of the Senate who has oftener put such measures upon such bills than the Senator from Massachusetts himself.

Mr. WILSON. My amendments were always right. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. Of course they were excellent amendments when the Senator from Massachusetts offered them; he never offers any other. [Laughter.] There is no doubt of that. In that respect I am not equally fortunate. I am aware that the chairman of the committee, whether it be the Senator from Maine or the Senator from Ohio who has charge of an appropriation bill, is always averse to amendments, and the moment he sees any member of the Senate rise with a view of offering an amendment, no matter what it is, he is generally against it. I say generally; I believe it is almost universally true; and I do not know anybody, unless it is the good-natured Senator from Massachusetts, that can ever get an amendment so perfectly right that they will agree to it.

But, sir, the Senator tells us that he is opposed to putting on this measure here by a divided vote among his friends. That is the extraordinary part of the Senator's speech. Sir, I am reminded of the jurymen who had been shut up with "eleven obstinate men." "Divided friends!" Who divides them? How is this amendment defeated? Has the Senator from Massachusetts looked around the Senate and seen who is voting with him? He prefers to go with his enemies rather than his friends, does he? What chance was there to carry the proposition of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] here except by Democratic allies? What chance to reconsider this proposition by your friends?

"Call you that backing your friends," to unite with your enemies to beat them, and then come into the Senate here and boast that you are opposed to dividing your friends? It is a curious way indeed of backing one's friends, to unite with the enemy. Does not the Senator know that three fourths of the "friends" that he acts with are in favor of this measure? And he talks about "dividing" them. He is the twelfth jurymen, and the other eleven divide from him, and he is opposed to having any divided jury! Why do not the eleven men come and act with him? The Senator from Massachusetts asks, I think eighteen Senators, all his friends, to go to him and a few others who are voting with the Opposition in this body—

Mr. WILSON. Ten others.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Himself and ten others voting with the Opposition in this body. One third vote against two thirds of his friends, and then he complains of a division of his friends, and he divides off and goes with the enemy in a political point of view. Sir, that is the most extraordinary argument that I have ever heard in the Senate, and is only to be illustrated, as I have said, by the eleven obstinate jurors who would not agree with the twelfth man.

He is for a general bill. How many of your allies that are voting down this proposition will vote for a general bill? How do you expect to carry your general bill? Here are eighteen of your friends who are for this measure. Do you expect to carry your general bill without them? How many votes do you get for it? Ten. The Senator tells me ten. He will not find the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Delaware voting with him for his general bill. When he brings that in, he will find that he cannot carry it, that his allies will not stand by him.

Sir, I am making these remarks not by way of imputing anything to Senators who differ with me in reference to this measure. They doubtless think it is not best to put it on here; but I am making these remarks in reply to the charge that we are dividing our friends. The Senator from Massachusetts has brought it here and charges upon me and those with whom I act, two thirds of our friends, that we are dividing them, and it is in reply to that that I say the responsibility is on his own head, that he has deserted his friends in this respect when he deserts a majority of them and goes with his enemies; and I tell him that his general bill stands no chance at all to be carried by the forces with whom he is now acting.

Mr. POLAND. We expect you to vote for it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Vermont quietly says that he expects me to vote for that. By what right? Why do you expect me to vote with ten of you? Why expect the eleven jurymen to go over to the one man?

Mr. POLAND. Because it is right.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Because it is right! Well, that is the same reason that the Senator from Massachusetts gave a moment ago, that when he offered an amendment to an appropriation bill it was always right. The Senator from Vermont says it is right. The Senator from Vermont on one side of me, and the Senator from Massachusetts on the other, two righteous men, never make a mistake, and they expect everybody to go with them. Sir, I think they should have some allowance for their brother Senators and suppose that it is very possible that they may be right, that it is barely possible that a majority of their friends may be right and they may be wrong, that it is barely possible that they ought not to be so very strong in their convictions that they know what is right and exactly how it ought to be done.

Now, sir, I am not disposed to go over the grounds of this measure again. As it now stands before the Senate, it is simply a proposition not to pay men put in office, as I think every Senator on the floor will admit, in violation of the Constitution; for if the Constitution means anything, it means that the President can only fill up offices in case of vacancies which happened during the recess of the Senate; and if the vacancy has not happened during the recess of the Senate he has no authority under the Constitution to fill it. In reference to the power of removal and appointment to offices, which are one act, the incumbent holding until his successor is appointed and qualified, there no vacancy exists. That was the opinion of Mr. Hamilton. That was not the case of the happening of a vacancy, because, as I said when up before, the vacancy is contingent on the appointment and qualification of the successor, and there is no point of time when the office is vacant; and if the successor fails to qualify after he is appointed, the incumbent holds on except in cases where the officer is suspended and the office is put in charge of a special officer of some of the Departments.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to ask him a question right on that point? I will put this case: suppose that in vacation the collector of customs in the city of New York is found by the President to be actually squandering the public moneys, can the President remove him from the office?

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is a question not involved in this matter at all. This has nothing to do with it. The proposition before the Senate has nothing to do with such a case. It is contended that the power has been exercised by the President as a general thing, in vacation, of removing a man and putting another in his place.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question is whether the President cannot remove a man and create a vacancy. Suppose he finds a collector of customs stealing the money, can he not put him out of office? Must he allow him to stay in office until some other man is appointed and confirmed by the Senate to take his place?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not aware of his ever dismissing a man under such circumstances.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like the Senator to answer the question whether he believes the President has power to do that or not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator wishes to ask me a question not involved in this matter at all. I am not on the question of removals; I have not argued to any extent the question of removals from office.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood the Senator from Illinois to say that it was impossible that there could be a vacancy created by the President in making a removal; that when a man was in office, the only way to put him out was to push him out by pushing another man into the office. That I understood to be his argument.

Mr. TRUMBULL. My understanding is that the President never did remove a man except by pushing another in his place. There are cases where he has put a special officer in charge of an office for the time being. There are grades in all these offices; the Postmaster General has special agents authorized by law to travel all over the United States and authorized under certain circumstances to take possession of the mails and take possession of a post office. That is done sometimes; but if the President ever dismissed an officer except in pursuance of a law that was passed authorizing it to be done, as is the case in some instances in the military service—if he ever undertook to dismiss an officer and to leave the office vacant without designating somebody temporarily, ad interim, to take charge of it, I am not aware of it. It has happened here with Cabinet ministers that sometimes a person has been designated to perform the duties ad interim of a Cabinet minister; but I have yet to learn of an instance where an officer has been removed and nobody put in charge. It seems to me such a case never would occur; or if it did occur it would be, as is suggested to me, safe to submit the matter to the consideration of the Senate whether we would not give compensation.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I do not know whether I understand him correctly. Does he contend that appointing a person to an office without in form removing the incumbent, that adopting the usual course of putting one out and putting the other in, is not appointing a man to fill a vacancy?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand the Senator's question, and I say it is not appointing a man to fill a vacancy; there is no vacancy in that case. It has occurred here within two weeks, it is a matter now of public notoriety, that there was a person nominated to the Senate as collector of internal revenue in the district of St. Louis in place of another man removed. That is the way the communication to the Senate reads. The Senate rejected the nominee. Now, is not the previous incumbent there? Has he been removed? If we had confirmed the nominee, would it have been a confirmation to the vacancy? It would have been a confirmation to take the place of the man removed, and there never would be an instant of time when there would have been a vacancy.

Mr. STEWART. But must there not be a vacancy necessarily before he can enter upon the office? Does the Senator contend that both can be in office at the same time, and that there is not necessarily a vacancy happening at some time, and that the appointment is not for the purpose of putting a man in that vacancy whenever it does occur? No matter how short a time there is, one must go out and the other come in. They cannot both be in the office at the same time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose the Senator from Nevada wants to demonstrate the mathematical proposition that two bodies cannot be in the same place at the same time. I suppose it is possible for the Senator from Nevada to go out of his seat and somebody else to come into it, and that there never is an instant of time when the office is vacant, no more than there is a time when the office of the President of the United States is vacant. It is not a vacancy. That is not the vacancy contemplated by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will ask the Senator one question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am willing to be cateched.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In vacation cannot an officer resign his office and his resignation be accepted, and will there not then be a vacancy?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Have I not been arguing for an hour that that was the very vacancy which the Constitution authorized to be filled, that that was a vacancy, and that such cases were the only cases of vacancy, and that a removal is not the vacancy contemplated by the Constitution. When the Senator from Wisconsin, after I have repeated over the words of the Constitution, and argued to show as well as I could that the vacancy which the President was authorized to fill up by a commission was a vacancy occasioned by a resignation, death, or otherwise, as is provided here in the amendment, rises, and with a look of wisdom asks me if I do not admit that when a man dies there is a vacancy, [laughter,] and then wants to ask some other question, why, sir, it is trifling.

Mr. DOOLITTLE rose.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall be through in a moment. I will not yield any further. I decline to yield any further to that class of questions. [Laughter.]

I have said, sir, I believe, all that I designed to say in rising, which was chiefly to reply to the extraordinary speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, who charged upon those of us supporting this measure an attempt to divide the party; and having replied to that I am willing to yield the floor to him or the Senator from Wisconsin or anybody else that wants it.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I followed the Senator from Illinois and voted for his measure. I saw, on looking around the Senate, that some of our ablest and most trusted Senators felt it to be their duty to vote against it. I did not then believe, I do not now believe, that any principle is involved in putting upon this bill this measure. I thought the Congress of the United States would be in session for sixty or seventy days to come; that we should have abundant time to mature carefully and act upon a proper measure, one not sprung upon us here in the Senate as an amendment to another measure, one not dragged in here by a few of our friends, without consultation with others, but a measure brought into the Senate by a committee, carefully framed and taken up and examined, and deliberately acted upon.

It is well known that this question of executive power has been discussed in Congress on several occasions by the most eminent men of our country. The power of the President to remove was carried in the Senate, originally, by the casting vote of Vice President Adams; and a majority of the men in the Senate at that time, who had been members of the Convention that framed the Constitution, voted against this power of the President. This same question of executive power came up on other occasions, especially in the debate on Foot's resolution, when it was discussed with great ability by Robbins, of Rhode Island, Clayton, of Delaware, Barton, of Missouri, and other Senators, in perhaps the ablest debate the Senate of the United States ever knew. In 1835, on Mr. Calhoun's report on executive power and influence, the question was again elaborately debated. It is a question on which the most eminent minds of the country have divided. Mr. Hamilton said that—

"The terms 'which may have happened,' imply casualty, and denote such as, having been once filled, have become vacant by accidental circumstances."

Daniel Webster thought as Hamilton thought, and Chancellor Kent thought as Hamilton thought. Mr. Webster said here in the Senate:

"I must still express my conviction that the decision of Congress in 1789, which separated the power of removal from the power of appointment, was founded on an erroneous construction of the Constitution."

"I have the clearest conviction that they [the Convention] looked to no other mode of displacing an officer than by impeachment or by the regular appointment of another person to the same place."

"I believe it to be within the just power of Congress to reverse the decision of 1789, and I mean to hold myself at liberty to act hereafter upon that question as I shall think the safety of the Government and of the Constitution may require."

Sir, I did not call the Senator from Illinois to account and charge him with dividing our friends; I made no charges whatever. I uttered a few modest words in explanation of my own action, and the Senator assumes that I charged him with an attempt to divide our friends in the Senate. I expressed my regret to see this amendment pressed upon us when some of the most eminent men of the Senate were opposed to putting it upon this bill, and expressed their readiness to vote for a bill carefully and properly prepared and brought in as an independent measure. Until we have tried that, why press this? If we adopt this as an amendment to the present bill by a bare majority, what will be its influence in the other House? I will say nothing about its influence in the executive department of the Government, for I do not think it is proper here to consider that question. What will be its influence among the people of the country? The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Poland] told us yesterday that the people were not anxious about executive power and patronage over them; they were more fearful of its influence over us; and I believe that he uttered a great truth when he made that declaration.

The Senator from Illinois chides me for acting with gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. Well, sir, it so happened, not long ago, that that Senator was found acting with gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, and for one I did not reproach him with so acting.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But I did not accuse anybody of desiring to divide our friends.

Mr. WILSON. I have not accused the Senator of a desire to divide the party. I merely referred to the fact that there was a division of opinion in regard to the propriety of putting this amendment on this bill—not a division in regard to the amendment itself, but as to the policy of putting it upon this bill. That is a matter of policy and not of principle. Others of our friends divided upon the resolution which, it will be remembered, was passed by the House of Representatives early in the session, proposing to amend the Constitution in regard to the basis of representation. I then regarded and every day of my life since I have regarded that division, resulting in the defeat of the resolution, as a deplorable calamity. Nineteen Union State Legislatures were then in session, and if it had been adopted they would at once have ratified it; and then, according to the theory held by eminent Senators and Representatives, it would to-day be a part of the Constitution of the country. But now, whatever amendment we pass, other Legislatures must be elected to act upon it; and the peril of carrying all these elections everybody can see.

Sir, it seems to me that the Senator from Illinois has no right to rise here and reproach any of us who doubt the expediency of attaching this measure to this bill, and he has no right to charge us with dividing the party because a portion of us feel it to be our duty to object to that course. I will vote for a measure to correct this abuse as an independent measure; and if toward the close of the session such a measure shall fail, not through any fault of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, I will vote with the Senator from Illinois to place it upon any other bill upon which it can be placed, and let it take its chances and share its fate. But at this time I do not fear that anything is lost by keeping this amendment off this bill. The discussion will do good; it has called our attention to the subject; and I believe in the light of this debate a measure may be framed which shall bring together those of us who stood together in passing the most popular measure that was ever enacted by the Congress of the United States and one that has the deepest hold upon the heart and conscience of the country—the civil rights bill. I believe that we can pass such a measure in such a shape that it will receive, as it ought to receive, the confidence and support of the whole country. But, sir, I do not complain of the active Senator from Illinois; I know his pertinacity and his determination, and how he always clings to any proposition that he makes. I sometimes think it would be a great deal easier for him to carry through important measures by a little more of the spirit of deference to others and of conciliation.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the word "vacancy" I shall not discuss at length. I will state only two or three cases where, in my judgment, vacancies happen. If the officer dies there is of course a vacancy. If he should remove out of the country there would be a vacancy in the office. The Senator from Illinois would not doubt that. If he should resign there would be a vacancy, provided the resignation were accepted. The vacancy by resignation does not happen till the President or the head of a Department acting under him accepts the resignation; and the question I put to the Senator from Illinois about resignation requires an act of the President or the head of a Department under him to make the vacancy. The President takes part in making the vacancy; the man cannot make it alone by mere resignation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does the Senator mean to say that a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States cannot resign without the consent of the President?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. A judge of the Supreme Court of the United States is not an officer under the President.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Nor is any officer an officer under the President; he is an officer of the Government.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Executive officers are under the President, and responsible to the President in the execution of the law. The President is responsible for the execution of the laws and responsible that every executive officer under him shall execute the laws. He is sworn to see that they do execute the laws; he is the chief of the executive power, upon whom the responsibility, by the Constitution, is placed, and therefore these officers are responsible to him.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois, with all his ingenuity to get around the question, did not answer the question I put to him. Suppose that the collector of customs in the city of New York, immediately after the adjournment of Congress, or at any time during the vacation, is found to be embezzling the public money, is it true, as the Senator maintains, that the President cannot create a vacancy, but that he is still in office and must remain in office until his successor is appointed and confirmed by the Senate? The proposition is monstrous. Put another case. Suppose he should become insane; suppose that the insanity of the late collector of the city of New York, our esteemed friend, who, in a fit of insanity, threw himself into the Hudson river, had shown itself during the vacation, would it not be possible that the President of the United States should remove him from the office and make a vacancy? The Senator contends that the President cannot make a vacancy in an office as long as the man is living and does not resign or leave the country, without thrusting another man in to push him out of office. That is a great fallacy.

The truth is, the power exists, and the Supreme Court have so decided, and such has been the practice of the Government for seventy years; and I think that all who have preceded us, although there was some difference of opinion at the time, are entitled to some consideration, and the practice of the Government for sixty or seventy years is entitled to some consideration. The practice has been, that while the President could make a removal, he could not fill an office without the consent of the Senate, except in the vacation; he could not do it while the Senate was in session, so that the officer would not be entitled to take possession of the office or commence acting; but during the vacation, and until the Senate does meet, he has that power.

I do not mean to go into any argument of this matter at length; I will simply state another fact. My friend from Massachusetts, it seems to me, and some other gentlemen appear to assume that there is a great abuse of executive patronage. What do they mean? Do they refer to an abuse of executive power by the present Executive? There is no just ground for any such complaint. I say to the Senator from Massachusetts, and he knows it well—it is a matter spoken of in the papers—that it is understood that even in his own Cabinet the President tolerates differences of opinion; that men are in the Cabinet, one or more, who sympathize with the Senator from Massachusetts in his peculiar views on reconstruction, and the President does not even remove a member of his Cabinet for opinion's sake.

It is true Congress has passed resolutions from time to time that to the returned and disabled soldiers who have served in the war for the Union, other things being equal, the public offices should be given. The Senator from Massachusetts has advocated that. Our State Legislatures have resolved to do the same thing. Our own party Union conventions throughout the country resolved to do it. Occasionally perhaps the President may have removed an incumbent for the purpose of placing, in accordance with the spirit of the times and the demands both of the resolutions of Congress and of the various Legislatures, a soldier of this description in his place. There may be other cases, and they are exceedingly rare—Senators can point out but very few—where persons have been removed not for opinion's sake, but sometimes for that personal invective and abuse upon the Administration which no Administration can tolerate with any respect for itself. I can assure the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that from all that I have seen, my judgment has come to the conclusion that there never has been a more tolerant chief executive magistrate within my recollection than the one who is now occupying the presidential chair.

Mr. HOWE. Will my colleague allow me to call his attention to a paragraph in the papers?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not read the newspapers much, and I pay very little attention to what the newspapers say. Lately, sir, and for the last five or six months in relation to the course which has been pursued by me, I have been the subject of so much misrepresentation and abuse that I cease to have very much respect for the newspapers in these times.

Mr. HOWE. I supposed this was a clause which my colleague had overlooked; it has not reference to his own course at all, but to the point which he is just now discussing. I would like to call his attention to it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I shall be through in a few moments, and if my colleague wishes then to read from newspapers, I shall not object.

Mr. HOWE. I shall not insist.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was simply saying, Mr. President, that I believe the Senator from Massachusetts is taking counsel of his fears, and not of his judgment; and I believe another thing, that this unexampled proposition, never heard of before in the seventy-seven years of the existence of the Government, is not such a proposition as the Senate ought to entertain.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Wisconsin asks me if I referred to the present Executive in what I said of executive removals and abuses. I answer frankly that I did.

Sir, I wish simply to say this: during the last summer and autumn we were assured that the President was making an experiment in organizing the rebellious States; we were told that if it did not succeed, the remedy was in the hands of Congress. We were told, also, that differences of opinion among friends in regard to these modes of reconstruction were to be freely tolerated. The President went on in the course he had marked out for himself. The rebel States were reorganized; and every one of those States reorganized since the 4th of March, 1865, is to-day as completely in the hands of the rebels as it was the day Jeff. Davis was captured. Nearly every one of these States has elected rebels to Congress, three loyal men in Virginia to the House, none from North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, one in Mississippi; none yet elected in Texas, where the election is yet to come; Hamilton is fighting for principle and for the cause, but he is to be overborne by the influence and power of traitors. I fear he receives no aid from this Administration.

This was the condition of the country when Congress met. Congress, as in duty bound, cast about to see what was to be done, to see that these States should come in here, as I have once before said, loyal end foremost, and not rebel end foremost. The advocates of bringing these States into the Government of the country, rebel end foremost, through the public press and in other ways, have been calling on the President for the last four months to strike down the men who elected him and to reward men who would desert the principles, the ideas, the policy, and the measures of those who put this Administration in power. Faithful, true, tried, and honest men have been removed from office to make way for men who had no claims upon office and who have simply shouted hosannas to the President for the purpose of obtaining patronage and power. Was not a soldier removed in Philadelphia and a man who had not the public confidence of our friends there appointed in his place?

Mr. FESSENDEN. His name.

Mr. WILSON. Sloanaker. Are there not other cases? Here is a man appointed marshal in western Pennsylvania who was tried by court-martial, convicted, and dismissed the service, and I am told he would have gone to prison if it had not been for the influence of friends.

Mr. COWAN. Who were the "friends?"

Mr. WILSON. I know that there are men in this Capitol to-day who for the last three or four months have been urging and pressing the Executive to use the corrupt and corrupting influences of public patronage for the purpose of building up and constructing an independent party—a party that has died before it was born; and I know that there are men in this city—I mean the Blairs—who have been on voyages of discovery, hunting up and picking out a public man here and there, and offering them the kingdoms of this world if they would betray us.

I know that these things are so, and I know that a committee of this new party was got up, five of the members of which, I believe, have already declined because they do not belong to the concern and were captured without their consent. Its object was to organize a party to be built up by public patronage. Sir, you remember Scovel, of New Jersey; some of us remember him, how he came down here and blustered about, and declared that he was going to elect a Senator from New Jersey against the President's policy. Now, what would you think of a letter written by a public officer to another public officer in New Jersey saying, "The Secretary of the Treasury directs me by the order of the President to say to you that you must remove a certain man in your employment, and in filling his place consult Mr. Scovel?" It is well known and understood that Mr. Scovel struts over New Jersey claiming to control the public patronage in that State, and we have nominations before the Senate now of his dictation.

When a public officer dies or resigns, or his term of office expires, and the President of the United States in casting about among the men who elected him selects to fill that place a man he thinks agrees more nearly with him than with Congress, I make no complaint. I object to his raising this issue among ourselves, and I object to our raising it, and I do not raise it upon him. But when a competent, faithful, and honest public officer is discharged for no other reason than that he believes in the principles, the policy, the aims, and the purposes of the party of Union and liberty, the party that saved this country and made it a free country, when such a man is struck down to reward another man for mere partisan purposes or to get up a little rebellion against this great organization that to-day holds twenty-three of the twenty-five loyal States, I for one object to it. I object to it as an attempt to use the vast patronage and power of the Government of the United States for the purpose of corrupting a pure and true people, a people that have given nearly three million soldiers and $3,000,000,000 to their country to carry it through the late rebellion.

I will say to-day what I believe to be true, and in saying it I make no assault upon the President of the United States. I say that I believe the policy the President has felt it his duty to pursue, which he has pursued, and which he seems to insist on pursuing, without consulting the views of Congress, this uncertainty, this doubt, this veto of the civil rights bill, has made more sorrowful men and women in this country than were ever made by any other man that has trod the continent. Sir, the men that elected this Administration were actuated by the loftiest motives that ever influenced any people. They gave their children, they voted their money, they gave their prayers in November, 1864, for the reelection of Mr. Lincoln and the putting down of the rebellion, and the unity of the country, and the liberty of every man within the bounds of the Republic. They were God-fearing men and women, too, who had given the years of their life to aspiration, to thought, to prayer, to action for the freedom of all, and for the elevation of the humblest men within the bounds of the country. When they have seen this hesitation, when they have witnessed what we have witnessed during the last twelve months, when they have realized the great loss of the opportunity, in the early summer, last year, to give impartial suffrage and amnesty to the freedmen, and to the men who have been fighting against their country, when they have witnessed all these things their hearts have been wrung with a great sorrow not surpassed by the sorrow of the four bloody years of war in which three hundred thousand of their sons and brothers gave their lives to their country. The President of the United States—I do not mean to say that he purposed or intended it, for I do not believe he could be so ungrateful to the noble men that elected him—I believe, upon my conscience, has made more anxious nights, more troubled days, more bitter thoughts, more agony and sorrow of honest, conscientious, God-fearing men and women of our country than were ever made by any other man that ever lived. Upon my conscience I say that I believe Mr. Johnson has made more thoughtful men and women bow their heads in anxiety and sorrow during the past year than did the rebel chiefs during their four years of fire and blood.

Mr. HOWE. I listened to a declaration of my colleague just now that interested me very deeply and rejoiced me considerably. I hope it will turn out to be entirely correct. I understood him to say that the President of the United States is peculiarly tolerant of political opposition; that in point of fact we never have had a President more tolerant than he; that he tolerates opposition even in the members of his own Cabinet, and that he makes no removal from office for opinion's sake. Now, Mr. President, if this turns out to be so, I shall be very glad, I shall be exceeding glad, for I am bound to say that of all the Presidents we have ever had in office, I think there is no one of them under such heavy obligation to be tolerant of opinions opposed to his own as the present President.

Sir, the relations between the present President of the United States and the party which made him President are of a very peculiar character. That party, you must remember, sir, is made up in the main of a body of men against whom the President had been at war all his life until the great body of those men with whom he had acted all his life turned their backs upon the Government and became traitors to it; and when that happened, the President of the United States declined to go with them any longer, stood by the flag as he had always stood, remained true when thousands about him were false. That was the single fact which commended him to the confidence of that party which made him Vice President of the United States. I say he was commended to their judgments and to their confidence by the simple fact that he did not prove a traitor when thousands about him did. For that act of simple fidelity, that is what it is, simply fidelity to his duty as a citizen, we were grateful, profoundly grateful; and having proved in the very morning of the struggle that he was disposed to stand by the old flag and to uphold the authority of the nation, we were led to believe that he would stand there and thus to the end of the struggle; and so in its very morning we clothed him with the authority and with the emoluments of a brigadier general in the Army, and we sent him to Nashville to assist in defending one of the strategic points in the great controversy that was going on. The President of the United States alludes to that, I see, occasionally as an act which placed him at a point of imminent peril. Ay, Mr. President, Nashville was a point of imminent peril; in that day there was no point in the United States which was not a point of imminent peril; but when we sent the present President to Nashville we sent security with him; we planted our armies between him and the enemy, a wall of adamant, and gave to Nashville the same security we gave to Washington and to every other point within the national lines. It was a place of peril because widespread defection and treason had covered the country with peril. That was all. But it was not peculiarly perilous. We made that—not we who fill these seats, but this nation made Nashville as secure as any point. He staid there; he did his duty; and grateful for that duty done, we said to him because he had been faithful over a few things we would make him ruler over many, and we did make him the Vice President of the United States, commended to us as I said before by the single fact that he had been loyal in the beginning of the struggle, and he had been faithful to the one trust we had imposed in him as a general in the Army.

It happened that when he had been made by our votes Vice President a terrible disaster overtook the country and he became the President; and it happened that soon after he became the President of the United States the fact was developed that there was a difference of opinion upon some points of policy between the President and the great body of that party which had been instrumental in making him President, upon questions which we thought, and which we think, and which I for one know, are vital and fundamental, if there are any vital and fundamental questions in American politics. We found that he was in harmony with those who had opposed his election, and at variance with those who had given him his election. I am not here to discuss the right or the wrong of that difference, for this is not the occasion; I have spoken upon it once and others have spoken upon it freely. I am not here to arraign the sincerity of these opinions of the President; this is not the occasion for that, if that sincerity is open to attack at all, which I do not say. But conceding him to be sincere in his convictions of duty, this is the thing, I say: that the President was bound to concede sincerity to those who differed with him, for they had shown that they were disposed to have no personal controversy with him; they had shown that they were grateful for every political merit he had discovered, and I think they had shown as much magnanimity as ever was exhibited in the conduct of one party toward one who had been a leading and a life-long opponent of theirs. He was bound, I say, to concede sincerity to his opponents. I do not say that the President was bound to surrender his own convictions of duty because the party which made him President took another view; but I do say he, of all the Presidents who ever lived, was bound to be tolerant of this difference that existed and was developed in the body of the party which made him President. That is why I say that he of all men that have ever been put in the presidential office was bound to exercise that very toleration which my colleague tells us now he is going to exercise and is exercising.

But, sir, as to the fact whether he has exercised that spirit of toleration or not, as to whether he will exercise it hereafter, I have an event or two to refer to. My colleague says that he has made a few removals, not for opinion's sake, but to reward gallantry and fidelity exhibited in the soldiers of our Army. I am told—my colleague knows whether my information is correct—that among the removals which he has been asked to make is one of a gentleman who has for several years filled the office of sub-Indian agent for the Indians in the northeastern part of Wisconsin. I am told that he has been asked to remove him from that office, and to place in it a gentleman who has been connected with the Army it is true, because he has filled since 1861 or 1862 the office of paymaster in the Army, paying troops at different points—the city of Washington being one, the city of Madison, in our own State, being another, and, I believe, the city of St. Louis, being the third—a faithful officer, no doubt, but I take it not coming within the description of those officers to which our resolutions and our laws referred when they called for discrimination in their favor in the distribution of patronage. But, sir, I am told further that the Representative from the district in which this office is located, recognizing the propriety of discriminating in favor of soldiers, did think that this paymaster, or ex-paymaster, was not the most deserving soldier, and suggested that instead of his being appointed in place of that agent whose removal was decided upon, one General Swett should be appointed, who had been in the Army and had been in the line and on the field, had been shot, not to pieces, but had been crippled for life, had displayed great gallantry, had been placed in command of Camp Douglas, near Chicago, and in the discharge of his duty as such commandant, by his energy and by his activity, had really saved the city of Chicago from that conspiracy which was developed there in 1864. I am told that it was proposed by the Representative of that district that this individual should be the recipient of this office instead of the ex-paymaster, and I am told that that proposition is absolutely and peremptorily declined, and that my colleague declines it; and I am told that he has obtained from the President—I recite this as rumor; I do not vouch for the truth of any of these statements; I speak of them here because here they can be contradicted—a peremptory order on the Secretary of the Interior that the former agent be removed and that the ex-paymaster be appointed.

Now, if that is so I am afraid, whatever may be the motive of the President, it will be understood as being intended to favor political opinion and not military service. I fear that the more because I have been told that this ex-paymaster was a member of the convention in our State last fall and presided over the deliberations of that body, to whose action my colleague has referred several times here as having had very important influence upon the action of the State and upon his action here. That fact being known in Wisconsin, if it be true that the President peremptorily orders his appointment instead of the appointment of this wounded and crippled soldier, I am afraid it will be understood as a removal for opinion's sake, or if not a removal for opinion's sake, an appointment for opinion's sake. That is one fact which leads me to fear that there is great danger, in spite of what my colleague says, that this power of removal, if conceded to the President, will be exercised for political and partisan purposes.

There is another fact to which I wish to call the attention of my colleague. I have my eye upon it now, and I will read it. I read it from a newspaper, it is true, and perhaps as such it is not entitled to any consequence.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What is the paper?

Mr. HOWE. It is the Wisconsin Union, which is published at Madison. My colleague is familiar with the paper, no doubt. Understand that it is a paper which supports the President's policy very vigorously. It copies from the Journal the following. I read as it appears in the Union:

"Mr. Rublee, of the Journal, writing from Washington, gives the radical office-holders the following pleasing assurance: 'Mr. ELDRIDGE (the Representative of the fourth district) alleges that he and a number of others of his party were at the White House on yesterday evening, and that the President assured him that every Federal office-holder in Wisconsin who does not sustain the President's policy will be removed and those who sustain him put in their places.'"

This organ may be mistaken; Mr. ELDRIDGE may not have told the truth; but I really think Mr. ELDRIDGE would not have made such a statement unless the President had made it to him, and I rather think this organ of the President would not have published it if it had not believed it and approved it. I quoted, it will be remembered, the other day a declaration which I have not heard refuted yet, not from the President, but from one who certainly sustains the President most gallantly and most bravely, that no man should eat the President's bread and butter unless he did sustain the President's policy. There are papers lying on this table, if it were proper to allude to them, which have given me further cause to distrust the entire accuracy of the statement submitted by my colleague. I cannot refer to them in this connection.

I have thought it worth while to present these two or three items, for I really feel that my colleague may be mistaken; that the President will, if it is found that we agree to it, think it justifiable to insist upon making vacant all places filled by those who do not sustain his policy and to supply their places by those who do.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the other day, in my absence from my seat, my colleague thought proper to present to the Senate certain resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin that were not addressed to this body, upon which the body could take no action whatever; resolutions condemning me in the severest terms; resolutions instructing me to resign; and the grounds upon which they were placed were that I sustained the administration of President Johnson. Is that what my honorable colleague calls toleration of a difference of opinion? Does my colleague indorse those resolutions?

Mr. President, in regard to this great question of the relations the President bears to the party which elected him, my colleague falls into a very great mistake in supposing that the party which elected Mr. Johnson was the old Whig party. Not at all, sir. True, there were a great many persons who had been in the Whig party before it was dissolved that joined the Union party; but let me tell my colleague that in the organization of the Union party it was the Free-soil Democracy uniting with the elements of the dissolved Whig party that made up that Union party which won the victory.

From 1854 to the present hour there is not a single doctrine laid down in the platform of the Union party to which Mr. Johnson has in the slightest degree proved false since he became President of the United States. Sir, that party was organized in 1854, upon the dissolution of the Democratic party. The Democratic party dissolved on the repeal of the Missouri compromise and the attempt to enforce slavery in the Territory of Kansas. Then that portion of the Democratic party which was opposed to the extension of slavery, uniting with members of the Whig party entertaining the same sentiments, which party was already dissolved, formed this great organization denominated the Republican party of the United States; and, sir, the fundamental elements on which that party was organized in 1854 were the union of the States, opposition to the extension of the institution of slavery, and the preservation to each and every of the States of its supreme control over its own domestic institutions. In 1836 the sole issue was the extension of slavery; in 1860 it was the same issue.

Then after the success of Mr. Lincoln as the chief of the Republican party we entered upon another issue. What was it? A war to sustain the Union against the secession of the South. As the war progressed slavery was put at stake, slavery was thrown into the scale; and the question which in 1861 was, shall the Union be dissolved, shall the Government live or die, was changed in 1863 to the question whether slavery or the Union shall die. Sir, under the administration of Mr. Lincoln and the superintending providence of Almighty God, and next to that the patriotism of the American people which filled up our armies and filled our Treasury, we succeeded at last in winning the great victory, sustaining the Union, and crushing the institution of slavery. To crown that great victory we brought forward the constitutional amendment. My honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] has the honor of introducing it into this body. The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has the honor of conducting it during its discussion here. I, as a humble member of this body, took part in that debate. Though the measure was introduced by the Senator from Missouri, it was my good fortune, and I look back to it with pride, to make in this body the first speech that was made in favor of that amendment to the Constitution.

From that hour until during the present session, when we have succeeded in carrying this amendment and having it adopted by three fourths of all the States, I have looked forward with an eye single to the accomplishment of that great victory. I pressed it in this body and elsewhere; and when many of those gentlemen on this floor who now claim to be the special champions of freedom told me over and over again that we could neither carry the amendment through Congress nor carry it through the States, my faith never faltered for an instant. Here and elsewhere and everywhere, as both the Senators from Massachusetts well know, I insisted that we could carry the amendment in this body and carry it through the House of Representatives, and that we could carry it through the country and carry it through three fourths of the State Legislatures, and that the adoption of that amendment would be the crowning, final, crushing, eternal victory over the rebellion by removing forever the cause which had produced it. Sir, steady to that purpose, with a faith which in darkness has no fear and in danger feels no doubt, I pressed on and on, in spite of opposition here and elsewhere, until I have seen it accomplished.

Now, Mr. President, in relation to the question upon which we are at present divided, when did this division begin? What did it begin about? Last spring, one year ago, every member of the Senate on the Republican side but six—and I will name the men, and there shall be no mistake about it—was in favor of the resolution recognizing Louisiana.

Mr. COWAN. Name them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, in opposition to that proposition stood the two Senators from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER and Mr. HOWARD.] There was the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] The other Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] was in its favor. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BROWN] was opposed to it, and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE.] Yes, sir, upon this question, the very question and the only question upon which there is a division between the President and gentlemen now who claim that Congress is in opposition to him—

Mr. GRIMES. You do not mean the whole Senate?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The whole Senate on this side that night, with the exceptions I have named.

Mr. President, Mr. Lincoln, two years before Mr. Johnson was elected Vice President, entered upon this same policy. Mr. Johnson was appointed to carry out this same policy substantially in Tennessee. I mean it was the same on the two questions and the only two questions upon which there has been serious division—the question whether suffrage should be extended to the colored people of the South as a condition precedent to these States coming back into the Union, and the other question—

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment? I wish to ask him if I am to understand him to maintain that the Senators to whom he has alluded, and whom he has named, were the only persons opposed to the resolution for the admission of Louisiana last year?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On the night that question was up there were eighteen of our friends who were for it.

Mr. MORRILL. How does the Senator ascertain that fact?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Because I was present. Perhaps the Senator from Maine was not in the Senate that evening.

Mr. MORRILL. I was in the Senate, and I participated in the opposition to the resolution that night.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The only two material points upon which the struggle was made were, first, whether suffrage should be extended to the colored people of the South as a condition precedent to those States being recognized and their representatives admitted; and secondly, whether those States were not subjugated provinces, and no longer States in the Union; and upon both these questions Mr. Lincoln's policy was precisely that of Mr. Johnson. Now, we have had a great division here for six months, it is said, and when you come to your final report of the reconstruction committee upon these two points on which the controversy began, you find that they have abandoned both.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir, I will not yield at present. I am arguing this point, and I propose to call the attention of the Senate to it. I say that in the report of the reconstruction committee they abandon universal or "impartial" negro suffrage as a condition precedent to the recognition of these States and the admission of their representatives, and I say they have abandoned the other proposition that they are not States—that they are conquered or subjugated provinces. They admit them to be States, organized States, and propose to submit to their Legislatures the question upon the ratification of amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. President, my friend from Massachusetts says that ninety-nine out of every hundred of the Union party that elected Mr. Johnson are against him on these questions. He will find himself utterly mistaken. I can very well conceive that Mr. Johnson in relation to his friends now is very much like the position of Mr. Lincoln to the Union party after he was nominated at Baltimore, and before the Opposition had presented their platform at Chicago and nominated their candidate.

From the time of Mr. Lincoln's nomination there was a wonderful opposition raised in the ranks of the Union or Republican party. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] came out with his protest. It was rumored all over the country that Mr. Lincoln was about to resign or withdraw as a candidate and give place to somebody else, and it was more than whispered, too, by leading men on this floor connected with the Republican party, that if a Democrat should be nominated at Chicago who was in favor of a prosecution of the war, they would abandon Mr. Lincoln and give their adhesion to the Democratic candidate. But, sir, when the platform of the Opposition came to be presented, when the people came to look at the platform laid down at Chicago, Mr. Lincoln was elected from that hour; the tide set instantly in his favor, and nothing could resist it. And I say to gentlemen now that you will find that instead of its being true as you say that ninety-nine in every hundred of the Republican party are opposed to Mr. Johnson, before the next fall elections are over a majority of that party will be with him, and very likely you among them. Sir, I have seen since I have been here in this body and a member of the Union party, almost unanimous opposition in the Union party to Mr. Lincoln as I see now here against Mr. Johnson, and I have seen them come in, and I expect to see them come in again.

Mr. President, when gentlemen talk about ruling Mr. Johnson and me out of the Union party, or crowding us off the Union platform on which he was elected and on which I helped to elect him, they know but little of Mr. Johnson or of me. I do not yield the platform on which I stand, whoever may abandon it. I do not yield it whoever may come upon it. Parties in opposition to principle are to me nothing more nor less than mere means to an end. When you ask me or undertake to drive me to abandon the ground on which we have elected our Administration, I will be no more bound by your party ties than is flax when it is touched with fire. But, sir, when you argue with me a principle you will find me there every time. Though professed Republicans may abandon the platform, and though professed Democrats may abandon their party and come on to my platform, I will not abandon it.

Now, Mr. President, let us look at this matter a little as reasonable men. We organized in this great campaign. We fought the battle through. We vanquished all opposition. We captured the rebellion, and with it we captured the Democratic party also. They surrendered unconditionally to our Administration, to our principles, to our platform, and pledged themselves to its support, both North and South. These are the facts. Now what would a wise general do? What shall we do with this great victory? Shall we be afraid of it and run away, or shall we stand fast by our principles and the position we have taken, and master the situation ourselves? That is the question. I know that the Democratic party as such, being completely vanquished with our success in the capture of the rebellion, have come forward and admit that our ground is the right ground. Do they say now that the war is a failure? Not at all. They declare that it is a glorious success. Do they now say that they are in favor of the institution of slavery or extending it, or allowing it to be extended? Not at all. They are rejoicing that slavery is abolished. They come forward and avow in all their newspapers and in all their resolutions and in all their party creeds precisely what we avowed in the campaign of 1864. Is not that a victory? Will you run away from your own victory? Why could we not as men have stood up by the side of our President, whom we had chosen, who stood precisely on the ground on which we placed him, in whom there has been no variableness on this question, no shadow of turning, but moving right on? Why could we not have stood by him and reaped all this great victory, built up the Union party of the country, and held its administration for a quarter of a century?

Mr. President, the whole secret was told by the frank, open-hearted, manly Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] when he made his answer to the speech which I delivered in this body on the 17th of January. What did he say? He said that he agreed with Mr. Johnson in all he had done; he found no fault with what he had done; he had proceeded upon the policy of our party, upon the policy of Mr. Lincoln, and had improved upon the policy of Mr. Lincoln; and, said that Senator, in substance, the only thing which remains to be done to put the key-stone in the arch is universal, impartial negro suffrage in the South. With that the whole policy of Mr. Johnson would have been complete. That was the point of difference. It began at the beginning of this session with that, and with the resolution that my colleague brought in, that we must treat these States as Territories, that we must provide provisional governments for them as Territories. These two ideas were the ideas that began this war upon the President and upon his policy. The President had made no war upon anybody. He had made no war upon anybody's policy or position. He had simply in his first message, and every subsequent act of his has conformed to that, brought forward the true state of the case. He was the executor of Mr. Lincoln. Mr. Lincoln, in his last speech, from which I before read an extract in this body, about three days before his assassination urged upon the country this policy.

But, Mr. President, in relation to the power of appointment, I said to my colleague that within my recollection, now thirty years of political affairs, I have never known an Administration more tolerant of opposition than the Administration now in power. I believe it. If Mr. Johnson has erred at all, it has been in being too tolerant, not merely of opposition of opinion, but of opposition in the shape of the most vilifying, wicked, unfounded, libelous abuse which has been thrown upon him from one end of the country to the other by newspapers whose editors or proprietors were holding office under the Government. In relation to some of those matters, neither you nor I, if we had the responsibility of the executive department upon us, would tolerate that kind of personal abuse. It is unbecoming to allow it.

But, sir, in relation to Mr. Johnson, as I have said, he, like other men, may err; but for three years to come he is to be our President, the President of our choice, the President in whose hands, to a considerable extent, the destinies of this country are necessarily placed; and within the next three years to come we must settle all these great questions, and we must dispose of our pending relations with Mexico and with Great Britain. In what condition are we placed now, with these States all unrepresented, with the people growing more and more discontented—I mean the Union men of the South as well as those who have been in war against us—for the reason that for six long months here you have turned your back upon representatives as loyal as any man who sits upon this floor, some of whom have been wounded upon the battle-field while serving the cause of the country, and treated them precisely as you would treat the disloyal of the South. They become aggrieved; they become discontented and disappointed; their hearts are failing within them; and, as Mr. Lincoln said would occur, we, by turning our backs upon them, are doing all in our power to demoralize, disperse, and disorganize our friends in the South. What condition, I ask, are we in if we should have (what may come upon us at any hour) difficulties growing out of our relations with Mexico? Suppose that, from our complications there, we are involved in a war with Austria or France, or both together, what condition are you in to call upon the people of the South to come up to aid you in the great conflict? I tell you, Senators, it is our duty to close up this question. What is the effect of the proposition before us, reported from the committee on reconstruction? Is there a man on this floor who believes that that proposition, if it be submitted to the several States, will be adopted by a majority, much less by three fourths of them? Who believes if we should submit it that it would be so adopted? I do not think there is any man who can believe it. If they will not adopt it, what, then, is the effect? Instead of being reconstruction it is obstruction to the restoration of the States and of the Union.

Mr. President, I do not care to be drawn into a discussion of these party questions. I foresaw in certain movements that took place in the beginning, that it was war on the Administration and intended as war on the Administration by some who took part in it; and fearful of the result I have struggled from the beginning to avoid it, to endeavor if possible and by every means to have our friends in Congress and the President of the United States act harmoniously and act together on these great questions. The system of policy which Mr. Johnson inherited from Mr. Lincoln had been in operation for years. He presented it. You have not presented any better policy. Something must be done. This policy of the President must be accepted, certainly, unless there is a better policy. We must do something. Why not then come up, one and all, and take hold of this matter? I can assure my friend from Massachusetts that the people of this country, now that the war is over, demand peace, and will have it, and that it shall be peace in reality and not a mockery. They demand the union of these States, not their disunion. They demand reconstruction, not obstruction. They demand, and will have, the loyal representatives of the southern States in the Congress of the United States. Sir, our friends here sometimes overlook and do not fully comprehend, in my judgment—I say it with all respect—that deep-seated feeling there is existing among the great mass of the people of the North. My friend from Massachusetts is utterly mistaken when he thinks that ninety-nine hundredths of the Republican party, as it is called, or the Union party, are with him on this question. He will find himself utterly mistaken if he relies on any such anticipation.

I had hoped, that this question would have been voted upon long ago. I know that this discussion has taken a wide range and made many digressions—digressions which perhaps I ought to regret, and which certainly I will not continue by any longer trespassing on the time of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin seems to have addressed his remarks to me—

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. CONNESS. It is that this discussion has no relation whatever to the question before the body. It has proceeded for nearly two hours, and gentlemen rise here and occupy the entire time in repeated speeches upon interpolations introduced by themselves. If we are going to consume the day in this kind of debate I propose that there be an opportunity given to more than the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Massachusetts. I propose that we shall not listen constantly to the speech of the 17th of January repeated here upon every appropriation bill or other bill that may be introduced; and I ask either that the discussion be confined to the question before us, or that it be more general than it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The discussion certainly does not relate to the subject before the Senate, but under the practice of the Senate the Chair does not feel authorized to rule it out of order. A wide range of debate has always been allowed in the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. It is very seldom that I ever say anything on these questions; I have occupied scarcely an hour during the whole of the session; and I am very much surprised that the Senator from California, who occupies more time than any other member of the Senate, should make a point of order of this character. I did desire at this time to reply to a few of the remarks made by the Senator from Wisconsin; but as the Senator from California has raised this point of order, if it is the wish of the Senate to close this discussion, I shall forego that answer.

Mr. COWAN. It is very well known that I never interfere in discussions of this kind, or very rarely, at least, because I know that the effect of them is not to convince anybody but perhaps to widen the breach. I only rise now for the purpose of correcting some errors into which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] has fallen in the excess of his zeal, and, I may say, in the excess of his hostility to the President.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts belongs to one wing of the Republican party; I belong to the other wing. We had the President heretofore, and he had to put up with it; we have got the President now, and he has got to put up with it.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to see the wing to which the Senator belongs.

Mr. COWAN. The honorable Senator will find the wing this fall, and it will be such a wing as will sweep him and his faction out of existence, or I am very much mistaken in the signs of the times. He may succeed up in Massachusetts, or along there, but he will not succeed anywhere else, I think, very well, with all the bluster and parade that he makes as though he and his set were the whole Republican party.

The Senator to-day has descended into matters which more properly belong to the executive sessions of this body. He has charged the President here—with what, pray? A design to betray the Republican party? [Mr. WILSON shook his head.] To betray was the word; and I speak it knowing what I do speak and understanding what I do say, and I speak it more in sorrow than in anger, that in this party of ours for some time it has been the fashion, when anybody differed from certain gentlemen upon this side, there was no tolerance of a difference of opinion; there was no term too harsh to be applied to the recusant. Any man of sense could have seen that that was a very handsome way to keep up a party, particularly when that party had its platforms promulgated to the world; when they were written down and before the world, and could be read, and when the people themselves had pronounced upon them.

Now, I say to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and all those who hold similar opinions with him—I trust there are not many who will be so unguarded in their language as he has been—that so far from the President betraying the Republican party, if its written records are to be evidence of what it believes and what it thinks, the President to-day stands upon its platform firmly. Take that platform, produce your articles, bring forward your resolutions, and show where he has violated a single one of them; and when you do I will undertake to show upon this floor, and I will show it beyond the possibility of a denial, that it is the honorable Senator, and those who believe with him, who never were members of the party, who never ought to have belonged to it, and were the burden that it has always carried; that they are those who caused the divergence; they are those who, carried away into these new schemes and these new projects, have split it and divided it. I understand the Senator belongs to a party who discard platforms, who discard the belief of yesterday—a party of progress, who boast, "Are we not wiser to-day than we were yesterday? Have we not learned something in the experience of the past?" I should be glad if they had. Now—

Mr. SHERMAN. As the time for an adjournment is approaching, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask if there is any limitation upon debate in the Senate.

Mr. COWAN. I ask the Senator to put his point of order in writing. I believe that is the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will do so; but in the mean time I call on the Senator to take his seat. I am now serious. This debate has been continued for five or six days, and I hope we shall be allowed to come to a vote.

Mr. COWAN. I will change the subject and speak to another point. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts has told the Senate—

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the rule be enforced, and that the Senator take his seat until the point of order is disposed of.

Mr. COWAN. I clearly have a right to reply to personal matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio rises to a point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator must take his seat, and I will reduce the point of order to writing. The Senator made his point on me, and I insist that the rule shall be enforced.

Mr. COWAN. I propose to ask leave of the Senate to reply to that part of the remark—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rules require that the Senator from Pennsylvania shall resume his seat until the Senator from Ohio has stated his point of order.

Mr. COWAN. But I ask leave to proceed upon a new subject.

Several SENATORS. That is unnecessary.

Mr. COWAN. I will waive it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. (to Mr. COWAN.) You have a right to say what you please.

Mr. COWAN. I agree with my friend from California [Mr. CONNESS] that this has all been extra judice, beyond the rule; but I wish to say to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, because it illustrates the folly of this persistent quarrel that is kept up upon the President of the United States and which has been brought into the body—

Mr. SHERMAN. In compliance with the demand of the Senator from Pennsylvania I send the point of order in writing to the Chair; and I should like to have the Senator comply with the rules as he enforced them against me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio raises the following point of order: "The point of order is, that the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania are not pertinent to the question before the Senate."

Mr. HOWE. Would a motion that the Senator from Pennsylvania have leave to proceed be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not until the point of order has been decided. The point of order is undoubtedly well taken according to the rules of the Senate, but under the practice and the wide range of debate that has always been allowed in the Senate, the Chair does not feel that he would be following the precedents in deciding that the Senator is out of order. The Senator from Pennsylvania will proceed, unless the Senator from Ohio appeals from the decision of Chair.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply want it to be understood, because, having this bill in charge, I wish to do my duty, and I think it is the duty of the Chair to submit the question to the Senate and let us be governed by the will of the Senate. I believe that has been the usual course on such questions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will follow that suggestion and submit the point of order to the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope before that is done—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is done.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Chair decides to submit it to the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To submit it to the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Ohio assumes that that is usually done. I have never known it to be done in the eleven years that I have been a member of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is the rule.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Never on a question like this. This is the first time that it has ever been done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is out of order unless he appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Chair has not decided.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is to be left to the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well; I have a right to argue it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I insist that I have.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I make the point of order that the Senator has no right to argue the question unless he takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Chair has not decided it, and I have a right to argue how it shall be decided.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is for the Chair to settle. I understand the Chair has made a decision that it shall be left to the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. And now I can argue before the Senate how it shall be decided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair submits the point of order to the Senate, but that is not a decision, and the Senator from Illinois has a right to argue the question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now, I wish to say—

Mr. COWAN. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. On this question I believe I have the floor. Sir, I would not have interfered with this question of order at all but for the remark which fell from the Senator from Maine or the Senator from Ohio, that it had been usual to submit a question of this kind to the Senate. When an amendment has been offered to an appropriation bill and it was objected that it was a private claim, the Chair has often submitted that question to the Senate for its decision; but I have no recollection, and I think the Senator from Maine will find it difficult to produce a case, where, on a question of debate, when the whole subject was up, when a bill was under consideration and a Senator was discussing that bill, he was ever called to order in the Senate of the United States for the irrelevancy of his remarks, and the question was submitted to the Senate as to whether he should go on or not. I consider it a very important matter in this body to undertake to limit debate. The Senator from Pennsylvania must be the judge himself of what latitude he thinks proper to indulge in; and although I am quite willing to give him leave to proceed in order, as some one has suggested, I insist that he has a right to proceed and discuss this bill and make such a speech as he thinks proper, and that there is no rule that has ever been enforced in the Senate to deny him that right. I should be very sorry at this day to see a majority of the Senate decide that the Senator from Pennsylvania is out of order because in their opinion his remarks are irrelevant to the particular point under consideration. The whole bill is now open before the Senate. We are discussing an amendment to an appropriation bill, which, in my judgment, properly entitles any Senator who thinks proper to indulge in remarks—he must be his own judge as to the propriety of them—in making such remarks as he thinks proper, not, of course, violating the rules of the Senate in what he says; but so far as relevancy is concerned, he is to judge of that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have now the rule, and I will read it to the Senate. It is a rule that is very rarely referred to, because we do not look to these questions closely:

"7. If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall, or any member may, call to order; and when a member shall be called to order by the President or a Senator, he shall sit down, and shall not proceed without leave of the Senate."

That settles that question.

"And every question of order shall be decided by the President without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate; and the President may call for the sense of the Senate on any question of order."

And my impression is that it is usual for the Chair to submit a question of order to the Senate. On the question of practice I may not be correct. Senators who are older than I am can speak as to that.

Several SENATORS. Not on a question of relevancy.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the general parliamentary law. How far that is to be enforced in the Senate, is a matter for the Senate to determine. I do not wish to be discourteous to my friend from Pennsylvania, but this question has been before us for five or six days, and I want to have it disposed of.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A point of order on a question of relevancy is never submitted to the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me, I will suggest to him that he had better, in this case, withdraw his point of order, because there can be no general rule on a question of this kind. You may in this case decide that the Senator from Pennsylvania is out of order, but that does not decide that any other Senator is out of order until the Senate take the question on that particular case.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing to withdraw it. The only reason why I insisted upon it so far was that the Senator from Pennsylvania took the technical objection that I must reduce my point of order to writing, and that being unusual, I thought I would insist on the enforcement of the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not insist that the point of order should be reduced to writing. The Senator from Ohio had a right to state it without reducing it to writing.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Pennsylvania insisted on the point of order being reduced to writing, which was very unusual.

Mr. COWAN. The words on which you made your point of order.

Mr. CLARK. Allow me to say that on that point I think the Senator from Pennsylvania was wrong. When a Senator is called to order for words spoken in debate, because they are opprobrious or improper, then they are to be reduced to writing, but not in a case of this kind. I think the point of order had better be withdrawn, and let the debate go on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw it.

Mr. GRIMES. I object to the withdrawal of the point of order, because I want to have this question settled.

Mr. CLARK. It settles nothing.

Mr. GRIMES. I want to have it settled for hereafter. Several times during this session when a Senator has been debating a question here and arguing it as he chose to argue it, somebody has got up and raised a point of order that he was out of order. I have never seen it done until this winter, and I want to have a stop put to it.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Iowa will allow me to suggest to him that taking this question now will decide nothing with regard to it. I have never known it done before, and I presume it will not be done again, if this point of order is withdrawn, any more than if we were to vote upon it. I think, if by general consent, the point of order is withdrawn, and the debate is allowed to go on, Senators will keep themselves within the ordinary rule of parliamentary law. They must, in a great measure, be allowed to judge for themselves what is proper.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a debate that is historic, perhaps the greatest debate that ever occurred in this Chamber, known as that between Mr. Webster and Mr. Hayne. Senators will remember that that occurred on a simple resolution relating to the disposition of the public lands. On the consideration of that resolution, the whole question of the relations between the North and South was opened; also the question between the rights of the States and the General Government, and the original formation of the national Constitution, all of which were most thoroughly discussed by Mr. Webster in at least two separate speeches. I am not aware that on that occasion any one undertook to call Mr. Webster to order by saying that he must confine himself to the consideration of the public lands. I take it, that debate may be considered as having practically settled in this Chamber that a discussion may be made a departure, if I may so express myself, from the original topic; but that departure must always be regulated by the good sense and the discretion of the Senators who take part in it.

Mr. CONNESS. With the permission of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I desire to say one word. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to say that a question of order arising out of the latitude debate had taken and the inappropriateness of the debate to the subject had never been raised in the Senate before. I think the Senator was in error in that statement. I have several times since I have been here heard such questions of order made.

Mr. CLARK. Questions of order have been raised upon particular motions, such as a motion to commit or a motion to take up a subject, where the debate is always limited; but upon a general debate like this I never knew a question made.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish simply to say, in conclusion, without intruding on the time of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that I had no intention certainly to raise the question for the first time, but supposed I was following the ordinary path that was pursued here, as the debate had taken a very wide course. I drew upon myself remarks, somewhat personal, from the Senator from Massachusetts, and which I think had better not have been made by him, as they were not strictly correct. I did not intend any offense to the Senator. I supposed I was doing that which I had a right to do, and which could not be regarded as offensive by any Senator.

Mr. COWAN. I have but a single word to say. I suppose that the debate was out of order, according to the rules of this body. I think the whole of it was logically out of order. That is logically out of order which considers persons instead of questions. The question here is as to the authority of the President and the propriety of the exercise of certain powers on his part. The range of the debate is wide enough to include all Presidents and all power and all Governments, and all that kind of thing. I think the divergence was on the part of the Senators from Wisconsin. I think any debate, unless it be in executive session, in which the person of anybody is introduced or the motives of anybody as a person is introduced is out of order; and it is out of order for the plain, palpable reason that it destroys all order and becomes disorder, and does not conduce in any way to the ends of truth.

My friend from Massachusetts is entirely mistaken in the instances which he gives. He states that a soldier was removed in the city of Philadelphia to make way for an enemy of the party. I need not say to the Senate, because it will learn that in due time, that this is utterly, totally, and entirely untrue, not that I mean to say that the Senator from Massachusetts knows that it is so; but the real truth of the matter is, that the person appointed is as radical, according to his record, and more radical than the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, with all his radicalism, dare be; and he comes here indorsed, I think, with all the radicalism that has ever prevailed in the country, all of which will be disclosed in proper time by my friend from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] to whom the case is committed.

Now, with regard to the other appointment, the gentleman who was marshal of western Pennsylvania was a gentleman of my profession, a friend of mine; and I may say for him that he is as honorable, as upright, and as good a man as there is in the country. He has held that office for three or four years without the slightest stain upon his reputation or his credit in any way. The gentleman who has been appointed to take his place, instead of being a civilian, is a soldier, has been a soldier through the war; and what I rose especially for was to caution my friend from Massachusetts about the too liberal use of the vocabulary of the English language which is used to designate crime. He said to the Senate here, in open session, that this man had committed acts which, but for the interference of friends, would have sent him to the penitentiary. I think the honorable Senator is a just man; at least he talks largely of justice here. I think he is a charitable man. I think, when he manifests such extraordinary affection for an alien race and for an oppressed people, he would not hurt his brother.

But, sir, it is the fashion of the times; these words come so glibly upon the tongue, and they are held to be of so little import here, that a reputation is stabbed as though it were as vile trash as that which fills a purse. Let the honorable Senator reflect for one moment upon the gross injustice of such a charge as this, made here openly, in broad day, to the American people; and let him reflect that he makes it of a soldier—a soldier, I can tell him, who, after this disgrace of his, rode the raid with Sheridan, and fought the battles in the valley. In my country, whether this charge be true or be not true—I know nothing of it—no man would dare to charge that appointee to his face with a crime that would render him infamous. No man, whether he believes it or not, would charge that until it was properly investigated upon a presentment by a grand jury and a verdict of the fellow-citizens of the guilty man. I put it to Senators whether this is the place where a man's reputation may be torn to tatters; where his wife may be made to weep for shame among the other weeping and doleful trains of which the Senator has told us; and whether he wishes to make himself the conduit, the mouth-piece, by which to convey insult and infamy to this man's children when the grave closes over both him and the Senator from Massachusetts. Sir, the rule was that prosecution should be free, but that defamation never should be free. Let him who charges a crime upon his fellow-man go to the law. If it is a crime at all it is a crime against the law; and when charges are to be made of this infamous character let the law be appealed to, let the prosecution be free, but let the defamation be limited, not only by the law, but by the restraints which every gentleman and every man of honor feels ought to regulate him in his intercourse with his fellow-man.

Mr. President, as I said at the outset—and I trust it is not more out of order than a great many things which have occurred in this debate—the honorable Senator belongs to one wing of the Republican party; I belong to the other. I have no uncharitableness for him and the people who believe with him. I may believe that their doctrines are erroneous, that their projects for the future are mischievous and will result in evil, but I have no crimes to charge upon them. The sure harbinger of the downfall of any party which resorts to that means to bolster itself up is to be found in the means itself. The man who stands firmly and strongly upon a good cause and upon the justice of it never turns aside from the question to argue the personal character of his opponent, for one of the best reasons in the world: the personal character of the opponent has nothing to do with it. The logic of a bad man is not necessarily bad logic because it comes from his mouth; nor is the logic of a good man necessarily good logic because it proceeds from the mouth of a pure man. It is only weak people who resort to those indices; and whenever you find a man resorting to them it is a sure evidence that he is not competent to decide upon the true. But has it come to this in the Senate of the United States, that we are to leave questions for personal motives and for a personal consideration of the characters of those who choose to advocate this or that doctrine?

Mr. President, I simply rose to say this much. I had not intended to say a word as long as the debate was confined to its legitimate limited range, because I supposed everybody had made up his mind on that point, and I did not attempt to influence anybody; but when the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] got up and undertook to dive into the secret machinery by which the President of the United States was guilty of ingratitude to him and his set, and when the honorable Senator from Massachusetts undertook to state boldly that the party was betrayed by the President, and when particular instances were given, it was utterly impossible to sit still and allow those things to go to the country without attempting to send along with them an antidote, however feeble it may be.

I have only to say further, that one day we shall wake up from this delusion by finding that if we undertake to govern an empire of the size of this, including so many States as this does, so many varieties of men, so many interests clashing with one another, we shall have to be much more charitable to one another, and we shall have to be much more tolerant of divergent opinions, and to yield ours, when it becomes necessary, for the common security and the common peace. As was well said by my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] what the nation wants now is peace, not war. What it wants now is repose, and not factious and turbulent activity. What it wants is a restoration of law and order, obedience to the Constitution and to the recognized authorities of the land; that crimination and recrimination shall cease; the past be forgiven; that by-gones be by-gones; and that if there is to be retribution, if the hand of retribution has not fallen upon the nation heavily enough now, North and South, when there is hardly a family throughout the length and breadth of the land that is not clothed in mourning, when every household mourns its victims sacrificed upon the altar of the insane hate of people against people—people who never saw one another and who know nothing about each other—I say that what the nation wants now is quiet, peace, and harmony, that good men should come together and be forgiving, and that if there are to be more victims they shall be victims of the law, not the victims of individual malice, or the victims of individual revenge. Let the law in its majesty seize upon the guilty, pronounce upon their cases, and execute its judgments as becomes a civilized, Christian people.

Mr. HOWE. I cannot allow this hold of the Treasury that we have got just now to pass away from us, and these appropriations to go, until I have said a word of explanation upon one remark of my colleague's.

To recall the Senate to the state of the question, it will be borne in mind that he undertook to defend the policy which the President is governed by in his appointments, and to deny that he was making any appointments for opinion's sake. I had some facts, that is to say, I heard some statements which I thought militated against that view of the case, and I submitted them that I might know whether they were correct or not. In reply to that my colleague took occasion to remark, as if it were a subject of personal injury to himself, that in his absence I had presented to the Senate some resolutions passed by the Legislature of Wisconsin asking him to resign his seat here in the Senate. If my colleague has a right to consider that a personal injury, if it was a personal injury to him, I regret it. If it was a wrong done him, I regret the act very much. Those resolutions were sent to me by the secretary of state of Wisconsin in company with several other series of resolutions and memorials, most of which were addressed in terms to the Congress of the United States. I could not understand any possible purpose in sending them to me except it was to have them laid before the Senate; and so it never occurred to me to doubt for an instant that it was entirely proper, and that it was demanded as the due of the State of Wisconsin that they should be presented to the Senate. I did have a question in my own mind whether courtesy to my colleague did not rather call upon me to wait and allow him to present the resolutions. I submitted that question to a couple of Senators much older and more experienced than myself sitting near me, and it was in pursuance of their recommendation that I submitted the resolutions myself. I certainly did not intend to do my colleague any wrong. I do not believe to-day I did him any wrong. I do think the Legislature intended that those resolutions should be submitted to the Senate. The fact of their passage was known to the world, and I think I only obeyed the wish of the Legislature of Wisconsin when I did submit them.

But my colleague asks me if I consider that act of the Legislature instructing him to resign his seat because of some votes he had given here as an act of toleration, and whether I approve of the conduct of the Legislature. Sir, the conduct of the Legislature had not been drawn in question at all. There had been no allusion to it whatever. But when my colleague holds up that act of the Legislature as an evidence of intolerance like that of which I spoke in certain appointments which were attributed to the President, I think he overlooks entirely the difference between the relations existing between him and the Legislature of Wisconsin and the relations existing between the President and the party who put him in the presidential chair. My colleague seems to forget the fact that the Legislature of that State selected him out of all the people of Wisconsin to come here, bringing her power of attorney to declare her will, to defend her interests, to uphold her honor, to be her representative. They had requested him upon one great measure to make a given declaration of her wishes. He declined to do that. I do not attack my colleague for declining it, for obeying his own convictions instead of hers. That was his prerogative as a Senator. But having seen fit upon that great vital measure to follow his own convictions, to declare his own wishes, and not to make known the wish of Wisconsin, I must be allowed to say in all candor that I do not think the State of Wisconsin stepped out of her jurisdiction, or that the Legislature overstepped the jurisdiction prescribed to them when they saw fit to comment upon that course of his as to them seemed just. With that action of the Legislature I had no conceivable connection in the world, any further than to be their organ in submitting the resolutions to the Senate.

As to the other question raised by my colleague and discussed here, touching the President's policy itself, I expressly waived any attack upon that. My colleague's ideas of reconstruction are not advanced here now for the first time, and I do not feel called upon now to say a word in reply to them.

Mr. WILSON. Some things have fallen from the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Pennsylvania that I desire to notice; but at this hour I do not like to ask Senators to stay here for that purpose. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 8, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the consideration of the constitutional amendment reported by the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that that special order be postponed, and that the House proceed to the consideration of the tax bill. I do this for the reason that I believe in three or four days at the farthest we can finish the tax bill. If we enter now into the discussion of the constitutional amendment it will bring up the entire subject of reconstruction, and the debate will run on for three or four weeks. It seems to me to be almost a national calamity to delay the tax bill that long. I call for the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope there will be no such disposition made of the special order. I have no idea that the constitutional amendment will take up more than two or three days. It ought to be in the Senate at once, if it is ever to be acted on. As to the tax bill, we will not lose anything by letting it lie over. Some additions have been recently made to it which I have not had time to read. We have set apart the night sessions for the consideration of that bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand it was the agreement of the House yesterday that the constitutional amendment should be considered during the day and the tax bill during the evening.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not think that was the understanding. It was not mine.

The SPEAKER. To what time does the gentleman propose to postpone it?

Mr. GARFIELD. Until the tax bill has been disposed of.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that that motion be laid upon the table.

Mr. RAYMOND. In case we do not finish the constitutional amendment to-day, will it be superseded by the proposition made the special order for to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The constitutional amendment remains the special order until disposed of.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw my motion to lay upon the table.

I will say that the intention is not to press the accompanying bills until this constitutional amendment has been disposed of by the Senate.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to modify his motion so that we may have the day for the tax bill, and the evening for reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. STEVENS. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I insist on my motion and demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. LE BLOND. I demand the yeas and nays. I want to see whether the negro shall have preference of the finances.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 82, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Barker, Bergen, Boyer, Chanler, Coffroth, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Harris, James Humphrey, Jenckes, Kasson, Kerr, Latham, LeBlond, Marshall, McCullough, Moorhead, Niblack, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whaley, and Williams—51.

NAYS—Messrs. Atley, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Render W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cullom, DeWitt, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, James K. Hubbell, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Morris, Moulton, O'Neill, Orth, Parham, Plants, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Elisha B. Washburne, Welkor, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—82.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Culver, Davis, Delano, Dumont, Egzieston, Farquhar, Grinnell, Hale, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Loan, Marston, Marvin, McClure, Morrill, Myers, Newell, Nicholson, Noel, Paine, Pomeroy, Price, Rogers, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Ward, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—50.

So the House refused to postpone the special order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to allow me to offer a resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. I will yield if it does not come out of my time.

MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be directed to examine into all the facts and circumstances connected with the recent failure of the Merchants' National Bank of Washington, and report to the House the amount of money deposited in the said bank, and by whom, the causes of its failure, and also what further legislation is necessary in regard to the national banks to protect the public and the Government, and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons and papers, and examine witnesses under oath.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I suggest an amendment that it be made to apply to other banks.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I accept that—"and other banks."

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GRADE OF VICE ADMIRAL.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to allow me to introduce a bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I will yield.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and put upon its passage a bill to amend an act to establish the grade of vice admiral in the United States Navy.

The bill was read in part, when

Mr. ROSS demanded the regular order of business.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman will allow this to pass.

Mr. ROSS. We have had flummery enough of that kind.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. The short time allowed by our resolution will suffice to introduce this debate. If unexpectedly there should be any objection to the proposed amendment to the Constitution I may ask the indulgence of the House to reply.

The committee are not ignorant of the fact that there has been some impatience at the delay in making this report; that it existed to some extent in the country as well as among a few members of the House. It originated in the suggestions of faction, no doubt, but naturally spread until it infected some good men. This is not to be wondered at or complained of. Very few could be informed of the necessity for such delay. Beside, we are not all endowed with patience; some men are naturally restive, especially if they have active minds and deep convictions.

But I beg gentlemen to consider the magnitude of the task which was imposed upon the committee. They were expected to suggest a plan for rebuilding a shattered nation—a nation which though not dissevered was yet shaken and riven by the gigantic and persistent efforts of six million able and ardent men; of bitter rebels striving through four years of bloody war. It cannot be denied that this terrible struggle sprang from the vicious principles incorporated into the institutions of our country. Our fathers had been compelled to postpone the principles of their great Declaration, and wait for their full establishment till a more propitious time. That time ought to be present now. But the public mind has been educated in error for a century. How difficult in a day to unlearn it. In rebuilding, it is necessary to clear away the rotten and defective portions of the old foundations, and to sink deep and found the repaired edifice upon the firm foundation of eternal justice. If, perchance, the accumulated quicksands render it impossible to reach in every part so firm a basis, then it becomes our duty to drive deep and solid the substituted piles on which to build. It would not be wise to prevent the raising of the structure because some corner of it might be founded upon materials subject to the inevitable laws of mortal decay. It were better to shelter the household and trust to the advancing progress of a higher morality and a purer and more intelligent principle to underpin the defective corner.

I would not for a moment inculcate the idea of surrendering a principle vital to justice. But if full justice could not be obtained at once I would not refuse to do what is possible. The commander of an army who should find his enemy intrenched on impregnable heights would act unwisely if he insisted on marching his troops full in the face of a destructive fire merely to show his courage. Would it not be better to flank the works and march round and round and besiege, and thus secure the surrender of the enemy, though it might cost time? The former course would show valor and folly; the latter moral and physical courage, as well as prudence and wisdom.

This proposition is not all that the committee desired. It falls far short of my wishes, but it fulfills my hopes. I believe it is all that can be obtained in the present state of public opinion. Not only Congress but the several States are to be consulted. Upon a careful survey of the whole ground, we did not believe that nineteen of the loyal States could be induced to ratify any proposition more stringent than this. I say nineteen, for I utterly repudiate and scorn the idea that any State not acting in the Union is to be counted on the question of ratification. It is absurd to suppose that any more than three fourths of the States that propose the amendment are required to make it valid; that States not here are to be counted as present. Believing, then, that this is the best proposition that can be made effectual, I accept it. I shall not be driven by clamor or denunciation to throw away a great good because it is not perfect. I will take all I can get in the cause of humanity and leave it to be perfected by better men in better times. It may be that that time will not come while I am here to enjoy the glorious triumph; but that it will come is as certain as that there is a just God.

The House should remember the great labor which the committee had to perform. They were charged to inquire into the condition of eleven States of great extent of territory. They sought, often in vain, to procure their organic laws and statutes. They took the evidence of every class and condition of witness, from the rebel vice president and the commander-in-chief of their armies down to the humblest freedman. The sub-committees who were charged with that duty—of whom I was not one, and can therefore speak freely—exhibited a degree of patience and diligence which was never excelled. Considering their other duties, the mass of evidence taken may well be considered extraordinary. It must be remembered, also, that three months since, and more, the committee reported and the House adopted a proposed amendment fixing the basis of representation in such way as would surely have secured the enfranchisement of every citizen at no distant period. That, together with the amendment repudiating the rebel debt, which we also passed, would have gone far to curb the rebellious spirit of secession, and to have given to the oppressed race their rights. It went to the other end of the Capitol, and was there mortally wounded in the house of its friends.

After having received the careful examination and approbation of the committee, and having received the united Republican vote of one hundred and twenty Representatives of the people, it was denounced as "utterly reprehensible," and "unpardonable;" "to be encountered as a public enemy;" "positively endangering the peace of the country, and covering its name with dishonor." "A wickedness on a larger scale than the crime against Kansas or the fugitive slave law; gross, foul, outrageous; an incredible injustice against the whole African race;" with every other vulgar epithet which polished cultivation could command. It was slaughtered by a puerile and pedantic criticism, by a perversion of philosophical definition which, if when I taught school a lad who had studied Lindley Murray had assumed, I would have expelled him from the institution as unfit to waste education upon. But it is dead, and unless this (less efficient, I admit) shall pass, its death has postponed the protection of the colored race perhaps for ages. I confess my mortification at its defeat. I grieved especially because it almost closed the door of hope for the amelioration of the condition of the freedmen. But men in pursuit of justice must never despair. Let us again try and see whether we cannot devise some way to overcome the united forces of self-righteous Republicans and unrighteous copperheads. It will not do for those who for thirty years have fought the beasts at Ephesus to be frightened by the fangs of modern catamounts.

Let us now refer to the provisions of the proposed amendment.

The first section prohibits the States from abridging the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, or unlawfully depriving them of life, liberty, or property, or of denying to any person within their jurisdiction the "equal" protection of the laws.

I can hardly believe that any person can be found who will not admit that every one of these provisions is just. They are all asserted, in some form or other, in our DECLARATION or organic law. But the Constitution limits only the action of Congress, and is not a limitation on the States. This amendment supplies that defect, and allows Congress to correct the unjust legislation of the States, so far that the law which operates upon one man shall operate equally upon all. Whatever law punishes a white man for a crime shall punish the black man precisely in the same way and to the same degree. Whatever law protects the white man shall afford "equal" protection to the black man. Whatever means of redress is afforded to one shall be afforded to all. Whatever law allows the white man to testify in court shall allow the man of color to do the same. These are great advantages over their present codes. Now different degrees of punishment are inflicted, not on account of the magnitude of the crime, but according to the color of the skin. Now color disqualifies a man from testifying in courts, or being tried in the same way as white men. I need not enumerate these partial and oppressive laws. Unless the Constitution should restrain them those States will all, I fear, keep up this discrimination, and crush to death the hated freedmen. Some answer, "Your civil rights bill secures the same things." That is partly true, but a law is repealable by a majority. And I need hardly say that the first time that the South with their copperhead allies obtain the command of Congress it will be repealed. The veto of the President and their votes on the bill are conclusive evidence of that. And yet I am amazed and alarmed at the impatience of certain well-meaning Republicans at the exclusion of the rebel States until the Constitution shall be so amended as to restrain their despotic desires. This amendment once adopted cannot be annulled without two thirds of Congress. That they will hardly get. And yet certain of our distinguished friends propose to admit State after State before this becomes a part of the Constitution. What madness! Is their judgment misled by their kindness; or are they unconsciously drifting into the haven of power at the other end of the avenue? I do not suspect it, but others will.

The second section I consider the most important in the article. It fixes the basis of representation in Congress. If any State shall exclude any of her adult male citizens from the elective franchise, or abridge that right, she shall forfeit her right to representation in the same proportion. The effect of this provision will be either to compel the States to grant universal suffrage or so to shear them of their power as to keep them forever in a hopeless minority in the national Government, both legislative and executive. If they do not enfranchise the freedmen, it would give to the rebel States but thirty-seven Representatives. Thus shorn of their power, they would soon become restive. Southern pride would not long brook a hopeless minority. True it will take two, three, possibly five years before they conquer their prejudices sufficiently to allow their late slaves to become their equals at the polls. That short delay would not be injurious. In the mean time the freedmen would become more enlightened, and more fit to discharge the high duties of their new condition. In that time, too, the loyal Congress could mature their laws and so amend the Constitution as to secure the rights of every human being, and render disunion impossible. Heaven forbid that the southern States, or any one of them, should be represented on this floor until such muniments of freedom are built high and firm. Against our will they have been absent for four bloody years; against our will they must not come back until we are ready to receive them. Do not tell me that there are loyal representatives waiting for admission—until their States are loyal they can have no standing here. They would merely misrepresent their constituents.

I admit that this article is not as good as the one we sent to death in the Senate. In my judgment, we shall not approach the measure of justice until we have given every adult freedman a homestead on the land where he was born and toiled and suffered. Forty acres of land and a hut would be more valuable to him than the immediate right to vote. Unless we give them this we shall receive the censure of man and the curse of Heaven. That article referred to provided that if one of the injured race was excluded the State should forfeit the right to have any of them represented. That would have hastened their full enfranchisement. This section allows the States to discriminate among the same class, and receive proportionate credit in representation. This I dislike. But it is a short step forward. The large stride which we in vain proposed is dead; the murderers must answer to the suffering race. I would not have been the perpetrator. A load of misery must sit heavy on their souls.

The third section may encounter more difference of opinion here. Among the people I believe it will be the most popular of all the provisions; it prohibits rebels from voting for members of Congress and electors of President until 1870. My only objection to it is that it is too lenient. I know that there is a morbid sensibility, sometimes called mercy, which affects a few of all classes, from the priest to the clown, which has more sympathy for the murderer on the gallows than for his victim. I hope I have a heart as capable of feeling for human woes as others. I have long since wished that capital punishment were abolished. But I never dreamed that all punishment could be dispensed with in human society. Anarchy, treason, and violence would reign triumphant. Here is the mildest of all punishments ever inflicted on traitors. I might not consent to the extreme severity denounced upon them by a provisional governor of Tennessee—I mean the late lamented Andrew Johnson of blessed memory—but I would have increased the severity of this section. I would be glad to see it extended to 1876, and to include all State and municipal as well as national elections. In my judgment we do not sufficiently protect the loyal men of the rebel States from the vindictive persecutions of their victorious rebel neighbors. Still I will move no amendment, nor vote for any, lest the whole fabric should tumble to pieces.

I need say nothing of the fourth section, for none dare object to it who is not himself a rebel. To the friend of justice, the friend of the Union, of the perpetuity of liberty, and the final triumph of the rights of man and their extension to every human being, let me say, sacrifice as we have done your peculiar views, and instead of vainly insisting upon the instantaneous operation of all that is right accept what is possible, and "all these things shall be added unto you."

I move to recommit the joint resolution to the committee on reconstruction.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not rise to discuss the proposition, but to ask of the honorable chairman of the committee a question, an answer to which, I am sure, will afford gratification and satisfaction to me, and doubtless to other members of the House. It relates to the third section of the proposed constitutional amendment, which is in these words:

SEC. 3. Until the 4th day of July, in the year 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for Representatives in Congress and for electors for President and Vice President of the United States.

Now, the question in my mind, upon which I respectfully ask for information, is whether this may not involve us in a position of bad faith. On the 17th of July, 1862, an act was approved, entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," of which the thirteenth section is in these words:

"That the President is hereby authorized at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion, in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such times and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare."

Under and in pursuance of this act the late President Lincoln issued a proclamation granting a great number of pardons upon certain specified conditions. Hundreds and perhaps thousands of pardons were granted by Mr.

Lincoln during the years 1863 and 1864. Subsequently, and as late as the early summer of 1865, President Johnson issued his celebrated amnesty proclamation granting pardons and immunities to certain specified classes in the South that had participated in the rebellion with a military rank under colonel, and excepting certain classes from the benefits of his clemency.

Now, I am perfectly aware that as matter of strict law the deprivation of the elective franchise may not be regarded as a punishment, and therefore no violation of the immunities conveyed by the pardon. But as a matter of fact these pardons have been given and accepted with the full understanding that the recipients were thereby fully restored to all the rights and privileges of citizenship, and do we not by the proposed action place ourselves in the attitude of taking back by constitutional amendment that which has been given by act of Congress and by presidential proclamation issued in pursuance of law? And will not this course be justly subject to the charge of bad faith on the part of the Federal Government?

Mr. STEVENS. I will answer that question. I do not know if the gentleman is a lawyer, but I suppose he has examined this question. A pardon, whether by the President having the power, or specially by act of Parliament or Congress, extinguishes the crime. After that there is no such crime in the individual. A man steals; he is pardoned; he is not then a thief, and you cannot call him a thief, or if you do you are liable to an action for slander. None of those who have been fully pardoned are affected by this provision.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I must say if the gentleman answers the question in that way that he puts a strange construction on the section. I will read it again. It is as follows:

SEC. 3. Until the 4th day of July, 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for Representatives in Congress and for electors for President and Vice President of the United States.

Now, I understand the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that those under the rank of colonel who were pardoned will not be considered as having "adhered" to the rebellion, and that this will not apply to them, or in any way affect them. This certainly is a very strange construction, and it seems to me that it effectually nullifies what has been understood as the intent and purpose of the section. In that view the section is worthless; and in the view I have given it involves bad faith.

Mr. STEVENS. The law says that a man convicted of felony shall not testify. You call him as a witness; the objector shows his conviction; he shows his pardon; and he is not a felon.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will excuse me. There is no pardon that can be shown in this case.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, yes; there is a pardon.

Mr. BLAINE. There was no pardon granted except by the proclamation. These men have no pardons which they can produce in court as a malefactor can. A vast class was pardoned by wholesale, and being pardoned, they stand to-day just as well in point of civil rights and privileges as they did before the rebellion. Now, I maintain that this constitutional amendment would lead to serious misunderstanding throughout the entire South.

Mr. STEVENS. Of course the fact of having complied with the conditions of pardon will be shown.

Mr. BLAINE. But there were no conditions.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, yes, there were.

Mr. BLAINE. President Johnson's proclamation pardoned all below a certain rank in the rebel army. Mr. Lincoln, I know, did exact conditions; and if there were no proclamation out except that of Mr. Lincoln, why, of course, there could be no misunderstanding. But I want the gentleman to observe the phraseology of the act of 1862, for it was evidently written with a view to being applied after the war should have ceased. It says:

"The President is hereby authorized at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion, in any State or part thereof, pardon," &c.

It alluded to a future time when the rebellion should be suppressed. That future time has been reached. The rebellion was concluded and its armies dispersed, and President Johnson, in direct and literal pursuance of law, issued his proclamation pardoning all that class below the rank of colonel who had participated in the rebellion.

Now, this constitutional amendment would be held to override the President's proclamation, being organic in its nature and supreme. I understand, to use the cant phrase of the day, that it "goes back" on these men, and deprives them of the civil rights which this full pardon restored to them. That is my understanding, and that, it seems to me, would be the legal construction. But if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct, and it does not apply to that class of men, then I maintain that it is the bounden duty of the House to make the language so plain that "he who runs may read," and that there may be no doubt about its construction.

Mr. STEVENS. I have only to say, again, that whenever a man can show a full pardon, no penalty can be inflicted.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to make no motion at this time, but if this provision is to be left, according to the construction which I have given it, what I think is the obvious one, or according to the construction which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has given it, which, it seems to me, would lead to infinite mischief and complication, I shall avail myself, at the proper time, of the right to move to strike it out.

Mr. FINCK. Mr. Speaker, I promise to trespass upon the attention of the House but a very few minutes in what I have to say on this question.

An amendment to the Constitution is at all times a matter of grave importance, and should command calm and patient deliberation.

It is of the last importance to the prosperity and happiness of a people that stability in the great organic laws of the nation should be maintained. Amendments sometimes, I agree, become necessary to the constitution of every nation; but they should not be hurriedly made, and never without considering the interests and opinions of the whole people.

To me, Mr. Speaker, this of all other seems the most inauspicious time to propose or make changes in our Constitution.

We are just at the close of the most stupendous war which has ever scourged any nation, and the passions and alienations which have been engendered by this strife have not yet completely passed away.

The amendments proposed are to affect the people of this whole country, but more especially are they intended to affect the people of the States lately in insurrection; and it would seem not only to be an act of even-handed justice, but of the highest wisdom, if we would consult the teachings of the wise and pure men who established our Government, that these people should have an opportunity of considering and discussing these amendments here, and to record their votes through their representatives either for or against them before they are finally submitted to the States for their action. Now, what is the condition in which we to-day find ourselves?

The war terminated over a year ago. The people of the late insurgent States have fully and completely yielded obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States. Their State governments are completely restored. Their courts are in the full exercise of their jurisdiction, and profound peace reigns throughout our borders. To show that these people are in earnest, and acting in good faith, I need only refer to the fact that they have ratified the amendment abolishing slavery, abandoned the pretended claim to the right of secession, and elected members of Congress.

But, sir, the men who control this Congress have failed, in my judgment, to meet these people in that true spirit of kindness and forgiveness dictated by a wise and enlarged statesmanship, and which now alone are necessary to restore cordial relations between the two sections.

At the commencement of this session a most extraordinary resolution was adopted, creating a joint committee of fifteen on reconstruction, and to which it was ordered that everything relating to the admission of members from the late insurgent States should be referred, and none of their representatives were to be admitted until this committee should report on the subject. Thus this House, in the face of that provision of the Constitution, which declares that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, surrendered the exercise of that right to a joint committee, the distinguished chairman of which [Mr. STEVENS] had already pronounced these States conquered territories and their citizens aliens.

We have been advised from time to time, with an air of supreme defiance at the restoration policy of the President, that Congress must first ascertain and declare that these were States really in the Union, with governments republican in form; and that until these things were satisfactorily declared by Congress, no Senator or Representative could be admitted from any of these States.

Well, sir, we have waited, and the country has waited, with feverish anxiety for the period when this committee should report on these questions and the congressional plan should be finally presented. Witnesses have been brought from all parts of the country and examined by the committee, to ascertain and report on the loyalty of the southern people and the condition of their State governments. At last, after five months' labor, this committee has brought in its report, and what information do they bring us? And what do they propose that Congress shall do? Do they tell us whether these States are in or out of the Union; or whether they have governments republican in form? Not a bit of it. But they report an amendment to the Constitution, containing four or five sections, with two bills accompanying it, and these are to constitute the congressional plan, as opposed to the policy of the President.

The time to which I am limited by the resolution of the House regulating this discussion; will prevent me from entering into an elaborate examination of this plan of the committee; and I shall have, therefore, to content myself with a very brief examination of it.

The first section provides that—

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Well, all I have to say about this section is, that if it is necessary to adopt it, in order to confer upon Congress power over the matters contained in it, then the civil rights bill, which the President vetoed, was passed without authority, and is clearly unconstitutional.

The second section provides a new basis for the apportionment of Representatives to Congress, and is substantially the same which was defeated some weeks since in the Senate.

The third section deprives all persons who voluntarily aided in the rebellion from voting for members of Congress and for electors for President and Vice President until the 4th day of July, 1870.

The majority of the committee have made a most wonderful discovery, as disclosed in this third section of the proposed amendment, and have gravely announced to the world that a citizen of the United States who is now entitled to vote, but whose loyalty is suspected, would be an unsafe voter in 1866, or even in the presidential election of 1868, but will, after having his feelings soothed and his love of country encouraged by being branded as an outlaw and compelled to bear the burdens of Government, in the nicely adjusted and ascertained period of four years from the 4th day of July, 1866, which is a safe and reasonable time after the next presidential election, be converted into a true and loyal citizen, and will by that time become attached to the Government which had disfranchised him, and may then safely be intrusted with the great right of suffrage. Certainly this discovery deserves to be protected by some law.

But, sir, this proposition to disfranchise these people by an amendment to the Constitution, to which you require the consent of the States whose citizens are thus to be disfranchised, is a most solemn admission that you have no authority to do so without such an amendment. I trust gentlemen have no design in this proposition to disfranchise nine tenths of the voters of eleven States, unfairly to perpetuate their political power, or to influence the next presidential election.

The fourth section provides that the rebel debt shall never be paid. Well, I suppose no one can be found in this country silly enough to believe that the rebel debt ever will be paid.

These proposed amendments are accompanied by a bill which constitutes a part of the plan of the committee, the first section of which provides—

That whenever the above recited amendments shall have become part of the Constitution, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same, and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oaths of office, be admitted into Congress.

Also, another bill, which declares—

Certain persons ineligible to office under the Government of the United States.

Here, sir, in these propositions, we have the result of the wisdom and statesmanship of the distinguished gentlemen who compose the majority of the committee; and I say it without intending the least disrespect to these gentlemen, that in the future they will be quite unwilling to fix upon this report as the standard and measure of either their ability or statesmanship. Allow me to say, further, that this committee have had the opportunity, in the most important period of our history, to have inscribed their names among the first statesmen of the age, by a liberal and enlightened policy, which would have bound all sections of this great country together in the strong bond of mutual friendship and a restored Union. But they have let that opportunity pass.

Stripped of all disguises, this measure is a mere scheme to deny representation to eleven States; to prevent indefinitely a complete restoration of the Union and perpetuate the power of a sectional and dangerous party.

I am, Mr. Speaker, in the present attitude of our affairs, opposed to making any amendments to the Constitution; and, beside this objection, I am opposed to the measure under discussion, because it seeks to introduce into our system a principle which is wholly unauthorized, and will, if adopted, I fear, lead to serious difficulties in the future.

What is the theory on which these propositions are based?

This Union is composed of thirty-six States; and by law, in full force, but the provisions of which are defied and utterly disregarded, this House is legally and constitutionally to be composed of two hundred and forty-one members; but we have Representatives here from only twenty-five States, and only one hundred and eighty-four members.

The constitutional number of Senators is two for each State, and when full that body would now consist of seventy-two, while it is in fact, composed of but fifty. So that eleven States are denied all representation in both branches of Congress, although the Constitution provides. "that no State, with out its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate;" and the right to representation in the House is equally clear.

But this House by the mere exertion and combination of numbers excludes from its deliberations fifty-seven members; and the Senate by the same power excludes twenty-two members from a voice and vote in that Chamber. And it is, sir, in this strange and extraordinary condition of our affairs that we are gravely invited to proceed to change the Constitution in such a manner as to deeply and materially affect every State whose representatives are excluded from Congress; and we are further asked to say to these States thus excluded that if they refuse to debase themselves as equal States in the Union and decline to ratify and approve by affirmative action these changes, that their exclusion shall be perpetual.

I ask gentlemen to pause and reflect before they commit themselves to so monstrous and revolutionary a scheme as this.

I may be deluded and mistaken when I assume that we are still legislating under a Constitution which we have all sworn to support. Or can it be possible that while the forms and provisions of that sacred instrument are still contained in our books, that its whole spirit and binding authority have been destroyed, and that the rich heritage of our fathers, of a free Government regulated by law, has become already a mere machine by which the majority in Congress are left free and untrammelled to do just what they please?

Mr. Speaker, I trust that we are still in possession, not only of the Constitution of our fathers, but that we will be animated and controlled, at least in some degree, by their wisdom and patriotism.

Sir, I deny wholly that there exists under our Constitution any right whatever for any number of States to combine together to exclude the rest from their constitutional representation in Congress, and to say to these States so excluded that they shall only exercise the right of representation on the terms and conditions of adopting certain proposed amendments to the Constitution, because by the recognition of such a principle you at once sanction the right of three fourths of the States, not to make amendments merely, but to adopt a provision which they may call an amendment, and then drive the remaining one fourth of the States out of the Union, unless they shall also adopt the same proposition.

For that is virtually what is assumed may be done by the proposition of this committee. Nay, more than this is assumed. It is the assertion of the right of three fourths of the States to say to the other fourth, you shall be held in this Union for the purposes of taxation; you shall be subjected to all the burdens and duties of States in the Union, but you shall never be represented in Congress unless you agree to the conditions which we shall see proper to impose on you, although the Constitution expressly declares that "no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate," and that each State shall have at least one Representative in the House.

Sir, the whole scheme is revolutionary and a most shallow pretext for an excuse to exclude the vote of eleven States in the next presidential election. You cannot exact conditions in this way from any State in the Union; no more from Georgia, than from Massachusetts. They are each equal States in the Union, held together by the same Constitution, neither being the superior of the other in their relation to the Federal Government as States.

I cannot pretend to say, Mr. Speaker, what will be the action of these States, on these proposed changes, but I trust they will have spirit enough left to reject, with firm and manly independence, a scheme which disfranchises a large majority of their citizens and brands with the humiliating marks of inferiority States which are constitutionally the equals of any other States in this Union. I trust, sir, these people will rally with a united and patriotic purpose around the wise and just policy of Andrew Johnson.

Gentlemen cannot justify themselves in supporting this proposed legislation on the ground that these States are out of the Union, and that therefore this Congress may require such conditions-precedent as they please to their admission. No, sir; these States are not out of the Union. They have never been out of the Union. They have been recognized by the executive and judicial departments of the Government as States in the Union, and Congress has, by its legislation, more than once during the war fully recognized them as States in the Union, and the very measure which is now proposed to them for their acceptance is a recognition of the fact that they are existing States of the Union; and yet gentlemen who support these propositions put themselves in the attitude of requiring conditions from these States, on which they are to be entitled to representation, which they do not for a moment believe they have a right to exact from New York or Pennsylvania. Sir, these eleven States are in the Union as equal States, and as clearly entitled to representation, as Ohio or Massachusetts. They are to be counted in the number of all the States, three fourths of which are necessary to ratify an amendment to the Constitution. They are so far regarded by this committee as States as to be called upon to exercise one of the highest functions which a State can exercise, namely, to adopt or reject a proposed change in the organic law of the country.

But, sir, a strange spectacle is presented in this measure. States are called upon to deliberate on proposed amendments within their own respective jurisdictions; and these very States are deprived of all opportunity of discussing or voting upon these propositions in Congress, and are States which it is gravely proposed shall not be represented, unless they shall first adopt amendments presented to them by two thirds of the representatives of twenty-five out of the thirty-six States of this Union. And more than all, these States are thus invited to deliberate on the modest demand made of them to disfranchise a large majority of their own citizens, through Legislatures elected or to be elected, by the votes of the very men who are to be disfranchised under this amendment. Sir, the proposition need only be stated to condemn it as anti-republican and wholly at war with all the well-settled principles of a free representative Government.

It is, sir, the assertion of a principle which may embarrass the nation in the future. I trust this Government may continue a free Government for countless generations to come. The life of man is of but short duration, that of a nation is often counted by centuries. And we should remember that it is always unsafe to establish precedents which may disturb the union of these States or sanction a combination of States to impair that perfect equality of the rights of the States as they exist and are secured, under our federative system.

We all know that one of the compromises made by the framers of the Constitution was the recognition of the equality of each State in the Senate; and to fix this equality they provided in the Constitution "that no State, without its consent," should be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

Well, you not only refuse this constitutional right of equal suffrage in the Senate, but go further, and deny all representation to eleven States in either House of Congress, and propose that the exercise of this plain right, secured by the Constitution to all the States, shall be enjoyed only on such terms and conditions as you may see fit to propose, through a Congress which thus excludes these States.

Gentlemen would do well not to forget that it is possible, if this combination of the majority of the representatives of twenty-five of the thirty-six States, should now be successful, and should be sanctioned by the people, that a generation who may come after us, may deem it best for the true interest of a country which may then number one hundred million people, and fifty States, to modify the rights of some other States in their representation.

The six New England States have twelve Senators, but have a population less than the single State of New York, and in the next generation will probably have a population less than some of the States in the great valley of the Mississippi, and who can tell but that some other interest may not then form a combination and say to these six States, you have too much power in the Senate for your population, and we can only agree that you shall enjoy the right to be represented in Congress on the condition that you will consent to a reduction of your equal suffrage in the Senate?

Gentlemen from New England might then appeal to the Constitution and to the sanctity of that provision which gives to each State two Senators. But, sir, the answer could be made, and with tremendous force, that the same provision existed from the foundation of the Government; and notwithstanding that fact, these States once, on a memorable occasion in the history of this country, combined to disregard this provision and denied the benefit of this right to eleven of their sister States unless they should first sanction and adopt conditions which the majority had no right to impose; and depend upon it, sir, the appeal, if made to men like those who now control our legislation, would be made in vain.

Sir, this measure is dangerous to our safety. It protracts an unfortunate contest without promising any beneficial results to the harmony and prosperity of the country. The time has come, I most respectfully submit, when the feelings of sectional hate and animosity should give way to the higher and nobler principles of magnanimity, of kindness, conciliation, and true charity.

The people of the United States will never consent to a dissolution of the Union. They have sacrificed too much to preserve it ever to abandon it or sanction measures which will delay the complete restoration of all the States to their constitutional relations with the Federal Government. It was for this that our brave men fought. For this oceans of blood and treasure were poured out like water; and the man or set of men who may attempt to obstruct or delay the full fruition of the great struggle will be ground into powder by that people whose purposes to maintain the Union and preserve the Constitution are as fixed as our mountains.

Mr. Speaker, the North and the South are destined to live together as one people, in the same Union, and under a common Constitution. Let us, I beseech you, endeavor to live together as true friends and brothers.

Let us rise equal to the great occasion and imitate the noble example of our brave armies in the field, who, when the conflict had ended, no longer regarded the southern people as enemies, but as friends. "Enemies in war, in peace friends." Let us welcome into these Halls representatives from all the States who may be true to the Constitution and the Union; and when all these States shall once more gather around this common council chamber of the nation, then, and not till then, let the great questions of amendment be fairly discussed and voted upon.

Sir, if we shall be true to our destiny, obedient to the great principles of the Constitution and the rights of all the States, this Government will endure, and we shall be enabled to transmit unimpaired to our children as a priceless heritage, which has come down to us from the men of the Revolution, to be, as I most earnestly pray, perpetuated for ages to come as the model of free governments and the asylum for the oppressed of every land.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the House (No. 133) relative to the attempted assassination of the Emperor of Russia, with an amendment, in which he was directed to request the concurrence of the House.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to speak at length upon the pending measure, but for the purpose of entering a motion and submitting a few practical suggestions on the bill, and particularly in reference to the third section.

With almost every proposition in the report of the joint committee on reconstruction I am pleased; yes, more than pleased, I am delighted that we have at least reached the firm earth, and planted our feet upon the solid granite, on enduring and indubitable principle. I believe we have at last a series of propositions which, in the main, will meet the approval of the American people as no others have ever done since the beginning of this struggle.

I will not go into a general discussion of the reconstruction policy, but will confine myself in the few words I shall say to the joint resolution and the amendment to the Constitution proposed by it now before the House, and more particularly to one section of it. First let me say I regret more than I shall be able to tell this House that we have not found the situation of affairs in this country such, and the public virtue such that we might come out on the plain, unanswerable proposition that every adult intelligent citizen of the United States, unconvicted of crime, shall enjoy the right of suffrage.

Sir, I believe that the right to vote, if it be not indeed one of the natural rights of all men, is so necessary to the protection of their natural rights as to be indispensable, and therefore equal to natural rights. I believe that the golden sentence of John Stuart Mill, in one of his greatest works, ought to be written on the constitution of every State, and on the Constitution of the United States, as the greatest and most precious of truths, "That the ballot is put into the hands of men, not so much to enable them to govern others as that he may not be misgoverned by others." I believe that suffrage is the shield, the sword, the spear, and all the panoply that best befits a man for his own defense in the great social organism to which he belongs. And I profoundly regret that we have not been enabled to write it and engrave it upon our institutions, and imbed it in the imperishable bulwarks of the Constitution as a part of the fundamental law of the land.

But I am willing, as I said once before in this presence, when I cannot get all I wish to take what I can get. And therefore I am willing to accept the propositions that the committee have laid before us, though I desire one amendment which I will mention presently.

I am glad to see this first section here which proposes to hold over every American citizen, without regard to color, the protecting shield of law. The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. FINCK] undertakes to show that because we propose to vote for this section we therefore acknowledge that the civil rights bill was unconstitutional. He was anticipated in that objection by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] The civil rights bill is now a part of the law of the land. But every gentleman knows it will cease to be a part of the law whenever the sad moment arrives when that gentleman's party comes into power. It is precisely for that reason that we propose to lift that great and good law above the reach of political strife, beyond the reach of the plots and machinations of any party, and fix it in the serene sky, in the eternal firmament of the Constitution, where no storm of passion can shake it and no cloud can obscure it. For this reason, and not because I believe the civil rights bill unconstitutional, I am glad to see that first section here.

As the nearest approach to justice which we are likely to be able to make, I approve of the second section that bases representation upon voters. I believe the section is now free from the objections that killed it in the Senate, and I have no doubt it will now pass that body.

I am glad to see the fourth section here, which forever forbids the payment of the rebel debt. I am quite sure that on the proposition no man in this House will vote in the negative. Some may think the section unnecessary, but for abundant caution, and "to make assurance doubly sure," let it become a part of the Constitution.

It is to the third section that I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has made a point against it, which has at least this value; that whatever may be the intention of the committee or of the House, the section is least susceptible of double construction. Some may say that it revokes and nullifies in part the pardons that have already been granted in accordance with law and the proclamations of the President. Others may say that it does not affect them, and will not apply to rebels who have been thus pardoned.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. I was not perhaps sufficiently explicit in what I said in answer to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] I admit that a pardon removes all liability to punishment for a crime committed. But there is a vast difference between punishing for a crime and withholding a privilege. Nobody will doubt that you may distinguish between classes in the privileges accorded to them if you think their enjoyment would be dangerous to the community. While I admit that the pardon will be full and operative so far as the crime is concerned, it confers no other advantages than an exemption from punishment for the crime itself.

Mr. GARFIELD. I was about to say that if the section does not apply to those who have been pardoned, then it will apply to so small a number of people as to make it of no practical value; for the excepted classes in the general system of pardons form a very small fraction of the rebels. If the section does apply to those who have received the pardon, the objection of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] may be worthy of consideration.

But, without entering into the question of construction at all, and if there were no doubt or difference on that score, there are still other points to which I wish to call the attention of the House. If the proposition had been that those who had been in rebellion should be ineligible to any office under the Government of the United States, and should be ineligible to appointment as electors of the President and Vice President of the United States, or if all who had voluntarily borne arms against the United States had been declared forever incapable of voting for a United States officer, it would, in my judgment, be far more defensible. But what is the proposition? It is that—

Until the 4th day of July, in the year 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for Representatives in Congress and for electors for President and Vice President of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this, in my judgment, is the only proposition in this resolution that is not bottomed clearly and plainly upon principle—principle that will stand the test of centuries, and be as true a thousand years hence as it is to-day. If the persons referred to are not worthy to be allowed to vote in January of 1870, will they be worthy in July of that year? If the franchise were withheld until they should perform some specific act of loyalty, if it were conditioned upon any act of theirs, it would commend itself as a principle, but the fixing of an ordinary date, without any regard to the character or conduct of the parties themselves, is indefensible, and will not commend itself to the judgment of reflecting men. What is worse, it will be said everywhere that this is purely a piece of political management in reference to a presidential election.

Now, I desire that what goes into our Constitution shall be the pure gold, unalloyed, untainted, having mingled with it nothing that will not stand the test of the ages. I fear that the proposition to which I have just referred might not stand that crucial test.

But, sir, I invite the attention of the House to another consideration. Suppose this section should become a part of the Constitution, and suppose that it were entirely defensible as a matter of principle, I ask gentlemen how it is to be carried out in practice. If, under its operation in eleven States of the Union, nine tenths, and, in some instances, ninety-nine hundredths of the adult population are to be disfranchised for four years, how do you propose to carry its provisions into practical execution? Will nine tenths of the population consent to stay at home and let one tenth do the voting? Will not every ballot-box be the scene of strife and bloodshed? It may well be doubted whether this section can be carried out except by having a military force at every ballot-box in eleven States of the Union. Are you ready to make the South a vast camp for four years more? I am ready to do that or anything else in the way of expense, if it is necessary as means of securing liberty and union; but I believe that great result can be achieved in a less expensive way. But it is evident to me that if this section becomes a part of the Constitution, it must either remain a dead letter or we must maintain a large army to enforce it. I do not, therefore, think it wise or prudent, both for practical reasons and for reasons of construction, as suggested by the gentleman from Maine, that the third section shall stand as a part of the Constitution in its present form.

I am sure no member of this House will think that I make this motion with the least desire to favor or excuse in any way the men who have been in arms against the Government. I trust I do not need to make such a disclaimer to any person here, or among Union men anywhere. But I desire that any proposition which may be submitted by us for ratification by the States shall be so grounded in practical wisdom, that when it is presented to the American people, any man who votes against it will need to hide his face in shame. And there are thousands of men who only need some little excuse to justify themselves in voting against this great and good measure. I had nearly completed a substitute for this section providing that no person who had voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection should ever be eligible to any office under the United States, but as I have not perfected it I will not present it now. I hope, however, we may begin by striking out the section as it now stands.

Is it now in order, Mr. Speaker, to move an amendment?

The SPEAKER. A motion to amend is not in order pending a motion to recommit.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I move that the resolution be recommitted to the committee, with instructions to report it back to the House with the third section stricken out.

Mr. RAYMOND. I inquire whether it will not be in order to call for a division on the different sections of this amendment. I think that will be the better way to test the sense of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I think when the vote comes to be taken on the motion to recommit, with instructions to strike out, the merits of the question will be tested by the House.

Mr. RAYMOND. I ask whether it will be in order to call for a division now, or at any time.

The SPEAKER. A resolution can be divided if each part can stand by itself, but a bill or joint resolution cannot be divided. It may be amended. Sometimes the House considers them section by section. They stand as a whole, and must be so considered.

Mr. RAYMOND. Can this be considered section by section?

The SPEAKER. It has been reported as a whole and must be acted on as a whole.

Mr. RAYMOND. If this be considered section by section, then a two-thirds vote will be required to carry each section. If amendment is necessary a majority can make it.

The SPEAKER. A majority can amend it, but it will require two thirds to pass it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to make an inquiry. This being an amendment to the Constitution in three different particulars I ask whether it will not be required that we shall vote on them separately. I ask whether we can amend the Constitution by adding provisions grouped together in the manner in which these are without voting on each distinct proposition. Do not the Constitution and law require that they should be so voted on?

The SPEAKER. They do not. The proposition is reported by the committee as a whole, and although it embrace different provisions, yet this House and the Senate and the people will vote on it as a whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. It appears, then, that my motion is the only one that will bring us to a vote on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has the right to withdraw his motion to recommit, and with the withdrawal of that motion the instructions would fall.

Mr. GARFIELD. Would I not have the right to renew the motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could renew his instructions if the previous question were not sustained.

Mr. GARFIELD. Would I not have the right to move to amend if the previous question were voted down?

The SPEAKER. It would then be in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentlemen who report this bill will put in a section, that all who participated in the rebellion shall forever be excluded from the right of elective franchise, in all cases relating to national offices, then I will say the proposition will be just and one we could stand upon as a matter of principle. Anything is just which excludes from privilege and power all those infamous men who participated in rebellion. The proposition, without any modification, without any limitation, would meet with my approval as one eminently just, if it could be practically carried out. But when you attempt to make it extend only for a limited period, you thereby acknowledge that as a principle they ought not to be excluded except for a limited period. I am unwilling to admit that proposition. As a matter of principle they should either be forever excluded, or allowed to come in when they comply with such conditions as the loyal people of this country, through their representatives in Congress may prescribe. I do not think we can so well stand a mixed proposition like this.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman proposes to submit practical views on this question, and in that view I ask him by what method the Congress of the United States could carry out that proposition if it is to deprive these parties of the right to vote in State affairs without erecting themselves into a tribunal in which to settle the question itself. I ask in that connection what tribunal is erected either in the Constitution or laws of the United States by which to settle the question in the appointment of electors of President and Vice President?

Is there any tribunal provided either in the Constitution or the laws of the United States to test the question, should the time ever come when the elections of a President and Vice President depends upon the right of certain men to vote as electors or members of the Electoral College, and yet their right so to vote be disputed?

It seems to me there is a defect somewhere in the want of any tribunal known to the Constitution and laws by which you can ever determine this question, and the time may come when the whole nation will be rent in twain upon that question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am obliged to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I had noted that point, and in this running debate was about to overlook it, that in case this provision should prevail and there should come up at the next presidential election a number of electors from those eleven States whose vote would determine the fate of the election, and then in the Electoral College the question should be raised whether those electors were chosen by men who had been in rebellion, what tribunal have we to decide that question? Have we any committee of elections provided for in the Electoral College? Have we any court, have we any tribunal whatever under the Constitution to which that important question could be referred?

It is not impossible that this section might bring us face to face with a new and most dangerous question, the solution of which is not easy to see.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman says that he will go for an amendment to the Constitution that shall disfranchise this class forever. Now, I wish to ask him, if he should get the report amended to suit him in that respect, how is he going to get a tribunal to decide that question any better than now?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman's question does not involve me in any difficulty. I did not say I was in favor of putting such a clause into this amendment in view of all the circumstances, but I said that that proposition would be more just than the present one, and I would prefer it. There would be practical difficulties in the way of either proposition, but more I think in the way of this.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARFIELD. Excuse me; I shall conclude my remarks in a few moments. My colleague [Mr. FINCK] denounces this proposition and the whole scheme of the reconstruction committee as revolutionary, and calls upon the South to rally unitedly, and trusts they will have the manliness to resist it. It is not the first time that gentlemen on that side of the House have asked the South to rally against the North. During the last five years of bloody war their voices and their votes here and their actions elsewhere have been characterized by the same spirit, and have helped to unite and rally the South against the Union. It does not become these men who have so long pursued these revolutionary schemes against liberty to charge this House with being revolutionary when it is struggling to restore both liberty and Union to the Republic.

Mr. FINCK. Does the gentleman refer to what I said a few moments ago?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do.

Mr. FINCK. The gentleman has misstated what I said. I called upon the South to rally around the policy of Andrew Johnson; nothing about rebellion.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, Mr. Speaker, how much difference there is between the gentleman's sentiment as I repeated it and as he himself states it I leave it to the House to judge. I understood him to call upon the people of the South to have the manliness to resist the operations of Congress and of the great Union party.

Mr. FINCK. I did not use the word "resist."

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman can consult his notes. If he did not use the word he knows best, and I desire to be corrected if I misrepresent him. But I understood him to say that he trusted there was sufficient manhood in the people of the South to unite and resist the revolutionary schemes of this Congress, as he was pleased to denominate them.

Mr. FINCK. One word. I said I hoped they would have the firmness and manliness of spirit to unite and reject this proposed amendment, which was calculated to subordinate them as States in the Union.

Mr. GARFIELD. They have undertaken to reject and resist our scheme of restoring the Union for five years, and they propose now, and the gentleman by his own confession invites them to continue to unite and reject the scheme of the great Union party and of the people to build up liberty in this country and put down traitors and treason everywhere. I call upon the great Union party to stand together, and with all their manhood resist the revolutionary schemes not only of these rebels at the South, but of their coadjutors and abettors on this floor and everywhere who would unite with them and trample not only upon the prostrate body of the Union party, but, as I believe, of liberty herself. I have done.

Mr. THAYER obtained the floor.

Mr. FINCK. Will the gentleman allow me just one moment?

Mr. THAYER. I will yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. FINCK. I desire to say to my colleague, for whom I have the highest respect, that in my judgment there is but one party in this country that is a disunion party, and he belongs to it. [Laughter on the Republican side of the House.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I am willing to stand by my record as a Union man.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, the proceedings of the House to-day will, I trust, silence, at once and forever, the clamorous calumnies which have been industriously propagated by designing persons ever since this Congress convened, in which it was asserted that this Congress had no intention of taking any steps the object of which was the restoration of peace and concord to this whole country.

There have been persons, sir, very wise in their own conceit, great builders of States in their own judgment, and great law-makers, if their own opinions are to be received as truth, who have supposed that the great work upon which this Congress has entered was a work which might be accomplished with as much facility as a justice of the peace would dispose of an insignificant case in his court; and who saw, in the subject which engages the attention of this House, a matter of no grander dimensions than those which characterize the ordinary legislation of Congress. In the opinion of these persons the accumulated ruin of four years of civil war was to be remedied in an hour; States which were disorganized and rent from the parent Government by organized secession; by the deliberate and solemn act of conventions of the people; by the passage of laws during a period of four years; by the formation of new local governments; and by the exercise of every de facto sovereign power, were, in the opinion of these wiseacres, to be regenerated and restored to their normal relations to the Government, whose laws they had overthrown and trampled under foot, with as much facility as you would pass the most unimportant bill, and with as little delay as it would require to call the yeas and nays in this House.

Let the American people, Mr. Speaker, understand, as I doubt not they do generally understand, the magnitude of the ruin which has been caused by the rebellion, and they will comprehend the labors and the difficulties which attend the reconstruction of those old relations of loyalty and fidelity to the Constitution which once characterized these States.

Sir, for one, I have never lost my faith in the wisdom and discretion of the able committee to whom, at the outset of this Congress, this most important subject was committed. For one, I have not doubted that as soon as it could be accomplished, within as short a compass of time as the nature of the subject and the extent of the labors devolved upon them would permit, they would present to this House some scheme upon which the loyal people of the country might unite to effect a perfect restoration of peace and harmony throughout the United States. To the scheme which they have presented for that purpose, with the exception of one feature contained in it, and upon which I will presently remark, I am prepared, after due deliberation, to give my cordial assent and approval. The exception to which I refer is the provision of the third section of the proposed amendment to the Constitution.

With regard to the first section of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, I cannot conceive that any loyal man can hold any other view upon that subject than that which is indicated in the proposed amendment. The Constitution of the United States apportioned Representatives and direct taxes among the several States according to their respective numbers, and ordained that those numbers should be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those held to service for a term of years and Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons. So stood the Constitution at the commencement of the rebellion. By that instrument three fifths of the class of persons known as slaves were counted in the enumeration which fixed the basis of representation in this House.

How stands the Constitution now? Why, sir, the literal application of the Constitution to the present state of affairs makes this late slave population of the rebel States count in the representation in this body, not as three fifths, but as five fifths. Will any man say that that was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution? Will any man say that it was within the intention of the framers of that instrument that the late slaves in this country should, by an unforeseen state of public affairs, under a provision which enacted that they should count in the basis of representation as three fifths, come to count as five fifths, while at home they are counted politically as nothing? Yet this is what is proposed by those who oppose this amendment. It seems to me no man can maintain that proposition upon any principle of justice or sound political reasoning. What number of Representatives will this bring into this Chamber from the rebel States by way of increase over the former number that came here under the terms of the Constitution? About thirteen members. Is it not preposterous that after all the trials, the sacrifices, the sufferings, and the hardships caused by this great war for the Union the result of the success of the Government should be the increase of representation in this House on the part of those who made the rebellion, by adding thirteen members which they had not before the war? Is there a man here who dare go before the northern people and tell them that they are to be rewarded for the losses and sufferings which they have sustained by having thirteen additional members admitted into this body from the rebel States. I want to see the northern constituency that will send a Representative here who declares in plain terms that that is just and that he is in favor of it.

Now, I ask gentlemen on the other side of the House why that should be done. If you say that this large class of persons have been transformed from their late condition of chattels to a condition in which they constitute a part of the element of the political fabric, then I can conceive that having added that much in population to the thinking, voting men of the southern States, it would be just and proper that that addition should be represented in this body. But we all know that such is not the case. In those States themselves the late slaves do not enter into the basis of local representation. In South Carolina they do not enter into the basis of representation in the Legislature of that State. And anybody who will read the new constitution of South Carolina will see that such is the case.

Would it not be a most unprecedented thing that when this population are not permitted where they reside to enter into the basis of representation in their own State, we should receive it as an element of representation here; that when they will not count them in apportioning their own legislative districts, we are to count them as five fifths (no longer as three fifths, for that is out of the question) as soon as you make a new apportionment? I am not going to dwell upon that proposition. I believe it to be a proposition which the people of this country will understand without much discussion. You have only to enunciate that proposition in plain terms in order to secure for it the unqualified rebuke of every man who sustained the Government during the war for the Union.

With regard to the second section of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, it simply brings into the Constitution what is found in the bill of rights of every State of the Union. As I understand it, it is but incorporating in the Constitution of the United States the principle of the civil rights bill which has lately become a law, and that, not as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] suggested, because in the estimation of this House that law cannot be sustained as constitutional, but in order, as was justly said by the gentleman from Ohio who last addressed the House, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that that provision so necessary for the equal administration of the law, so just in its operation, so necessary for the protection of the fundamental rights of citizenship, shall be forever incorporated in the Constitution of the United States. But, sir, that subject has already been fully discussed, I have upon another occasion expressed my views upon it, and I do not propose to detain the House with any further remarks of my own upon it.

I pass now to the third section of the proposed amendment, and here, sir, I am constrained to say that I do not believe it to be either proper or expedient to retain this section of the proposed amendment. I do not believe it for the reason which is contained in the preamble of one of the bills reported by the committee, the "bill to provide for the restoration to the States lately in insurrection of their full political rights." The preamble of that bill, as reported by the committee, reads as follows:

Whereas it is expedient that the States lately in insurrection should, at the earliest day consistent with the future peace and safety of the Union, be restored to full participation in all political rights.

I am opposed to the third section of the proposed amendment because I am in favor of the preamble of the bill. I am opposed to it because it looks to me like offering to the people of the States lately in rebellion peace and restoration with one hand, while you snatch it from them with the other. I am opposed to it because I think it will keep this country, which we seek to pacify and to bring back to its old state of allegiance, in a state of constant turmoil and disaffection if it does not rekindle afresh the fires of civil war.

Sir, I suppose the object of the present programme to be to indicate a plan which has for its object the immediate, not the prospective, restoration of the people of these States to the privileges they have lost. Immediate, if the safety of the country will permit. If the safety of the country will not, upon any conditions, admit of it, then, sir, we had better dismiss the whole subject. If the safety of the country will admit of it, then let us name those conditions.

That, sir, is what the committee, in my understanding, have attempted to do; but among the conditions which they have named is this one, which, in my judgment, is not necessary or expedient, and which appears to me to be impolitic and fraught with dangerous consequences. Sir, with what propriety, let me ask this House, can we present an offer to the people of the South to return to their allegiance, and to unite with us once more in the maintenance in good faith of the Constitution, if, while we propose as a condition the ratification of an amendment to the Constitution, and as another condition the ineligibility of the leaders of the rebellion to Federal office, we say to them at the same time that, although you comply with these conditions, although you agree to adopt this amendment, although you agree that representation shall be based upon the numbers which constitute a part of the body-politic, although you agree that some example shall be made of this great iniquity by excluding from Federal office those who were ringleaders in it, yet you shall not be restored to the right of representation or to any participation in public affairs until the year 1870?

Now, sir, I am opposed to that; I think that it imperils the whole measure under consideration; and when I say that, I do not speak so much of the fate of that measure in this House as I speak of its fate in the country at large. I do not believe that the people of the loyal States will subscribe to either the necessity or the expediency of the third section of the proposed amendment to the Constitution. I believe, sir, that the masses of the loyal people of this country, those who made the greatest sacrifices to save it, are in favor of the restoration of these political rights to the southern people just as soon as they can be restored with safety; and I think that they regard as the only security and only safety which you can exact or obtain, the reform of the principle of representation, or rather the proper adjustment of the Constitution as regards representation to the new state of things. That is the point to which the loyal millions of this country turn their eyes for future peace and security. They know that if, instead of reducing the representation of the southern States in this House to a standard of just equality with ourselves, you leave the Constitution as it is to operate upon an unforeseen state of affairs, and give thirteen new Representatives to the lately disloyal States in this House upon a basis which they repudiate at home, there will be no peace and no security in the future for this Government. The inequality of representation worked by the result of the war in the emancipation of the slaves must be remedied. Representation must be based upon a population which is counted as a part of the body-politic and which forms an element of government. This must be done by an amendment of the Constitution, the original provisions of which are inapplicable to the altered condition of public affairs.

The loyal people who have preserved the Government demand this amendment to the Constitution. In my judgment, they will never, if they can prevent it, suffer this Government to be long without this amendment to the Constitution, because it would be a most unjust and cruel return for all the sacrifices which they have made, to deny them this measure of justice. But, sir, they do not, in my judgment, demand as a further price of security that the rehabilitation of the southern people, with all the rights of freemen, shall be postponed until 1870. I agree that it is just and expedient and proper that you should fasten a badge of shame upon this great crime of rebellion by rendering ineligible to office under the United States those who have been leaders in the insurrection against the Government. But, sir, this third section goes much further than this. It declares that the masses of the people in the lately insurrectionary States—because it is idle to talk of the people in connection with the infinitesimal number of Union men in those States—shall be disfranchised. We know that the masses of the people there, with exceptions too small to be counted, did support the rebellion, and supported it with their whole heart. They supported it in the field; they supported it by the payment of taxes; they supported it by speech and by votes; they supported it in every village and by every fireside. Everybody knows that. We cannot deny it. There is no use in attempting to conceal the fact. And in dealing with a great subject like this it is better to look facts in the face and treat them as facts. The third section of the proposed amendment disfranchises until 1870 this whole people, while the measure itself is presented to us as a measure of universal pacification as well as a measure for future security.

I do not believe, sir, that this feature of the measure which is proposed will meet the approval of our constituents. I believe that what the constituencies of the States now represented in Congress demand is, not prospective reconstruction, but immediate reconstruction with conditions that will secure the public safety. As I have already said, the great condition of public safety and security is the readjustment of the Constitution upon the subject of representation, that article of the Constitution which relates to the subject of representation having been pushed by the war from the original sphere of its operation, and which will, without amendment, operate in a manner never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution and with a degree of injustice to which the loyal States cannot consent to submit, and to which they will not submit if it can be prevented.

What will continue to be the condition of the country if you adopt this feature of the proposed plan? Continual distraction, continued agitation, continued bickerings, continued opposition to the law, and it will be well for the country if a new insurrection shall not spring from its bosom.

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

MR. NIBLACK. I give notice that I will offer the following amendment if I shall have the opportunity:

Add to the fifth section as follows:
Provided, That nothing contained in this article shall be so construed as to authorize Congress to regulate or control the elective franchise within any State, or to abridge or restrict the power of any State to regulate or control the same within its own jurisdiction, except as in the third section heretofore prescribed.

MR. BOYER. Many great questions of public policy depend upon the decision of this Congress, but the greatest of them all is that which involves the restoration of the States to their practical relations with the Federal Union. Until that great end shall have been accomplished the triumph of the Government over the rebellion will be still incomplete; and the rebellion itself may claim at least a partial victory in so far as it has succeeded in removing the ancient landmarks of the Constitution, and in marring the symmetry of that constitutional Union of States which, as it came from the hands of our fathers, was the masterpiece of human government and the admiration of the world.

After the outbreak of civil war, the first essential work of the nation was the forcible suppression of the rebellion. That work, after a four years' struggle, the most sanguinary and costly in the history of revolutions, has been fully accomplished. Thanks to the unparalleled gallantry and endurance of our soldiers, and the unparalleled patriotism, energy, and generosity of the people, armed rebellion against the laws has been everywhere subdued, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, and from the Aroostook to the Rio Grande, there is peace.

Exhausted by an unequal strife, conquered by overwhelming numbers, the late rebellious States lie prostrate at the feet of the Federal power, their population decimated and impoverished, their resources crippled and for the time well-nigh destroyed, and the cause for which they fought so madly and suffered so much hopelessly and forever lost. How shall the relations of national unity and harmony be restored between the States lately so discordant and belligerent? How shall the cruel wounds inflicted by the sections upon each other be healed? And above all, how shall the reunion be completed without the sacrifice of any of those principles and guarantees of civil liberty which we inherited, and without destroying the proportions of that political system of State and Federal jurisdiction which constituted the chief excellence of our Republic and has been the chief cause of its wonderful success? These are the important questions which devolve upon the present Congress of the United States. But however vast in its importance and comprehensive in its scope is the work which thus devolved upon Congress, it did not at first seem proportionately difficult. When Congress assembled in last December the lately rebellious States were already subdued and submissive, and all eager to renew their allegiance to the Constitution and the laws. Their Senators and Representatives were here to take the constitutional oath of office, and in the name of their respective States to pledge their fealty to the Federal authority. In other ways they had manifested their good faith. They rescinded their ordinances of secession. They adopted the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. To an ordinary observer not versed in the intricacies of party politics it must have appeared as if all the sacrifices of the war were about to be atoned by the blessings of a redeemed and reunited country. The temper of the southern people was most propitious. In answer to a resolution of the Senate, on the 18th of December, President Johnson said:

"In 'that portion of the Union lately in rebellion' the aspect of affairs is more promising than, in view of all the circumstances, could well have been expected. The people throughout the entire South evince a laudable desire to renew their allegiance to the Government, and to repair the devastations of war by a prompt and cheerful return to peaceful pursuits. An abiding faith is entertained that their actions will conform to their professions, and that, in acknowledging the supremacy of the Constitution and the laws of the United States, their loyalty will be unreservedly given to the Government, whose leniency they cannot fail to appreciate, and whose fostering care will soon restore them to a condition of prosperity."

On the same day, and in response to the same resolution of the Senate, General Grant said:

"My observations lead me to the conclusion that the citizens of the southern States are anxious to return to self-government within the Union as soon as possible; that while reconstructing they want and require protection from the Government; that they are in earnest in wishing to do what they think is required by the Government, not humiliating to them as citizens, and that if such a course were pointed out they would pursue it in good faith."

And he added these other significant words, as if to administer a rebuke to the proscriptive body of men to whom his language was addressed:

"It is to be regretted that there cannot be a greater commingling at this time between the citizens of the two sections, and particularly of those intrusted with the law-making power."

Such was the condition of affairs at the commencement of the present Congress. All obstacles to immediate reunion seemed to have been happily removed. At the South no man opposed. But lo, in this hour of the nation's hope and expectation, the leaders of the great so-called Union party stood at the doors of the Capitol and barred the way. They demanded of the repentant and returning rebels new guarantees as the price of representation in Congress. "You represent dead States," said one; "Treason is a crime and must be punished," said another; "Give the ballot to the negroes," said all of them; "Disfranchise nine tenths of your white voters," said another; "You are too many," said the chief among the leaders, "you will vote with the Democrats, and they and you together, being a majority of the people, will at the very first election turn the Republicans out of office."

It shall now be my purpose, as briefly as I can, to analyze and expose the nature of the guarantees in the absence of which this Congress proposes to perpetuate disunion. I maintain that they are no guarantees for the safety of the Republic which are wanted, but guarantees for the safety of the Republican party. For this it is that the hopes of the nation have been falsified, and great national responsibilities and interests sacrificed and betrayed. For this it was, and not for the restoration of the Union, that the joint committee of fifteen on reconstruction was invented. Its author and mover has been fitly enough placed at its head. From that moment disappointment ceased, for hope had fled. No sane or intelligent man in the country from that hour ever looked to the committee of fifteen for anything else than an ingenious scheme to keep out the southern States, and to prevent the restoration of the Union until after the next presidential election. I do not mean to attribute to the chairman of the committee of fifteen the sole responsibility of the acts or omissions of either the committee itself or of the Congress which created it. On the contrary, I concede that he truly represents the principles and policy of the majority in this Congress, and that the leadership is his, not only by parliamentary usage, but by the natural right which pertains to experience, ability, and courage. Nothing is further from my intentions than to indulge in unbecoming personalities; but I must be allowed to say that the selection of such a leader is a fact which affords me a legitimate argument in favor of the position I take. For months before Congress met my colleague from the Lancaster district had been abroad through the land, breathing proscription, and confiscation, and forfeiture of State rights, and advocating suffrage for millions of negroes and disfranchisement for millions of white men. All this was well known to every member of this House; for my colleague is no obscure person, and he is not in the habit of hiding his light under a bushel. When, therefore, I find this statesman the "head center" of the Republican majority, his acknowledged leadership is conclusive evidence that his policy is the policy of his party. In the first speech made by him in the beginning of this Congress he candidly stated that the new guarantees demanded of the southern States were intended for party purposes. In advocating the change in the basis of representation as it is now substantially embodied in the proposed constitutional amendment, he said:

"With the basis unchanged, the eighty-three southern members, with the Democrats that will in the best of times be elected from the North, will always give them a majority in Congress and in the Electoral College. They will at the very first election take possession of the White House and the Halls of Congress."

And again:

"If they should grant the right of suffrage to persons of color, I think there would always be Union white men enough in the South, aided by the blacks, to divide the representation, and thus continue the Republican ascendancy."

In none of the speeches which have been made upon this floor by other prominent leaders of the majority will be found any declaration of motive so outspoken as that of the chairman of the committee on reconstruction. But in all of them will be found a course of argument in harmony with the policy declared by him, and adverse to the immediate restoration of the Union. The Congressional Globe groans beneath the weight of innumerable columns of labored argument to prove that eleven States are States no more, but subjugated provinces outside of the Union, and subject to the absolute will of the conqueror. To prove this disunion theory the various authors upon international law have been ransacked, and Grotius and Vattel have been misapplied and perverted with an amount of zeal and industry which might be entitled to commendation if employed to unite instead of to divide the country.

I do not propose to follow these learned doctors through the labyrinths which lead to the theoretical death and amputation of eleven members of the body-politic. For after all the refinements of logic and the subtleties of foreign lore have been exhausted they fail to answer the simple practical question. If, as admitted by all, secession was a failure and the war a success, how did the rebellious States get out of the Union? If they are States in the Union shall we appeal to Grotius and Vattel to define their rights, and the status of their people, and the extent of the Federal power over them? Or shall we rather go to the fountain head of our own political system, the Constitution of the United States, and to the writings of those who made it? What, indeed, if the States were dead, or as some with more refinement than others express it, in a state of suspended animation, what might we then expect from a body of patriotic statesmen assembled for the reconstruction of the Government? Which would be the purer and the nobler statesmanship, to trample upon the inanimate carcasses of the prostrate States with the iron heels of political proscription and sectional hate, or to breathe into their passive forms anew the breath of life, and start them again in the career of honor, prosperity, and equality?

In elaboration and earnest zeal the arguments of the majority for the exclusion of States from the Union are only equaled by the efforts of the same reasoners in favor of the disfranchisement of their people after they get in. This is proposed by the joint committee on reconstruction as a condition precedent to their admission at all. The purpose of this wholesale disfranchisement of the white people of the South who have been engaged in the rebellion becomes more clearly evident when we consider the coördinate branch of the same scheme for acquiring control of the ballot-box by the enfranchisement of the blacks. Upon what a comprehensive basis of philanthropy these political artificers profess to build the theory of "no distinction of race or color!" To what a sublime pitch of eloquent declamation they swell this lofty theme of universal brotherhood. But everything has its limit; and so it seems has the humanity of the Republican majority of the Thirty-Ninth Congress and its legitimate representative, the reconstruction committee. As a set-off to these glowing dissertations in favor of the political rights of about four million American negroes, we have from the same source arguments equally elaborate and expressions of emotion equally as intense in favor of the right and justice of excluding from all political privileges about twice that many millions of white Americans.

Both those objects are sought to be accomplished by the proposed amendment to the Constitution reported by the committee, and now before the House for discussion. That amendment, together with the bills reported in connection with the same, is submitted to the House and the country as the best considered plan of reconstruction which the committee, after five months' incubation, have been able to produce for the consolation of a distracted nation. The plan is, at least in my opinion, most admirably adapted to its design, which was nothing more nor less than the solution of the problem of "how not to do it." In this I think it may be fairly said, in justice to the committee, that they have fully met the public expectation.

The terms laid down by the committee as the conditions precedent to the admission of representatives in Congress from the States lately in insurrection are of such a nature as to preclude any reasonable hope of their acceptance. The third section of the proposed constitutional amendment, which I propose first to consider, is itself sufficient to convince any reflecting man that the amendment is not intended for adoption, but only to operate by means of its expected non-adoption as an excuse for the exclusion of southern representatives for an indefinite period. It reads as follows:

SEC. 3. Until the 4th day of July, in the year 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for representatives in Congress and for electors for President and Vice President of the United States.

The effect of this amendment, if adopted, would be to disfranchise for a period of over four years nine tenths of the voting population of eleven States. Does any sane man believe such terms would be accepted? When in the history of nations did a free people voluntarily consent to such a degradation? It is a condition which could not be accepted with honor, and it is a condition, therefore, which is not fit to be proposed to any American community by an American Congress.

But it is said that we have the rightful power to impose such a condition. If we had, its exercise would still be most unwise. It needs no argument to demonstrate that in statesmanship magnanimity is a nobler quality, and withal a sounder policy, than tyranny; and that it is better for a Government to call forth blessings by its clemency than to provoke the curses of a people by its oppression.

But I deny altogether the right of the Federal Government to disfranchise the majority of the citizens of any State on account of their past participation in the rebellion. They who have committed treason are amenable to the laws, even after they have returned to their allegiance. But you cannot make new laws and a new Constitution to meet their case. Treason is undoubtedly a crime and may be punished, but by no bill of attainder or ex post facto law such as is provided in the amendment before the House.

The ninth section of the first article of the Constitution declares—

"No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

That single prohibition is in itself a complete answer to all that has been said in support of the doctrine of the reconstruction committee. If any further answer were needed, it would be found in the ninth and tenth articles of the same instrument:

"ART. 9. The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

"ART. 10. The powers not delegated to the United States are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

It will not do to say that the civil war has abrogated the constitutional rights of rebellious citizens, and that vengeance beyond the boundaries of what is written is to be justified to the Federal Government by right of conquest. Not only is such a doctrine opposed by the express prohibitions of the Constitution, but Congress and the whole nation stand pledged before the world against any such interpretation. After the civil war had commenced, and after a great battle had been fought, Congress passed through both Houses, by an almost unanimous vote, the following resolution:

"That this war is not prosecuted upon our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and all laws made in pursuance thereof, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

Everywhere throughout the loyal sections of the country this was the accepted doctrine, and under it and for it the nation's treasure was poured out and the nation's blood was shed. It was our tower of strength, and clothed us in the indestructible panoply of right. Shall we now, when the war is over, be told that this was only a sham, a blind to delude the people and recruit the armies?

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] in his speech delivered upon this subject on the 21st of April, based his argument for the right to disfranchise the population of the late rebellious States upon the doctrine of self-preservation as the universal right and duty of nations. He argued this right upon an assumed state of facts with great force and learning; but the proof of the main premises of his proposition he altogether omitted. He assumed without proof that such disfranchisement is in this case necessary for the preservation of the nation; and that essential link being wanting, his entire elaborate argument falls to the ground.

If there does exist any necessity for the disfranchisement of the people of eleven States of this Union it must be because if suffered to vote for representatives and for President they would be numerically strong enough through the legitimate channels of legislation to control the Government of the country. But it is plain that of themselves they constitute a very perceptible minority of the entire nation. How, then, could they get control of the Government? It is plain that they never could acquire the sway in Congress or elect a President except with the help of a sufficient number of loyal voters in other sections of the country to constitute with themselves a majority of the whole people. In what attitude does this leave the party who upon this ground are striving to exclude southern representatives? Why, in the attitude of a conscious minority engaged in a conspiracy to keep the control of the Government against the will of a majority of the people of the whole country.

Will it be pretended that, counting in the population of all sections, those who seek to destroy the country are more numerous than those who desire to save it? If this be so, the country is already doomed, and there is no salvation for it. If, on the other hand, a majority of the whole people will stand by the country, it is not in the power of any sectional minority to destroy it, and the loyal majority can better and more safely govern the opposing minority, if there be such, inside of the Union than out of it. I know there are men on this floor who seek every opportunity to insult the common sense of the country by harangues attributing to the Democratic party at the North complicity with the rebellion. If this atrocious slander had in it any truth; if the great Democratic party of the North, instead of sending its hundreds of thousands of volunteers into the ranks of the Federal armies, had gone over to the enemy or had remained only passive spectators of the scene, the victorious rebels would long ago have taken possession of the capital and the country. No one party can rightfully boast of having saved the country, and those who are the most bloody-minded and prescriptive in the uses of victory, as a general rule, have shed the least blood in its achievement.

I have considered the third section of the amendment reported by the committee, first, because it is the most objectionable of all the parts. I am opposed, however, to any further constitutional amendments as conditions to representation in Congress of any State in the Union. But my limited time will not allow me to dwell at much length upon the remaining sections.

The first section embodies the principles of the civil rights bill, and is intended to secure ultimately, and to some extent indirectly, the political equality of the negro race. It is objectionable also in its phraseology, being open to ambiguity and admitting of conflicting constructions.

The second section of the amendment is ostensibly intended to remedy a supposed inequality in the basis of representation. The real object is to reduce the number of southern representatives in Congress and in the Electoral College; and also to operate as a standing inducement to negro suffrage. It may indeed be said that there is some well-founded objection to the present basis of representation. But while eleven States remain without any representation in either House of Congress we may well postpone all minor reforms until the Constitution as it now is shall be first applied in good faith by those self-same Constitution menders. Justice and equality might also be promoted by carrying the reform into some other quarters. There can, for example, be no good reason founded in justice and equality why the six New England States, with a population of little over three millions, should have twelve votes in the Senate of the United States, and the State of New York, with a population of about four millions, only two. Would it not promote justice and equality to reconstruct in this respect New England's lucky six as well as Dixie's unlucky eleven?

The fourth section of the amendment prohibits the assumption of the rebel debt by the United States or any of them. But I imagine there is no hot haste required to prohibit by a constitutional enactment the payment of this debt by the bankrupt States of the South; and I do not suppose that any man outside of a lunatic asylum ever dreamed it would be paid by any one else. Besides, a constitutional amendment has already been passed this session by Congress to the same effect.

The fifth and last section of the amendment empowers Congress to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the article.

Upon this latter it will not be necessary to remark.

The amendment is accompanied by a bill, the first section of which proposes to prescribe the conditions of the future admission of the States in these words:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the above recited amendment shall have become part of the Constitution of the United States, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same, and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oaths of office, be admitted into Congress as such."

It will be observed that even after any State lately in insurrection shall have complied with the condition, "and shall have ratified the amendment and modified its constitution in conformity therewith, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if duly elected and qualified, may," not shall, but "may," "after having taken the required oaths of office, be admitted into Congress as such."

The precious boon thus graciously tendered by the reconstruction committee as the reward of absolute submission to all its behests is after all but a chance of representation dependent upon the pleasure of that or some similar committee, and to be regulated, doubtless, by the political exigencies of the times. Perpetual exclusion, of course, is not contemplated by the committee, and representation is doubtless intended to be allowed at as early a day as is consistent with the safety of the Republican party; and the four years' disfranchisement provided by the third section is only intended to make the next presidential election entirely sure, and to secure a safe working majority in Congress to support the incoming Administration.

The imaginations of some gentlemen become strangely excited in the argument of this question of southern representation. There are those who declaim upon it as if it were proposed to bring into this House unrepentant rebels still breathing treason against the Government and plotting its overthrow while claiming to have a voice in its councils. There is no such proposition. If there were such a proposition I am sure it would have no advocates upon this floor. If such representatives were sent from the South, the majority have the power to exclude them, or to expel them after they had obtained an entrance.

It is argued that those who have once rebelled against the Government deserve to be disfranchised; but you cannot disfranchise a majority of the voters of a State without the establishment of an oligarchy; and the Constitution as our fathers made it guarantees a republican form of government to every State.

Besides, it is not for them alone that the Union is to be restored, but for ourselves also, and our children. Every hour during which we govern the eleven States with their twelve million people as conquered provinces carries us further away from the original landmarks of the Constitution and brings us nearer to centralization and military despotism.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I know not that I am called specially to give utterance to my thoughts on this measure. The report of the committee does not meet my expectation, and one of its propositions is in conflict with some of my well-considered convictions. If, however, those with whom I am sent to cooperate in this House deem this measure wise and expedient, I will vote for it. I am prompted to speak because it will enable me to gratify gentlemen on the other side of the House, by allowing them to hear voices from one of the disfranchised States. They will, I know, be gratified to learn that they are not entirely voiceless or powerless on this floor.

One thing attracted my attention and doubtless that of others while listening to the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] and that of my eloquent colleague, [Mr. BOYER,] and that was that either of them embodied in the text of his speech the text of the amendment they were discussing. I do not think this omission was accidental. I apprehend they would rather their constituents should read their denunciatory remarks than the language of the propositions under consideration.

They have not discussed any provision of the proposed amendment. I will not say they dare not discuss them clause by clause and denounce them as they have, but it would evince a high degree of political courage.

Let us look at these provisions so fearfully denounced by the gentlemen. Does my colleague think he could go safely through his district in Pennsylvania denouncing the proposition to embody in the Constitution of the United States a provision that—

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws?

There is not a man in Montgomery or Lehigh county that will not say those provisions ought to be in the Constitution if they are not already there.

Again, sir, dare he read to his constituents the language of the second section and reiterate his denunciations of it? It is as follows:

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever in any State the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age.

Shall the pardoned rebels of the South include in the basis of representation four million people to whom they deny political rights, and to no one of whom is allowed a vote in the selection of a Representative? Can he tell the men of the boroughs of Norristown and Allentown that one red-handed rebel in South Carolina is of right and ought to be the equal of three of the best and most patriotic of them on the floor of Congress or in the college for the election of President and Vice President? He dare not do it. They would spurn him and the insulting proposition. The men who fought the rebels and crushed their confederacy would say, give us at least equal consideration and power with the traitors against whom we fought, and who caused the death of three hundred thousand of our patriotic brethren.

I come, sir, to the third section. To strike that out would, in my judgment, be to emasculate the amendment. It is as follows:

SEC. 3. Until the 4th day of July, 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for Representatives in Congress and for electors for President and Vice President of the United States.

Who ought to govern this country? The men who for more than four years sustained bloody war for its overthrow, or they whom my colleague designates as "that proscriptive body of men known as the great Union party" who maintained the Government against the most gigantic rebellion since that which Satan led? I quote my colleague's language, and I ask him whether he dare go before our fellow-citizens and argue that magnanimity requires us to hand the Government over immediately to the vanquished but unconverted rebels of the South.

He says, and so does the gentleman from Ohio, that those States are in the Union, and that their people cannot be disfranchised.

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir, very briefly.

Mr. BOYER. I did not propose by anything I said to hand this Government over to the control of rebels. As I understand it the people of the South, once rebels, are rebels no longer; and I say that when they are ready to submit to the laws, as I believe they are, and send loyal men to represent them in this Hall, they have a right to be here and a right to be heard in the affairs of the Government.

Mr. KELLEY. I will not reply to the gentleman in my own language, but from the pen of one who was as faithful to the rebellion and the confederacy as he, but made greater sacrifices for them. For he was in North Carolina and stood by the confederacy until its last army was surrendered. I read from his letter of 3d instant.

Mr. BOYER. Do I understand my colleague to say that I was faithful to the rebellion?

Mr. KELLEY. I say this: that the Democratic party of the North fought for the rebellion where there was no personal danger as zealously as the Democratic party of the South did on the field of mortal danger.

Mr. BOYER. And I say that my colleague fights for disunion as zealously as ever armed traitors at the South fought for it during the rebellion.

Mr. KELLEY. Opinions differ—that is all. Nothing further need be said on that subject.

In this letter of May 3, my clear-headed and statesmanlike correspondent says:

"I have always held that it was absurd in us, after being reduced to submission by the Federal Government, to set up any claim of right to regulate the terms of settlement.

"To me it is simply ridiculous to assert that the States had both the right to secede, and upon a failure to establish it, the right to return at pleasure. No conclusion is more logical to my mind than this, namely, that if the right of secession existed and was exercised, the States are now conquered territory; or that, if it did not exist, the people, after attempting and failing in a revolution, forfeited their most valuable political rights. And in either case the consequences are practically not very different. Whatever I may think of the wisdom of your plan of reconstruction, the right of the Government to make one, nobody but an insane man can deny. Like the vanquished everywhere, I think the people of the South will reap true glory now in fortitude alone."

That comes from as stout a champion of secession, rebellion, and war as there was on the floor of Congress during the war—one who gave four years and most of his property to sustain the cause.

I turn to another distinguished son of the same State.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask the gentleman to give the name of the author of that letter.

Mr. KELLEY. Sir, so bloody-minded are some of the baser sort of the reconstructed that I am not disposed to offer a victim or two upon the altar of the curiosity of the distinguished leader of the Democracy from New Jersey. [Laughter.]

This letter is a little older than the other. It is dated April 24:

"The course of events has not surprised me much, though it grieves me exceedingly. I saw, or thought I saw, that the best thing for the whole country, especially for the South, was entire harmony between the President and the party which elected him. That harmony has been broken, I fear, without hope of restoration. I cannot but think that the President has committed a great blunder, if not a great crime. I know verily that for two or three months after the surrender—until indeed his restoration policy was fully developed and considered here a fixed fact notens notens—the southern mind was more like a blank sheet of paper than I have ever knew it, more free from prejudice, more disposed to broad national views, and more susceptible to impressions favorable to the North and northern men and northern ideas. Upon that blank sheet of paper might have been written enduring characters of peace, union, and harmony between every section of the Republic. But the time was lost; when it will return, God only knows. I give it as my deliberate conviction that the prospect is darkening every day. Sectional pride, sectional hate, sectional ideas are as rampant here as they were before the war. Is it so at the North? I cannot believe it is so. But I am told that the determination is fixed to let no part of the fruits of the war pass away till all be fulfilled. This is right. Nor do I believe that our people will come to their senses until they realize this fact beyond cavil or dispute. The notion is sedulously inculcated here that the Northwest is thoroughly with the President and against Congress."

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that such false notions are sedulously inculcated, and produce much evil.

And the absurd notions inculcated here by gentlemen who claim to be the peculiar friends of the South are misleading the poor, impulsive, passion-ruled people of that section, and prompting them to such deeds as were perpetrated last week at Memphis, encouraging them to resist all efforts at conciliation and social reconstruction, impelling them to drive northern men and capital from their respective neighborhoods, and by threats and deeds of violence to retard the material development of their own section and the interlinking of ours with theirs by the ties of friendship, of commerce. Yes, it is by promulgating such groundless delusions and catering to their wounded pride that the hour of safe and perfect reconstruction is delayed. No consideration is more important than the animus of the masses of the southern people; and he is not their friend who blinds their judgment or fires their hatred against the overwhelming majority of the people of the North.

Yet what does the third section of the proposed amendment, which my colleague says the people of the South cannot accept without dishonor, provide? Why, that at the end of four little years all those who by the crime of treason or the act of secession have disfranchised themselves shall vote and the past shall be politically forgiven, if not forgotten. Will my colleague dare go to his people on the ground that this offer is inhuman? Will he ask them as he did us how, if secession was a failure and the war a success, the States got out of the Union or the people lost their political rights. My Carolina letter answers that. If secession was a right it was exercised, and they are conquered territory; and if it was not a right, the people embarked in rebellion and have lost all civil and political rights, and the consequences are practically the same.

Mr. BOYER. Where does my colleague find his authority for saying that they have lost all their civil and political rights?

Mr. KELLEY. I referred to the letter from the gentleman's coworker in the southern wing of the Democratic party during the last four years, my correspondent from North Carolina.

Mr. BOYER. I ask better authority than that of a rebel, although he may pass current with my colleague.

Mr. KELLEY. The time was when such would have been a good deal better than Republican authority with the gentleman.

Mr. BOYER. It is just as good to-day as the authority of the gentleman.

Mr. KELLEY. No advantage will accrue from involving great national questions in personal wrangles. I quoted the authority, and will ram it down the gentleman's throat in the sixth district in the coming congressional campaign.

Mr. BOYER. You had better take care of your own congressional district, and I will take care of mine. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I think so, too.

Mr. KELLEY. I am in the habit of taking care of my district, and mean to do it.

Mr. Speaker, this section which is denounced as so degrading to the people of the rebellious States simply proposes, as I have shown, to restore to them at the end of four years those rights which the sensible people of the South know they have lost, and which they despise Andrew Johnson for attempting to restore by unconstitutional means. He has committed, said one of them, in the letter from which I read an extract, a great blunder, if not a great crime; and that is the sentiment of the brave men who fought us in the South.

The next section which the gentleman opposes is this:

SEC. 4. Neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation already incurred, or which may hereafter be incurred, in aid of insurrection or of war against the United States, or any claim for compensation for loss of involuntary service or labor.

There is not a voter in Pennsylvania that does not approve that proposition. The men of our State do not mean that the people of the United States or future emigrants to the southern States shall be taxed to pay the rebel debts or for slaves set free by war; and I mean that they shall see what the provisions are that the gentlemen assail with broad generalities and laudations of our modern "Moses." By the way, I may as well remark that gentlemen are mistaken when they suppose that Governor Johnson, in his speech to the colored people of Nashville, referred to the Moses of sacred history. He did not; he referred to the "Moses" of modern story, whose razors were "made to sell and not to shave." He should not be censured because the enthusiastic hope of the poor freedmen misinterpreted his allusion. But to resume. It will not do to avoid the terms of this amendment. Gentlemen will have to confront them face to face.

I shall, Mr. Speaker, vote for this amendment; not because I approve it. Could I have controlled the report of the committee of fifteen, it would have proposed to give the right of suffrage to every loyal man in the country. I do not believe, with my colleague, that our Government rests on the complexion of its people, or the color of their hair. I believe that a patriot is a better citizen than a traitor. He talks of a proposition to enfranchise millions of negroes and disfranchise millions of white men. He does not use the language which his constituents will use, which is, that the friends of impartial suffrage propose to disfranchise traitors and to enfranchise patriots. They propose to punish treason and reward loyalty; and I know the people of Pennsylvania well enough to know how they will respond to that proposition.

Mr. BOYER. I desire to ask my colleague what sort of a government he would call that in which nine tenths of the adult male population are not allowed to vote—whether that is the kind of republican government which he has been telling us the Constitution guarantees to every State?

Mr. KELLEY. Sir, if nine tenths of the people of a State commit felony, and are convicted of it, they are deprived of the right to vote; and armed and warring treason involves all crimes. While, therefore, bloody-handed traitors, though numbering nine tenths of the people, are disfranchised by law, let the loyal people carry on the republican government of the State.

Mr. BOYER. One more question.

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir; no further interruption. My colleague believes that in South Carolina four sevenths of the people, every soul of whom were loyal, should be disfranchised, and three sevenths, every soul of whom were disloyal, should govern the whole seven hundred thousand people of the State. That is not republicanism. That is not democratic republicanism. That is not the sort of republicanism to which the interests and destiny of this country can be safely confided.

Mr. BOYER. My colleague is very apt to interrupt other gentlemen; and I trust he will have the courtesy to permit me, in this connection, to ask him one other question; and that is, whether he would disfranchise nine tenths of the adult male population of a State because of their treason after they have repented of that treason, have become loyal citizens, and returned to their obedience to the Constitution and the laws? I ask him whether he would, for the sake of punishing them still further, establish oligarchies in these States, by excluding the great mass of their citizens from the ballot-box.

Mr. KELLEY. Sir, if Probst, who recently murdered eight members of one family in my city, repented ever so much, I should still say, enforce the law against him; if you find his mental and moral nature so low that you ought not to execute him, because you do not believe him to be responsible, keep him in the penitentiary for the residue of his life, but never turn him loose on society. Protect society against him, however penitent he may profess to be. He only killed eight persons—some of these rebels, for whose equal citizenship the gentleman contends, killed their hundreds, and all of them struck at the life of the nation. This measure does not propose to punish them; on the contrary, it is an act of amnesty, and proposes, after four years, to reinvest them with all their rights, which they do not possess at this time because of their crime.

The only other section of this much abused proposition is as follows:

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

So far as I am individually concerned, I object to the amendment as a whole, because it does not go far enough and propose to at once enfranchise every loyal man in the country. I wish to see its power asserted by the Government. I want to see traitors in heart or head, those who would hatch or effect treason, made to understand that the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land; that treason is a crime which must be made odious; that traitors must be punished; and that it is the purpose of the governing people of the North, "that proscriptive body of men known as the great Union party," to maintain these propositions beyond "all cavil or dispute."

Mr. SMITH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLEY. A short one.

Mr. SMITH. I would ask the gentleman if he is in favor of disfranchising all the colored men who went into the rebel army.

Mr. KELLEY. I am in favor of disfranchising every traitor in the land, whether he be white or black. But I do not believe the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] can find a black voluntary traitor. Millions of colored people were property when the war began; they were owned; they were dragged or driven like cattle to where their owners would have them go; and if that was to the battle-field, being there they defended their lives. They were not allowed to assume responsibility when they were owned. Therefore do not adduce the fact that the master dragged his bound, his horse, or his slave into the field as evidence against the poor chattel. Prove the treason, make it evident in any way that he was a volunteer in the cause of the rebellion, then punish him as though he had been General Robert E. Lee.

Mr. SMITH. I happened to have seen myself in the field colored men who were volunteers in the rebel service; who were captured with arms in their hands; and who confessed that they had gone into the rebel service of their own accord. I have seen in the city of Washington, since I have had the honor of being a member of Congress, black men whose whole sympathies were with the South, and I must say, in opposition to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] that I do not feel like hanging these men of dark complexion who have voluntarily gone into the rebel army as privates. I wish to forgive them. Yet these men, as black as the ace of spades, went into the rebel army of their own accord to fight against the Government and against you, and yet you would not hang one of them, while you would hang the white men who volunteered as they did to go into the rebel army.

Mr. KELLEY. Do you think they ought to vote because they fought for the rebellion, as you would have these others? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. Now the laugh comes from the other side. [Renewed laughter.] That is pretty good. Now, I do not object to letting the black rebel vote if he was a voter before the rebellion. But the State of Alabama from whence these men came—

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman has got through his question, I suppose.

Mr. SMITH. A moment.

Mr. KELLEY. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has two minutes of his time left.

Mr. KELLEY. I want to say in those two minutes that all that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] says may be true. I have known colored men to come in all along our lines, bringing their arms, ammunition, and sometimes horses with them, saying they had pretended to volunteer in the rebel service, in order that they might get to the front and run over to the land of freedom. I have no doubt there were thousands of such cases, and I should, therefore, require more proof to convict a freedman, whose master was in the rebel service, of treason than I would to convict Lee or any of the volunteer soldiers of the rebel army who were freemen, the masters of their own bodies, the possessors, under God, of their own souls, as the poor negroes were not allowed to be.

Mr. SMITH. Now I will take the other half a minute. I wish to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] in support of his own position, that I have been myself—if I may be pardoned for using that expression at this time—the recipient of the kindest and strongest and most loyal admonitions of that dark-complexioned race of which the gentleman has just been speaking. I have known an instance in which my own regiment and myself, and, as I believed at the time, the interest of the "front" to which I was ordered, were protected and saved by a man born in slavery, a man as dark as Egyptian blackness itself.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman whether a white traitor is better entitled to vote for Congress and President than that dark-skinned patriot.

Mr. SCHENCK obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to finish my speech.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH?]

Mr. SCHENCK. For how long?

Mr. SMITH. I only want a minute.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well.

Mr. SMITH. I wish to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and to the House and to the country, that because of the action of that black man to whom I have referred, I secured to him his freedom by transporting him, under the authority of the Government, beyond the section of country where men were held as slaves; and for this he gave me his thanks, which I appreciate. No man to-day is more willing and more determined to interest himself in giving to these people full and complete protection than I am. I yield nothing to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] I yield nothing to that class of men, in a readiness to acknowledge and reward the services of men, black as well as white, who have been faithful to this Government.

Mr. SCHENCK. I believe I must resume the floor. The gentleman asked me for one minute and I have given him two.

Mr. Speaker, I have no prepared speech upon this very grave subject which we have now under discussion; and it is very possible that I shall not occupy nearly the whole of the thirty minutes allowed me by the rule which has been adopted. Still, I desire that whatever I may say upon the single point to which I propose to confine myself may be said without interruption; and I hope gentlemen will take this as a notice to permit me to proceed in my own way to develop whatever idea I may have, if I have a clear one upon the subject at all.

I shall not speak of this proposed constitutional amendment at large. I should not have spoken with reference to it at all, at least at this time, but for the point which has been made in reference to a single one of its provisions. Objection is specially made to the third section, as it stands in the report of the committee. That section, as proposed to be incorporated into the organic law of the United States, is in these words:

Until the 4th day of July, in the year 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for Representatives in Congress and for electors for President and Vice President of the United States.

I do not say, Mr. Speaker, that this section, any more than other sections of the amendment, is embodied precisely in the language which I would have used, or indicates precisely the change in the Constitution which I would have preferred, had the choice rested solely with me. But I am bound, like all other gentlemen, to submit my peculiar opinions in reference to this amendment, and every point and proposition which it contains, to what may seem to be the common sense of this House and of Congress, so that we may together arrive at what may seem to be nearest right, and yet capable of being agreed upon by all of us, or by a proper majority. I shall therefore raise now no question of criticism, nor insist upon the language which I would have used, or the form which I would have preferred in presenting a similar or equivalent proposition.

The objection which has been made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to that particular feature of this amendment, is, as I understand him, this, that it seems to conflict with previous legislation of Congress which authorized the President to grant pardon or amnesty to those who had been engaged in the insurrection, and that now, after pardon or amnesty, proclaimed either to individuals or classes, it seems an act of bad faith to punish further and again by denying the right of the elective franchise to any of these men who have been aiding and abetting the rebellion. I state the objection, I think, in the broadest and fullest extent to which it seems to go, and with all the force with which it seems to have struck the mind of my friend from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] At first it does seem to be a startling proposition. On the surface it would appear as if there was some bad faith in granting amnesty, in pardoning, and yet, as it were, still pursuing these insurgents and depriving them of certain privileges as additional punishment. If I understood this to be punishment, if I understood it to be a penalty imposed on them, depriving them of rights which they now enjoy, I would agree to the proposition made by the gentleman from Maine, and say that there is an inconsistency between the former action of Congress and the executive clemency exercised in carrying out the authority given by Congress, and that which is now proposed in the shape of amendment to your Constitution.

But, sir, I do not regard it in that light, and it is for the purpose of showing wherein it struck me differently that I propose for a few minutes to occupy the attention of the House.

Sir, the people of this country and those controlling the interests of the country now in official capacity are struggling between two ideas, more or less clearly defined on either side, and influencing the action of those who espouse them. There is, on one hand, what is called the President's theory for reconstruction of the States, and on the other what may be termed the congressional theory. As I understand the idea of the President of the United States, although his "policy" and his practice I must say on this very subject have been by no means consistent—it is this, that the States which have been in rebellion are now as much as any States of this Union, in full, complete, and equal relation to all the other States; that their rights are in all respects the same; that among these rights is included the privilege of unquestioned representation here in the councils of the nation, and that to shut them out from the enjoyment of this is to do them, therefore, absolute wrong.

Now, sir, I will not stop to inquire when that right attached. I will not stop to inquire whether the argument which would prove that proposition would not equally well prove that all through the rebellion, inasmuch as secession was a void act, these States and their people were fully and completely possessed of all rights in the Union, and therefore entitled to representation as now. I do not see where the argument is to stop. If the proposition be true, then at any time during the progress of the rebellion Virginia might have elected Robert E. Lee a Senator to represent that State and her sovereignty at the other end of the Capitol, or any of those men who were serving under him as chiefs of division and brigade to represent districts here upon this floor; and to have excluded them would have been to take away the right of Virginia and of the people of Virginia to be represented in either branch of Congress. And Robert E. Lee and other such arch-traitors could have appeared here on the floor of Congress and spent their winter in obstructing legislation intended for the purpose of aiding the executive and war-making power in putting down the rebellion, and whenever the spring opened and they were ready for another campaign, might have taken the field in order by force of arms to attempt the destruction of the Government for which they legislated! Monstrous absurdity!

I will not stop, however, to ask when the time came, at what date the States were entirely and thoroughly and completely restored to that equal relation, because I do not believe they had any such equal, complete, normal relation as they once enjoyed while they were States in full communion with the rest of the Union. If I believed it, if I admitted that theory as to the present condition of the States, then it would follow with me necessarily that I should regard these people as having the right to vote for electors of President and Vice President and for members of Congress, and if they possessed this right, then to take away from them, either by statute law or organic law, the due exercise of it, would be imposing on them a penalty and punishment in addition to anything else they may have before been deprived of.

Rejecting this presidential theory, as it may be termed, I come then to the congressional theory on this subject. I will not stop to go into the inquiry whether these States have ever been out of the Union or not.

I do not believe they ever have. I do not subscribe to the doctrine of their having been reduced to the condition of Territories in the sense in which many understand it. I believe we had the right to subdue them, and subject them to obedience precisely upon the same principle on which a father punishes his own child when he has misbehaved. He thrashes his wicked and graceless son because he is his son, and not the child of a stranger. I believe we have a like right to inflict punishment on these rebellious States. In the domestic circle we shut the erring child up in a dark closet, or put him pointing in a corner, and keep him in disgrace away from the table, surrounded by the rest of the inmates of the family, until he has completely, and to our satisfaction, shown by penitence and a manifestation of a proper disposition that he means to deport himself better in the future; and no such sinning child has a right to complain of the discipline which keeps him in a place where he has by bad conduct put himself until he returns to good behavior.

But to the congressional theory. I understand it to be this: that these rebellious States have of themselves, as far as they have the power to do so, broken away from their normal and proper relations to the rest of the States; that when they thus broke away, though they did not release themselves from their obligations, they forfeited certain rights, and among others, after refusing to be represented here, disclaiming their allegiance and denying their connection through representation with the rest of the States, they forfeited that right of representation and cannot regain it until it is properly and by law restored.

And I understand, further, the theory to be that they can be properly restored only by law, and that until a law is enacted by which any State that has thus flung itself out of its proper relations to the Union is permitted to come back and stand upon a footing with other States and enjoy its representation here, such right of representation cannot be regained by that State.

Now, if this be the true theory, as I think it is, then I have no difficulty on account of the objection made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] because if those States have flung away their right of representation, if they have forfeited by their misbehavior their right to claim their old, normal, formerly existing relation to the rest of the States, it is to be a work of subsequent enactment when and upon what conditions such rights and relations shall be restored to them.

Fully believing this, I aver that there is nothing that should be regarded as penalty or punishment in this third section of the proposed amendment. It takes nothing away from the people of those States. It does not disfranchise, but refuses to enfranchise. If you say that the people of these States, because of their having been engaged in the rebellion, shall not vote for Federal officers, there is nothing taken from them, because they have already divested themselves of that privilege, voluntarily abandoned, given it up, flung it away by breaking loose from the rest of the Union, as far as by their act, disposition, and power they could do so.

These States, then, are not in the condition in which Ohio and Pennsylvania are. If we should pass a statute, or undertake to amend our Constitution so as to make a discrimination between the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania and the other States of the Union, saying that certain persons in those loyal States shall not enjoy and exercise the elective franchise, either through entire time hereafter or through a probationary term, a limited period, we do wrong to those States; because Ohio and Pennsylvania and the citizens of those States have not already disfranchised themselves and wickedly and madly thrust their privileges and rights away.

But the rebel States are in an entirely different condition. They have divested themselves, by breaking up the normal relations existing between them and the other States, of the privilege, and their people at this time have no right to vote for President or members of Congress; and if they can only be restored as States, as reorganized communities, as a people, by our action, to the enjoyment of those rights, then the very fact that we have the power by statute-law or amendment to the Constitution thus to restore them, involves the further proposition that their restoration must be upon such conditions and such terms as we shall prescribe.

I might liken this to the institution of property. I cannot, by statute-law or by any alteration of the organic law of the land, divest a man of property which he actually owns without doing him a wrong. If he has violated law and subjected himself to punishment, what he has may be reached by fine or confiscation.

But suppose him to have no property, and the case is very different. When we are making laws, giving the original authority upon which property is to be obtained and held, surely it may be stipulated that such and such terms are to be complied with or such and such duties performed as the conditions on which the privilege of acquiring that property shall exist.

I would not take away from any one the elective franchise which he now enjoys. If I did, then would I be acting in bad faith, as the gentleman from Maine apprehends. I simply say to rebels, your pardon or amnesty only related to the crime you had committed, and so far as that crime tainted your character or affected your future you are purged of it by that pardon or amnesty. But as to anything which you have already divested yourself of, which you do not now own or enjoy, and which you wish hereafter to acquire; or, having had it once and lost it, desire to have restored to you, I will impose such conditions by statute or organic law as will determine on what principles, in what way, and at what time you shall get it back.

But, sir, somewhat to my surprise, because, as I suppose, it does not appear to him as it does to me, but a consistent part of the course of legislation in which we are endeavoring here to engage, my honored colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] proposes to get rid of this entire section, and to instruct the committee, in case the amendment be recommitted, to erase it altogether. And he assigns one or two other objections to it, upon which I will for a moment comment.

He says that he would be willing to have a proposition of this nature embodied in the constitutional amendment if, instead of disfranchising these insurgents until 1870, it disfranchises them perpetually.

Well, sir, I will not stop to inquire whether that would be going beyond the expectations of the people and beyond our duty or not. I should not, probably, quarrel with my colleague if he could add ten, fifteen, or twenty years, or even a longer period to the term of probation. But I deny the principle on which he sets out that there is anything inconsistent or wrong in making it an exclusion for a term of years instead of exclusion altogether. If there be anything in that argument, you ought not to send a man to an insane asylum for one, two, or three years, at the end of which period you may reasonably expect his intellect to be restored; you ought either to let him roam at large altogether or send him off as a lunatic for life. Or, in the case of crime, you must either not sentence a man to the penitentiary at all, or else incarcerate him for the term of his natural life. Or, to compare it to another thing, which perhaps better illustrates the principle involved, when a foreigner arrives upon our shores we should not say to him, "At the end of five years, when you have familiarized yourself with our institutions, and become attached to them, we will allow you to become a citizen, and admit you to all the franchises we enjoy," but we should require that he be naturalized the moment he touches our soil, or else excluded from the rights of citizenship forever.

Sir, I do not see that there is any principle involved in it. It is a mere question of expediency.

It has also been objected that it is exceptionable to incorporate into the Constitution any condition depending on lapse of time or a term of years—a period within or beyond which something is to be allowed or denied; and this is said to be, therefore, altogether a novel and unprecedented proposition. Sir, I deny even that. Any gentleman familiar with the Constitution will recall the provision that the slave trade, existing at the time of its adoption, should be permitted to run on for twenty years, but might be forbidden at the end of that time.

There is no principle violated, nothing which should prevent us from making the exclusion for two, three, four, ten, or twenty years, or during the natural lives of these insurgents, who seek to be admitted again to the exercise of the elective franchise.

Mr. Speaker, my own decided conviction is, that so far from going beyond the popular judgment and demand there is no part of all this amendment that will more commend itself to the sense of justice and propriety of the people of this country than this very third section. Everywhere throughout the land, in all loyal minds and hearts, the conviction has settled and grown strong and taken deep and fast hold that those who sought to destroy the Government ought not to be called upon so shortly afterward to undertake to rule and carry on that Government.

I do not believe there is any other portion of this whole proposed amendment to which so general an assent will be given by the people of this country, the loyal and true people throughout the whole broad extent of our land. They are full ready to declare that those who have proved false traitors and have raised their parricidal hands against the life of the country, who have attempted to strike down our Government and destroy its institutions, should be the very last to be trusted to take any share in preserving, conducting, and carrying on that Government and maintaining those institutions. And believing this, I have been all the more astonished that special attack should have been made on this particular section.

A gentleman sitting near me suggested, a moment ago, another objection to this section; one, however, rather to the form and phraseology than to the substance. Rebels are to be "excluded from the right to vote for Representatives in Congress and for electors for President and Vice President of the United States." He says this latter condition, without some more precise and guarded expression, may be evaded; that as the Constitution gives the States the power "to appoint these electors in such manner as their Legislatures may direct," these States may, like South Carolina, give that power to their Legislatures, or even confer it upon their Governors. Now, all I have to say in reply is this: I am not troubled by the word "appoint." If the Legislatures are called upon to appoint electors, they must in appointing vote for them; voting is involved in the manner of selection. And no member of any State Legislature can be permitted to cast his vote for presidential electors, if this amendment be made to the Constitution, if he himself has voluntarily adhered to the cause of the rebellion. There is nothing to be apprehended from the possibility that disloyal voters may choose loyal legislators. If they do, we must trust and accept such choice.

But they may give the power to their Governors. Very well; if the Legislature shall by law direct the Governor to be their agent in the appointment of electors, then you reduce the matter to the test of still easier proof. That Governor cannot appoint, cannot choose, cannot vote for—for those words "vote," "choose," and "appoint" are used indiscriminately in many parts of the Constitution—unless he comes within the provisions of this section if it shall be adopted. I will not say that this proposition might not be embodied in some better form of words—

Mr. SMITH obtained the floor.

MISSISSIPPI AND OHIO RIVER PILOTS.

Mr. WHALEY. I ask unanimous consent to present the remonstrance of pilots on the Mississippi and Ohio rivers against the passage of House bill No. 447.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object; let it come in under the rule.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution to provide for the exemption of crude petroleum from internal tax and duty, and for other purposes; which was thereupon signed by the Speaker.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. SMITH. I have always felt that when a crime has been committed, an absolute violation of law, upon a proper arraignment and trial and conviction of the party, justice and right and law compel the execution of the sentence. I entertain that opinion now and shall continue to express it. I therefore disagree with the gentleman who has just preceded me, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and the committee upon reconstruction who have reported this joint resolution, that those who have been what are usually denominated "red-handed traitors," who have attempted to destroy this Government and those who have defended it, should be forgiven at this time or even in 1870. I know there is a feeling prevalent in this House and in the country that we must submit to this proposition because there is a sentiment of reconciliation in the words and manner in which it is gotten up and proposed. But, for one, I must dissent, and my name must go upon the record in opposition to those men who have heretofore claimed a higher position for punishing those who have attempted to destroy this Government. I am surprised, and I must express my surprise, that men who have stood by the Government, who have voted men and money to sustain it, who have seen their country overrun, who have seen their armies defeated, who have seen their brothers slain, who have seen large battle-fields rendered gory, should at this time come forward and say that in 1870 the doors should be opened to these rebels and that there should be a general amnesty. You are radical; I am not. You are for general amnesty with universal suffrage; I am not. I stand here as a Union man, and as a conservative man, desirous to restore the Government, to secure the peace and happiness of the people, the unity of the States, and the supremacy of the Constitution. If you ask my consent to the pardon of the leaders of this rebellion, I say "No." But there are men upon this floor who say, "Confiscate their property and let them go." I say "No." In the Thirty-Eighth Congress I voted for the confiscation of the property of the leading rebels, and I made a speech in advocacy of that position. I stand by that doctrine to-day. But where are the men who advocated the doctrine then, and said, "Not only confiscate their property, but hang them all?" Those men now say, "Pardon them all, and restore them in 1870 to all the rights and privileges of citizenship." They do not even propose to wait until 1870. They say, "Confiscate their property and let them go." They would apply this doctrine to men who are guilty of rebellion against the Government, of treason against the Constitution, and war upon all our institutions. They say of such as Clement C. Clay, "Let them depart in peace." They would say of Jeff. Davis, "Confiscate his property and let him return to his home." All this may suit you; it does not suit me. You are radical; I am conservative. You say "Hang everybody," but you will not hang anybody. You say "Prosecute everybody," but you will not prosecute anybody. You say "Execute the laws," but you do not do it. Not long since the question was asked upon this floor whether you would execute these men through the instrumentality of the President. The answer was "No;" and the reason of that answer was that it was feared that the President would receive a little too much credit for his action in seeing that the laws were executed. I say let these men be tried; if guilty, let them be convicted; and then see whether the President will pardon them when thus convicted. Sir, this will never be done if we trust to these men who are all the time urging their radical schemes, who have forgotten the interests of the country, who seek not the salvation of the Union, but the salvation of party, and the interest of their particular ilk.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] said a few minutes ago that he would not admit that these States were out of the Union; that they had been in the Union and were parts of the body-politic. Well, if that is the fact, how and under what circumstances are they to be gotten out? How are they to be destroyed? The gentleman, in speaking of this subject, adopted a simile, and said that when a child has offended the father whips him, and thus by correction brings him back to obedience to the law. Now, I submit the question whether there was ever on the face of the earth a father who, though he chastised his child because of disobedience, refused that child, even after the chastisement, bread and clothing and a place in his house. The father whips the child from love, remembering all the time that he is "bone of his bone, flesh of his flesh." He chastises him because he loves him.

Now, sir, the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has chastised these men. He was a general in the Army, and he helped to chastise them. He did it because he loved them, because they were a part of the family. But now, when he has whipped them into obedience, and they ask to resume their place in the family circle, under the shelter of the great household of the nation, he says, "No, you cannot come in." This is unnatural. It is in violation of every principle that should govern the action of the father toward an erring or rebellious child. It is in violation of those great principles of affection which God has implanted in the human breast, and the disregard of which stamps a man as unworthy the name of man.

Now, sir, these States are in the Union. There is, so far as I know, only one man in this House who says that they are not; and he is the member from the Lancaster district of Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] I designate him simply by the appellation of "member."

But the distinguished men upon this floor on that side say these States are in the Union; and I must call to my support again a distinguished gentleman, a personal friend, one I like, one I may appeal to, but who will not say anything to me just now—the gentleman from Ohio who sits across there; I mean Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. THAYER. I rise to a point of order. It is out of order to mention by name any member present. I would not make this point upon a new member, but I think I can fairly make it upon the gentleman from Kentucky as the practice has become of late a very common one.

The SPEAKER. The rule is imperative that members must not be referred to except as from the States which they represent.

Mr. SMITH. I only used the gentleman's name in parenthesis. [Laughter.] Now, sir, I have heard the gentleman who called me to order as well as other gentlemen upon this floor mention the names of members in parenthesis. I would like to know, then, by what authority he has called me to order. You will find in the printed speeches the names of members printed in parenthesis.

Mr. THAYER. The names are interpolated by the reporters. The gentleman cannot mention any instance in which I have called the name of any member upon this floor. I consider it unparliamentary. I hope in future we will not have any more of it.

Mr. SMITH. I do not want the gentleman to take up all of my time. I wish to say I have precedents. Every gentleman who has any reputation in this country, and who has spoken upon this floor, has again and again called members by name when it was necessary to do so. There is the gentleman from Illinois, I will not mention his name, and many others, have called members by name ten, fifteen, and thirty times.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman refers to me I will say that he never heard me call a member by name.

Mr. SMITH. There are other gentlemen on the floor from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. To call a member by name in the British Parliament is considered the highest censure.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I want to have one thing settled right here. I find every time within the last four or five weeks that I have risen to address the House I have been interrupted by questions of order. I am a man of good humor, and you cannot make me mad. I do not mean to do any wrong to anybody, but I do mean to speak the truth. If it offends anybody, why then let them call me to order. I mean to say that none of these States are out of the Union, and that they never have been out of the Union.

Mr. THAYER. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH. I do not yield to the gentleman. The gentleman with his point of order has diverted me from the course of my argument. I am willing to stand on the principles I have avowed. There is the gentleman from Ohio—I will not call him by name, but the House will see whom I mean by looking where I am pointing my finger—was allowed to go on making his speech without interruption, but how does it happen when I undertake to speak in vindication of the great principle of the Union party I am constantly called to order?

Mr. THAYER. Does the gentleman want an answer?

Mr. SMITH. You cannot answer me just now. I must come back. It cannot be denied that members on the other side have risen here and abused the President, abused his policy of reconstruction and almost everything else that he has presented to Congress. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] spoke here on last Saturday for more than two hours in abuse of the President. Now, I want to know why, if they are allowed to speak against him, I shall not be allowed to speak in his favor. There is nothing that they can propose that will restore this Union. They cannot deny the constitutional prerogative of every State, taxation with representation. It is impossible. It is the fundamental law.

But you say that you are the judges of the qualification of Representatives in Congress, and the Senate are the judges in regard to the qualification of Senators; and so we can decide that question. I venture to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and all that class of men will vote sooner, especially after the year 1870, to admit these traitors into their seats than I will; and I dare you to try it. You do not hate the red-handed traitors worse than I do, and you dare not go with me on a jury to try them. You would blanch, you would pale, you would sicken, you would crouch, you would forgive before I would, and save these men from execution who have attempted to destroy this Government, and you say it by your very conduct and by the proposition you make to-day. If you want representation by voting, say so, and let us have a plain proposition.

Now, I know it is hard to make a speech in the Congress of the United States without referring to the negro, and I thought I would get through a thirty minutes' speech without doing it. But my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] could not help talk about the darkey; and my friend over here talks about him, and my friend over there talks about him, and my friends all around the House bring him in. Gentlemen, open your pocket, open your hand, open your heart, and let us see whether Union men from the southern States, and wherever they are found, will not do more than you will.

I happen to know some of you who have been called upon for contributions to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, and you did not respond. [Laughter.] And I know there were others that did. And yet you get up with your loud-mouth declamation and send your speeches over the country advocating the cause of the poor black man, while the poor black man, with his face turned to heaven, says, "Lord, deliver me from such friends." [Laughter.] And He will do it, too. [Laughter.] We understand it, and we know that if the negro is to depend on you for his bread and his clothing, (now, I am not speaking of the Union party, but of their leaders in Congress; the men who clamor so much about the negro,) you are the last men on the face of God's earth that will help him. Because, no matter whether a man is worth $250,000 and owns a rolling-mill, or $150,000 and is engaged in petroleum operations, or is worth $500,000 and is engaged in cotton speculations, whenever a poor darkey comes along you cannot do a thing; but if there is an appropriation of $25,000 from the Government of the United States coming through the Committee for the District of Columbia, then the darkey gets it. It is put into the hands of the managers of the Freedmen's Bureau, and that institution goes along swimmingly and all is well with the negro. There are two extremes.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH. I cannot.

Mr. KELLEY. Just a question.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Six minutes.

Mr. SMITH. Well, how long do you want me to yield?

Mr. KELLEY. Half a minute.

Mr. SMITH. Very well.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman whether he knows the fate of those who are neither hot nor cold.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. And whether that is your position.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir, [laughter,] I understand what is the condition of those who are "neither hot nor cold." The Bible informs me they are spewed out, and you are about the worst "spewed out" man I ever saw in my life. [Great laughter.] You take care of yourself and some of your colleagues over there from Pennsylvania.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want it distinctly understood that the friends of the black man, and I use the words with emphasis, are those who know them, who have been associated with them and familiar with all their characteristics. They are the men who have defended them in the past, and will defend them in the future.

Now, the "spewed" gentleman from Pennsylvania talks about hanging rebels, and hanging all sorts of men. I remember, as he must too, the time when he saw, walking through the streets of Washington, a whole company of black men, dressed in grey, who were prisoners of war. Would you hang them, sir?

Mr. KELLEY. I never saw them.

Mr. SMITH. Then you were blind. [Laughter.] Your deeds were dark, and you could not see what was going on. [Great laughter.] I tell you I saw them, and they were there. I would not hang those men. I would not prosecute them. I would not interfere with them. I would give them a general amnesty, and I would extend it to the great masses of the people of the South.

You will have to live with those people; they are a part of the Government; their States are States of the Union; they are under the Constitution; they are subject to your laws, and they obey every precept that you lay down for them. And, sir, one remarkable thing is this: that if a rebel obeys the law, you want to hang him because he does obey it, you believe the law must be wrong because he assents to it! But, if he violates the law, you want, also, to hang him! What is the poor man to do? If he obey the law he is hung, and if he does not obey it he is hung.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one other thing I wish to say. There are two parties in this country who are against this Government, and are attempting to overthrow and destroy it—the one is an extreme party on the one side, and the other is an extreme party on the other side.

Mr. PERHAM. To which party does our friend belong?

Mr. SMITH. If you will keep quiet a moment I will tell you.

I remember very well a beautiful allegory in the Bible, which I have referred to before on another occasion and in a different place. It was when, under the administration of that great and wisest of men, a long time in the past, Solomon, a harlot stole the child of a kind and affectionate mother and claimed it as her own, or kept it to secure a large bounty for its return. The claim of the legitimate mother to the child had no effect upon the harlot. Distressed, heart-broken, and troubled beyond endurance almost, the mother appealed to Solomon for redress and the return of her child. He ordered both women and the child before him, and after hearing both he directed the child to be cut in twain and the one half to be given to the harlot and the other half to the woman the true mother. "Well," said the harlot, "I agree; I am satisfied; let the child be divided." "No," said the mother, "that is my child; I have petted it on my knee, I have nursed it at my bosom; 'tis part of my bone and flesh, and I love it as I do my life; do not kill it, do not destroy it; let the harlot have it, but save it." Solomon said, "Thou art the mother, take thy child." The Government of the United States is our mother; harlots North and South have attempted to destroy the child of the Government, the Constitution and the Union. It was proclaimed in the South, "Let the Union slide;" it was echoed back from the North, "Let the Union slide." They said, divide the Union; they attempted it. A long war was prosecuted for this division, but it failed. The wisdom, energy, and patriotism of the people said "No, we will make sacrifices of blood and treasure and the great institution of slavery; but defend, save, and let live the union of the States." These harlots cry to-day, the Union is dissolved, it is discovered and gone; the sacrifice made, the destruction of slavery, is not enough; let the child be divided. Their followers, but few in number it is to be hoped, however, say, "Let the Union slide;" but the party to which I belong, the great party of the Union, say "No; we love the Union; it gives us life, protection, homes, plenty, liberty, individual freedom, and 'by the Eternal it shall be preserved.'" Now, I hope the gentleman understands to which party I belong.

The hour of half past four o'clock p. m. having arrived, the House, pursuant to order, took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

TAX BILL.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being a bill of the House (No. 513) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof.

The first section of the bill which was under consideration is as follows:

That on and after the 1st day of July, 1866, in lieu of the duties on unmanufactured cotton, as provided in an act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes, approved June 30, 1864, as amended by the act of March 3, 1865, there shall be paid by the producer, owner, or holder, upon all cotton produced within the United States, and upon which no tax has been levied, paid, or collected, a tax of five cents per pound, as hereinafter provided; and the weight of such cotton shall be ascertained by deducting four per cent. for tare from the gross weight of each bale or package; and such tax shall be and remain an lien thereon, in the possession of any person whomsoever, from the time when such cotton is produced as aforesaid until the same shall have been paid; and no drawback shall in any case be allowed on raw or unmanufactured cotton of any tax paid thereon when exported in the raw or unmanufactured condition. But no tax shall be imposed upon any cotton imported from other countries, and on which an import duty shall have been paid.

The pending question was on the following amendment offered by Mr. LYNCH:

Provided, That any producer may procure an exemption of not more than six hundred pounds of cotton in any one year, as follows:

Upon exhibiting the same to the assistant assessor of the district where said producer resides and where the cotton was raised, at the place of production, and making oath that he raised and now owns said cotton, and satisfying the assistant assessor that his sworn statement is true, the assistant assessor shall file mark the bale or bales of said cotton with the number of pounds, being not more than six hundred as ascertained by weight then and there, and with the following words: "Cotton produced in the — assessment district in the — collection district in — by —, and owned by him on the — day of —, 18—, and exempt from taxation;" filling said blanks with the designation of the assessment district and also of the collection district, the name of the State, the name of the producer and owner, and the date when said exemption is so ascertained and marked thereon. The assistant assessor shall give to said producer a certificate of such exemption setting forth the above facts, and also the place of production as near as can be, and the payment of his fee. He shall also make a full record of all such exemptions and transmit a transcript of the same to the assessor. The assistant assessor shall be allowed a fee of two dollars for all his services in each case of exemption, to be paid by the producer. Any person swearing falsely in procuring such exemption; and any person using or attempting to use the exemption certificate or marks provided for in this section with intent to procure exemption for any other cotton than that which was lawfully exempted as such certificate and marks set forth; also, any person selling or giving away, purchasing or receiving such certificate or marks with intent to defraud or to aid in defrauding the revenue shall be liable, upon conviction thereof, to a fine of fifty dollars or to not more than three months' imprisonment. Under the provisions of this section no cotton in its unmanufactured state shall be exempt from taxation for more than ten months after the date of its marks or certificates of exemption. Any person, other than the producer named in the certificate and marks aforesaid, who shall subsequently to such exemption claim property in any cotton so exempted, by virtue of an ownership prior in date to such exemption, shall forfeit all such cotton; and any cotton with reference to which the owner or his agent shall commit any violation of this section shall also be forfeited.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment pending, offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. LYNCH,] provides that a certain amount, either six hundred or one thousand pounds of cotton—six hundred pounds, I believe—shall be exempt from tax throughout the South wherever cotton is produced.

Mr. LYNCH. If the gentleman will allow me, I will modify my amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well.

Mr. LYNCH. I withdraw my amendment, and move to add to the section the following:

Provided, That any producer may in each year procure an exemption of not more than six hundred pounds of cotton produced by himself and owned by him from planting to baling and exemption, by complying with such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall prescribe, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MORRILL. In my judgment, this amendment, if adopted, will be utterly destructive of all revenue from this source. And as I know my friend from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] is in favor of a tax upon cotton, I trust he will withdraw it.

But before yielding the floor let me say that if this amendment should be adopted every piccaninny in the South would have six hundred pounds of cotton to be exempted. All of the land would be leased or so managed that every workman, whether employed for wages or otherwise, would come forward with what would appear to be a valid claim for an exemption, and if this amendment should be adopted, I should regard it as equivalent to the rejection of this proposition to tax cotton.

Mr. LYNCH. I should be very sorry to propose any amendment here which would defeat the object of the committee in levying a tax upon cotton. When I offered my first amendment, I stated that my object was to encourage the small producers of cotton in the South; and also to follow out the general principle of the bill which exempts the small manufacturers of the North, the miners that produce a small amount, and incomes to a certain amount. I think there will be no more difficulty in guarding against fraud in the exemption of this amount than there is in guarding against fraud in the exemption of $600 worth of manufactured goods.

It is hardly to be supposed that a planter can farm out to all his hands his plantation, while he really owns all the crop, and have every one of them come forward and make oath that they each own six hundred pounds of cotton, and obtain exemption papers upon that amount under any regulations that may be made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I do not see that the farmer can attempt that any more successfully than the manufacturer at the North can share out his factory and thus avoid the five per cent. tax.

I think it is a matter of a great deal of importance that we encourage these small producers of the South by giving them the advantage of this exemption, and let them feel that the Government is a beneficent one. While at the North I would not encourage any class distinction, I would permit this at the South. I think it is for the interest of the Government that they should make the poor white people and the poor black people of the South feel that they had certain privileges and certain exemptions, and I think it is no more than right and just that the same principle should be applied at the South that is applied at the North. I will leave the House to decide the matter.

Mr. MORRILL. I regard this matter to be quite as important as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] can regard it. And I would like to reach the point of being able to give these men the bounty which he proposes, for it is nothing less than a bounty. If we do not adopt the provision the gentleman proposes they will have nothing taken from them; they are as well off as they would be if we do not pass the law.

Now, let me say, in relation to this proposal, that there is a very great difficulty about it. This provision, if adopted, cannot be enforced.

By the provisions of this bill we provide for the collection of this tax when the cotton is removed from the district or when it is manufactured in the district where it is produced. If there is any one in any of those districts who raises cotton and who shall see fit to manufacture an amount of cotton equal to that allowed to persons in the North, he will have the same privileges of exemption as the man who manufactures cotton in the North. If we allow this six hundred pounds of cotton to be exempted for each producer, then every bale of that exempt cotton must be traced throughout the country wherever it goes. It is quite enough to be called upon to trace this cotton to the manufacturers or when it leaves the district. To undertake anything more would be futile, and in my judgment absolutely impossible.

Mr. LYNCH. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. MORRILL] if there will be any more difficulty in putting the exemption stamp on the bale than to put a stamp on to show that it has paid the duty.

Mr. MORRILL. The cotton the gentleman proposes to exempt will be in very small parcels, about a bale and a half each, and it will come in from all quarters, whereas in the general administration of the law it comes in in large parcels.

Mr. LYNCH. I understand that each bale is to be stamped.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has closed upon the amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. LYNCH, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. UPSON. I move to amend this section by striking out the word "five" and inserting the word "three," as the tax per pound to be levied on raw cotton.

I will state briefly my reason for offering this amendment. I consider the tax proposed by the bill as exorbitant and calculated to have an injurious effect, that tax being equivalent to twenty or twenty-five dollars per bale.

Besides, it will be found, by an examination of the bill, that after the cotton is manufactured into fabrics there is to be an addition of five per cent. ad valorem; so that the consumer of this cotton, when it is manufactured, will have to pay that five per cent. duty added to this tax.

Although it is said that the consumers who will pay this tax will, to a considerable extent, be those in foreign countries, still a larger portion of these manufactures will also be used in this country. And I find that the producer is generally very desirous to exempt the product from tax, as in the case of petroleum, in regard to which the question was considered so urgent that a bill on that subject was yesterday rushed through as an independent proposition. Infer, from facts of this sort, that a tax of this kind does, at least in some cases, affect in a measure the producer as well as the consumer.

I submit that, in the present state of our country, a tax of five cents per pound on cotton would be a very heavy burden, and is calculated, I think, to work more injury than benefit. This tax will weigh heavily upon a large class of our people who make use of manufactures fabricated from cotton. The tax is now two cents per pound. I notice that some of the southern States, North Carolina for instance, have gone through the process of levying a tax of two dollars per bale on cotton to support their provisional governments. The article is also subjected to other local taxes in the States where it is produced.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] had not moved to reduce this tax, I should have moved to amend by striking out "five" and inserting "eight." I think there is very good reason why this one article should pay a very large portion of the taxation which we are obliged to raise. If we had a right to lay an export duty, which the Constitution at present forbids, we could, with an export duty of ten cents per pound, raise $200,000,000 annually, while at the same time protecting our own manufacturers and selling abroad just as much cotton as we do now. Under the circumstances we must do the best we can. The only thing we can do is to lay an internal duty, and then allow a drawback upon that portion of the manufactured article which is exported. That is the only mode by which we can now do what we ought to do.

Mr. UPSON. I wish to inquire whether the object of the drawback is to enable us to sell more cheaply to foreign countries than to our own people.

Mr. STEVENS. The object of the drawback is to enable us to go into the markets of the world with our manufactures, where we cannot now go—to enable us to go where England is able to go by her free-trade system at home—to enable us to go to South America, to France, to the continent of Europe. If we would manage our concerns wisely, if we would lay a tax, for instance, of ten cents upon all of the article that is exported and nothing at home, there is not a market in the world to which the fabrics of this country would not find their way. We must approach the object as nearly as we can; and as we have to raise a considerable amount by internal taxation, let a portion of it be borne by those who raise the article of cotton and who created the necessity for this taxation.

Mr. UPSON. I thought the object was to benefit the home market.

Mr. STEVENS. Internal duty is not protection; it is just the reverse of protection.

Mr. UPSON. I speak of the drawback.

Mr. STEVENS. The object of the drawback is to enable the people of this country to send their manufactures advantageously into the markets of the world, without being overborne by the competition of the cheap manufacturing countries of Europe. How can we accomplish this except by a drawback as proposed by the bill? We now allow a drawback on whisky. We put no tax upon whisky exported. Why is this? It is that we may go into other countries and sell that article without being affected by the burdens of taxation which we are compelled to bear here. But it enables us to pay taxes in proportion, if we can sell a portion of our surplus production abroad at some kind of profit. And therefore, instead of sending the raw material abroad, let us now manufacture it here, and when we have manufactured it here, and our manufactories have been fully employed, let us send the product abroad to other countries where it is needed. But in order to do that you must take off a portion of the duty which is necessary here. Therefore I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. Upson,] although I am deterred from saying anything about the eight cents tax, as I intended.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the amendment by making it two cents instead of three.

I regret to differ from my colleagues on the committee upon this or any other item in this bill, and I believe it is the only important item in regard to which I differ from them. But my conviction is very strong against this tax.

The main object of this bill is to relieve the country from some portions of the burdens of taxation, and cotton is the only article on which the tax is increased—the present tax being two cents, equal to about nine dollars per bale—and this bill proposes to increase it to five cents, or about twenty-two and a half dollars per bale. During the war Congress refused to impose more than two cents upon cotton. It seems to me unjust and impolitic, now that the war is over and every one desires to see the industry of the South revive and flourish, to oppress the production of cotton with this burdensome tax.

It is not true that this tax will be paid by the consumers of the cotton. In the present condition of the supply of cotton the tax must come out of the producer. The price of cotton both here and abroad will depend on the extent of the supply, and whether you tax it two cents or twenty cents the price will not be affected by the tax until it operates to restrict the production of cotton in this country.

It is a mistake to suppose that because we produce more cotton than any other country, or perhaps than all other countries, therefore we have the monopoly of the article. Whatever tax we impose on cotton is paid by the producer until it restricts the production; and then it will operate as a bounty to encourage its production in other countries.

We shall not force the foreign consumer or even the consumer at home to pay this tax. It must come out of the producer of cotton until the extent of the crop is so great that this tax will operate as a restriction upon its production.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, this subject is not a new one. It is very clear that if the proposition which was made at the last session of Congress to tax cotton five cents a pound had been carried, we should have got many millions of money without impoverishing the country a dollar. Every dollar of it would have been paid by the foreigner. And so long as cotton remains at the present price, or until it comes down to a much lower rate, the position taken by the revenue commission without a single exception, I believe, was that it would continue to be the same; that the price levied by the tax would mainly come out of the cotton sent abroad. And not one of the manufacturers were opposed to it at the time. It was accepted provided a little pittance of drawback was given upon manufactured cotton.

Now, if we are to have any revenue at all of this sort let us put it at some figure that will make it of some importance, and not whittle it down to a point so fine that it will cost more to collect it than the revenue is worth.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. PIKE. I move pro forma to amend by making it six cents.

The House ought to recollect in acting upon this subject of cotton, that the other day we passed a bill making an appropriation for the next year of very nearly twelve million dollars, in great part for the purpose of protecting, encouraging, and assisting this raising of cotton; that is to say, for the Freedmen's Bureau. The necessity for that bureau lies in the fact that the population in the South, both white and black, need assistance for the next year, and that they were largely engaged in raising cotton and in raising the corn necessary for their own subsistence. So that it is one of the necessities of our position that so long as we make this large expenditure, such as we make in no other section of the country, the region in which we make this liberal expenditure should make a liberal contribution in return.

Another consideration is, that it is necessary to keep up a standing army in that section of the country where cotton is raised. It will be necessary to employ a large portion of our Army in that section for the coming year, if not for years to come; and so long as these extraordinary expenditures are necessary in that part of the country, so long we should draw a revenue from that section somewhat to correspond with those expenditures.

Now, the revenue commission, viewing this simply as a revenue matter connected with safety to the production of cotton, and to its maintenance in the markets of the world as an article of export, have proposed a duty of five cents a pound. I am satisfied with that.

Mr. KASSON. I believe that from the first there has been no member of the Committee of Ways and Means more interested than myself in the question of taxing raw material in the hands of the producer. Upon this question of cotton it has been treated by them—and I am willing to accept that proposition—as an exceptional article that justifies the violation of the rules which we have applied to subjects of taxation generally in this country.

In the last Congress I endeavored to apply a similar rule to the production of tobacco, taking it off from the manufactured article and substituting it in a much less amount upon the raw material. The difficulty that we then encountered was the collection of the tax in that form without imposing a burden upon the producer. The same difficulty exists in respect to cotton, and in addition to that there seems to be a difficulty in the minds of many gentlemen in regard to the amount of this tax.

Now, one thing I apprehend is conceded on all hands, and that is that in respect to certain varieties of cotton, and only in respect to certain varieties, we are without competition in the production of the world. In the long staple, the most valuable kind, we have at present no successful competition. But there is in various parts of the world a production of a very large amount of cotton of an inferior quality, the short staple, which, if we tax the raw material too high in this country, will encroach, I think, upon the monopoly that this country has hitherto enjoyed.

The practical question, therefore, in my judgment, is, whether we put the tax so high as on the one hand to develop the production in foreign countries of a superior article, and on the other to compel the increase of the amount of the inferior article in place of that we have hitherto sent into foreign markets from this country.

It is upon that point that the principle I maintain applies. I do not believe that we have a permanent monopoly of the markets of the world in the production of cotton to the extent claimed by some. And I am as apprehensive in regard to this as I was on the subject of tobacco, that we may so affect the production of the raw material as actually to develop successful competition and take from ourselves the monopoly in the world that we now have.

I should have preferred that the committee had settled upon three cents, with a corresponding drawback on the manufactured article. I think both branches of the subject, the tax and the drawback, should be considered together.

I hope in this as in all similar subjects connected with the material interests of the country, no gentleman will attempt to put it on the ground of vindictive punishment upon the people of the South. It is the most dangerous element that we can introduce into our deliberations upon this as well as all other subjects. I say this for fear that some at least of my associates upon this floor may think that cotton will bear any amount of taxation we choose to put upon it, and that the burden will fall on the South. We in the North, who consume most largely, pay the burden in the first instance, and then the foreign consumers pay the residue of the burden in the second instance, after the drawback is allowed on the manufactured article.

I hope, therefore, that the tax will not be increased above five cents, nor decreased below three cents, and for myself, I should prefer to start the experiment on the grade of three cents.

Mr. PIKE. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "three" and inserting in lieu thereof "two and a half." I do it for the purpose of saying that I cannot concur with the Committee of Ways and Means in the policy of putting the duty at five cents per pound, and chiefly upon general reasons. So far as I can be supposed to have an interest in the manufacturing industry of the country, I do not know that the manufacturers are particularly concerned in the amount of the tax on the raw material, provided that the drawback on goods exported corresponds with the tax laid on the raw material. But I concur with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that if the tax be put at five cents, and there be not a drawback, it will destroy the manufacturing interests of the country.

But I object to it chiefly upon general grounds. It is pretty well known that in reference to all political matters concerning the South, and the restoration of that section of the country to its former relations to the General Government, I am, in some degree, uncompromising. But upon all questions affecting their material prosperity, upon everything relating to the restoration of commerce and social order, I am in favor of the most liberal policy on the part of the General Government.

Now, sir, if this tax be put at five cents, and the Representatives of the South return here, as they must do at some time, I cannot anticipate anything but well-founded opposition, and some degree of bitterness on their part, in reference to this matter. We should consider that this must be, to some extent, a tax upon the cotton-producing interest of the country, for, while a portion of this increase in price may be charged over to the manufacturers of this and other countries, it cannot be reasonably anticipated, when you impose the duty equal to fifty or seventy-five per cent. of the cost of producing the material in ordinary times, that such a tax will be paid by the consumers entirely.

Previous to the opening of the war, in 1861, American cotton sold in the market of England, for about fivepence and three tenths, or something like twelve cents per pound. If you add five cents, or twopence ha'penny per pound, it must tend to increase the cotton production of other countries. Previous to the war the importation of East India cotton into Great Britain was between five hundred thousand and a million bales a year. During the war the importation of American cotton into Great Britain went down from one million eight hundred and forty-one thousand bales, to two hundred and eighty-one thousand and fifty bales last year, showing a loss of more than a million and a half of bales on the importations of American cotton. Now, the importations into Great Britain of all kinds of cotton have diminished only three hundred and twenty-eight thousand bales, comparing the year 1861 with 1865, showing an immense increase in the cotton-growing interests of other parts of the world during the prostration of the business here.

Now, if you impose a duty of fifty per cent. on the cost of producing the raw material in this country it must inevitably result in an increased production of cotton in other countries. I should much prefer that we should put the duty at something like three cents per pound, which corresponds with our general system so far as we can compare the duties on raw materials with the duties on manufactured articles which is observed in the revenue system of the country, and which is preserved in the bill now under consideration.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely desire to show to the gentleman from Massachusetts that gentlemen who are interested in this subject, and have given it great attention, differ with him as to the amount of tax that cotton will bear. I have recurred hastily to the report of the commission on the subject of internal revenue, and I will quote the names of certain parties who, I think, will be good authority with the gentleman.

I take first the name of Mr. William Dwight, a wealthy and distinguished manufacturer. He was asked if he recommended a tax of seven per cent. upon the raw material, and his answer was, "I do."

Another gentleman recommended a tax of only two and a half cents a pound, the only one I can call to mind who recommended so low a tax. Erastus Bigelow, a gentleman well known for his enlightened views and practical information upon these subjects, was in favor of a tax upon raw cotton.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] allow me to inquire whether this testimony was not taken when the price of raw cotton was something like twice what it is at the present time; and also, too, when the anticipation of the quantity of cotton in the South to be brought out was something like a million bales, whereas in fact we have obtained one million nine hundred thousand bales or more?

Mr. MORRILL. I will give the gentleman the full advantage of all the facts. The facts were, as the gentleman intimates, that the price of cotton was very much higher than it is now. But it has not fallen below the price that was then anticipated by gentlemen who had in view the levying of this tax or not below twenty-five cents per pound.

Now, let me read from the testimony of Francis B. Crowningshield, the treasurer and manager of the Merrimack Company:

"Question. You would scale tax according to the price?"

"Answer. I don't mean to say I would exactly do that; but suppose, for instance, that cotton is not to fall below twenty-five cents in the next three, four, or five years, I should say it would bear a tax of somewhere about seven cents."

Take the testimony of John A. Lowell:

"Question. Are you in favor of an export duty or excise tax on cotton?"

"Answer. I see no objection to it all.

"Question. In case an excise duty were levied, what amount would you recommend?"

"Answer. I have thought of the matter a good deal, and I have thought about five cents a pound would probably be a tax that would affect nobody."

The testimony of Mr. E. R. Mudge—a man of energy and great enterprise in the manufacturing business—is as follows:

"Question. Are you in favor of an export duty or excise tax on cotton?"

"Answer. I should not object.

"Question. To what extent?"

"Answer. I should say that from five to six cents might be imposed without detriment to the producing interest of the South for two or three years."

I will now give the testimony of William Amory, another distinguished gentleman, and the treasurer of some of the largest cotton manufacturing establishments in the country:

"Question. Would you recommend a tax as high as five cents?"

"Answer. That would require a great deal of deliberation. You would have to put a tax on which would raise a very large revenue; and if you found there were five million bales—which I think very likely to occur much sooner than my friends generally—I should think you could reduce it much lower than five cents."

But that was not the tenor of the general testimony.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Is there any evidence before the committee as to the price at which the English manufacturers would use American cotton exclusively?

Mr. MORRILL. I do not suppose that that would ever be the case. Surat cotton, valued usually at one third less than American cotton, will most likely always be used for some purposes.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I move pro formâ to amend the amendment by striking out "three" and inserting "four." I desire to refer to the effect of placing the tax too high upon the quality of the article that gets into the hands of the people. We all know that the high price of wool has resulted in the insertion, in all woolen fabrics which we are compelled to use, of a large amount of shoddy. And it is precisely in that direction that a heavy tax would produce the effect in this case; it would lead to a largely increased introduction of an inferior kind of cotton. I refer to this in addition to what I said before in regard to the practical operation of this tax in increasing the price of cotton goods in the markets at home.

I beg again to say, in connection with this subject, what in effect was suggested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRISWOLD,] that the consumption of this material by the English manufacturers is very much dependent upon the price at which they can obtain it. Suppose we put on a tax of five cents per pound, or the high tax per bale as suggested by another gentleman, to be paid by the producer, or secured to be paid before the cotton leaves the plantation, which is substantially the effect of this amendment, that very moment you reduce the price of the labor of every freedman in the southern States. In proportion as you facilitate the production of cotton and increase the demand for it at home and abroad, just in that proportion do you enhance the price of the labor of the freedmen of the South.

Mr. UPSON. Let me inquire of the gentleman whether it is not a fact that at some seasons cotton has been raised and sold for six cents per pound.

Mr. KASSON. Unquestionably, and some qualities even lower than that. What I apprehend is that the production of American cotton may hereafter exceed possibly the demand which will exist for it at the high price at which our taxes will permanently fix it. It is this apprehension which makes me hesitate very much to vote for this tax of five cents per pound at the beginning. I should prefer to wait until we can ascertain what is to be the effect of the increase of two per cent. in our taxation.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I desire to state to the gentleman that I believe it is an established fact that at twenty-five cents per pound American cotton takes the preference in the markets of the world over every other kind of cotton.

Mr. KASSON. I should be glad to know the authority upon which that is stated, for I noticed that in the remarks of the gentleman from Vermont, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, he cited the testimony of certain gentlemen in this country, and I was reminded of what transpired before the Committee of Ways and Means in the last Congress in reference to the tax upon tobacco. There were certain gentlemen who advocated most strenuously the imposition of a high rate of tax upon the raw material, declaring that we had the monopoly of the markets of the world, and that it made no difference what tax we might impose. When we followed up those inquiries, it was found that certain gentlemen back of the witnesses held a very large amount of tobacco on hand, then deposited in Europe, the price of which tobacco, would, by an increased tax, have been enhanced to such a degree as absolutely to make a fortune for the holders of it. I do not know that anything like this was the fact with the gentlemen who have testified in reference to the article of cotton; but I mention the incident to show the danger which is to be guarded against in cases where the personal interests of a witness may seriously affect his testimony.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I understood the gentleman from New York to say that American cotton at twenty-five cents per pound has the preference in the markets of the world over the cotton of any other country. I desire to inquire on what authority he makes that statement, as it seems to me—

Mr. MORRILL obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman from Vermont will yield to me a moment, I desire to say, as some gentleman has spoken of cotton having been sold at six cents per pound, that gentlemen in whom I have full confidence, who have traveled through the South within the last two years, assure me that with free labor cotton can be everywhere produced there at one cent a pound.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. With the consent of the gentleman from Vermont, I wish to put a question or two to the advocates of the reduction of this tax, for the purpose of eliciting an answer upon a practical feature of this question.

The amendment which is proposed by my colleague [Mr. KASSON] will reduce the amount of tax proposed to be collected under the provisions of this bill to the extent of about nine million dollars. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] would reduce the amount to the extent of about twenty-seven million dollars. Now, I wish those who advocate a reduction of this tax to state from what source they expect to make up that amount of money. The light which they may throw on this subject may have some effect upon my vote on these propositions relative to the tax on cotton.

The Committee of Ways and Means, in preparing this bill, have had in view the raising of a certain amount of revenue. If we reduce that amount by these amendments we must increase the tax upon some other articles or must include as subjects of taxation some articles which are not now embraced in the bill. I hope, therefore, that those who favor this reduction will give us some light as to the articles on which they propose an increase of taxation, as well as the articles not now included which they propose to embrace in the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has made some allusion to the testimony taken before the revenue commission. That remark shows that the gentleman knows nothing at all about the character of the men who gave that testimony; for I undertake to say that there are no men in this country who stand higher where they are known—and they are widely known—than the gentlemen who gave their testimony before this commission.

Let me make a single remark in relation to another point suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, the difficulty of collecting this tax from the people of the South. This bill has been prepared with great care, and is now presented after repeated revision. This tax will only be collected in the South when it goes to the large manufactories. There will not be a dollar collected of planters on their own plantations on cotton for their own use. When it is removed from the district, however, then the tax will also be collected.

In conclusion let me say, if gentlemen strike out this amount, they must be prepared to levy an equal tax in some other quarter.

Mr. KASSON withdrew his amendment.

Mr. RAYMOND. I move pro forma to raise the tax to six cents. I do it merely to get an opportunity of saying I think five cents, the amount of tax reported by the committee, is one which the cotton crop will bear, at present at least. The immense sum by which the revenue provided for will be reduced if any change is made in the tax on cotton, seems to be conclusive that no change should be made.

The testimony which the committee has taken and especially what the commission took during their investigation on this subject, if gentlemen will examine it, I think they will find is conclusive on this point that five cents is a very fair medium tax on cotton. The chairman of the committee has submitted some of this testimony. More of it is published in this summary of the report, appendix No. 3, from which extracts might be read to the House to throw light on this subject. But there is no time in this form of debate to go into that. Mr. Derby a recognized authority on cotton in England, says, in his opinion, an excise tax should be levied, and that five cents is not too high.

All who accede to this amount of tax desire a drawback should be made on manufactured goods when exported. It seems to me we cannot do better than follow the recommendation of the committee. If any member of the House has the facts which will overthrow the evidence upon which that recommendation is made, then we will have some substantial argument to go upon.

It is urged this will be a discouragement to cotton culture. If it were a necessity the tax now fixed should be a permanent tax there would be weight in that argument. No one supposes the price of cotton will rule lower for a year or two to come. It is not the expectation of those who are most directly concerned in the manufacture of cotton goods. If five cents is not too high now and should prove to be too high when the next Congress revises the internal revenue system it can be reduced.

We are fixing it upon the price cotton will rule for the next two years.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the committee rise to close debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAVES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 513, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. MORRILL moved that debate be closed in ten minutes on the pending section of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

TAX BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAVES in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being a bill of the House (No. 513) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the proposition, I understand now, is to raise the tax to six cents. The gentleman who made that proposition said, if the tax be reduced below five cents it will be necessary to substitute some other tax to make up that amount. I think the gentleman is mistaken. By the returns from the Treasury Department it appears the revenue for nine months of this year has been $410,000,000. The estimates for the remaining three months of the year, which have been made on a very low scale, give $91,000,000 additional, making $501,000,000 as the total revenue of the year. From the actual data, my own impression is, the revenue of the year will not be less than five hundred and twenty millions. The Secretary of the Treasury says that $350,000,000 of revenue will give him not less than fifty millions to appropriate toward the payment of the public debt next year; and he places that as the maximum amount of revenue which ought to be raised for the year commencing the 1st of July next.

Now, I say the reduction of tax we have proposed in this bill, without anything additional upon cotton, would not amount to the difference between $350,000,000 and the revenues of the present year, even with considerable allowance for the falling off of production the next year; and of that I have no apprehension. The South has come in, and we are preparing for thirty instead of twenty million people. I think, at the same rate of tax, the revenue for the next year will be as great as for the present year. I think we need have no apprehension on that score if we levy a tax on cotton as it was during the past year, and at the rate imposed while the war continued, a rate which the last Congress refused to increase after an animated debate.

I hope the tax will not be raised; that cotton, a southern production, will not be singled out as the only article upon which we shall impose increased taxation.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman has spoken of the amount of revenue. I wish to know whether he considers it exceptional, or does he suppose, if our present rate of tax remains, that amount will be realized?

Mr. BOUTWELL. When I was upon the floor before, I made a statement as to the amount of cotton introduced into Great Britain for consumption; that while the amount of American cotton between the years 1861 and 1865 fell off more than one million and a half bales, the total decrease of cotton consumed in England was only three hundred and thirty-six thousand bales. I say, also, that by the same tables, between the years 1861 and 1865, all the cotton imported into England, a portion of which was exported to the Continent in 1861, was over a million, exclusive of American cotton, while in 1865 the amount of cotton imported into England other than American cotton was two million bales and over, showing in four years the amount of that cotton was double.

Mr. DODGE. It strikes me the subject before the House to-night has a wider range than has been given to it in this debate. While we are looking at the income to be derived from cotton alone, we must not forget cotton is the basis upon which our importations are to be made in the future, and on any provision we make for the payment of the public debt we look to the duties on imports. We cannot have large importations unless we have some large article to export. There is nothing more important, to my mind, than that our country should gain as soon as possible the position we held in European markets previous to the war. We must not forget during these five years most gigantic efforts have been made to produce cotton in India; that where they produced cotton at a great disadvantage on account of the distance and cost of transportation, now, by means of railroads built by English capital, they are producing immense amounts of cotton. It strikes me, as a matter of importance to the United States, we should, as soon as possible, return to our normal condition, and raise not only twenty-five hundred thousand but five million bales of cotton. When we do that the price of cotton cannot be sustained above twelve and a half cents per pound.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask whether the gentleman does not know that they have raised cotton so extensively in India as to produce a famine because of the non-production of food, and that an order has also been issued by the Pacha of Egypt by which the land devoted to the culture of cotton will be largely restricted in amount for the same reasons.

Mr. DODGE. That was very natural. It arose from the high price of cotton and the immense stimulus given to its production. All that will be exported; they will not raise so much as to starve hereafter. We are to meet a tremendous competition from India, such as we have not met before; and I apprehend no act can be passed by this Congress which will give English capitalists more than the imposition of this tax.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. UPSON'S amendment; and being put, the said amendment was disagreed to.

The second section was then read, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the aforesaid tax upon cotton shall be levied by the assessor on the producer, owner, or holder thereof. And said tax shall be paid to the collector of internal revenue within and for the collection district in which said cotton shall have been produced, and before the same shall have been removed therefrom, except where otherwise provided in this act; and every collector to whom any tax upon cotton shall be paid shall mark the bales or other packages upon which the tax shall have been paid, in such manner as may clearly indicate the payment thereof, and shall give to the owner or other person having charge of such cotton a permit for the removal of the same, stating therein the amount and payment of the tax, the time and place of payment, and the weight and marks upon the bales and packages, so that the same may be fully identified; and it shall be the duty of every such collector to keep clear and sufficient records of all such cotton inspected or marked, and of all marks and identifications thereof, and of all permits for the removal of the same, and of all his transactions relating thereto; and he shall make full returns thereof, monthly, to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

No amendments were offered.

The third section was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized to designate one or more places in each collection district where an assessor or an assistant assessor and a collector or deputy collector shall be located, and where cotton may be brought for the purpose of being weighed and appropriately marked: Provided, That it shall be lawful for the assessor or assistant assessor and the collector or deputy collector to assess and cause to be properly marked the cotton wherever it may be in said district, their necessary traveling expenses to and from said designated place, for that purpose, being paid by the owners thereof.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I move to amend that section by striking out in the seventh line the words "lawful for" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "the duty of." Also, by inserting at the commencement of the tenth line the word "provided;" and also by striking out in the eleventh line the word "being," and inserting "be" in lieu thereof; so that it will read:

That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized to designate one or more places in each collection district where an assessor or an assistant assessor and a collector or deputy collector shall be located, and where cotton may be brought for the purpose of being weighed and appropriately marked: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the assessor or assistant assessor and the collector or deputy collector to assess and cause to be properly marked the cotton wherever it may be in said district: Provided, Their necessary traveling expenses to and from said designated place, for that purpose, be paid by the owners thereof.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The fourth section was then read, as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all cotton having been weighed and marked as herein provided, and for which permits shall have been duly obtained of the assessor, may be removed from the district in which it has been produced to any one other district, without prepayment of the tax due thereon, upon the execution of such transportation bonds or other security, and in accordance with such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. The said cotton so removed shall be delivered to the collector of internal revenue or his deputy forthwith upon its arrival at its point of destination, and shall remain subject to his control until the taxes thereon shall have been paid; but nothing herein contained shall authorize any delay of the payment of said taxes for more than ninety days from the date of the permits; and when cotton shall have been weighed and marked for which a permit shall have been granted without prepayment of the tax, it shall be the duty of the assessor granting such permit to give immediate notice of such permit to the collector of internal revenue for the district to which said cotton is to be transported, and he shall also transmit therewith a statement of the taxes due thereon, and of the bonds or other securities for the payment thereof, and he shall make full returns and statements of the same to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. KASSON. It strikes me that there is an omission in that section to which I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. It provides that the cotton shall remain under the control of the collector or his deputy until "the taxes thereon shall have been paid," but says nothing of the necessary charges of its custody. I move to insert after the word "thereon," in the thirteenth line, the words "or any necessary charges of custody thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I now move to strike out the word "one" where it occurs in the fifth line, so that the section will read:

That all cotton having been weighed and marked as herein provided, and for which permits shall have been duly obtained of the assessor, may be removed from the district in which it has been produced to any other district, without prepayment of the tax due thereon, &c.

I would inquire if it was the intention of the Committee of Ways and Means not to allow more than one removal.

Mr. MORRILL. The design of the committee was to allow the cotton to be moved from the place of production without prepayment of the tax to the port of destination, whether it be Savannah, New York, or Boston.

Mr. KASSON. Let me say that an important question is involved in this matter. It is of very great importance, when you levy a tax upon the raw material before it gets into consumption, that you allow the utmost freedom of transit and changing of hands, so that the tax may be collected as near the point of consumption as possible. This was the principle settled by the former Committee of Ways and Means on questions of this kind; and I am very desirous that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means shall consent to such liberty in the transactions of commerce as would be involved in the authority to make any number of changes of location under the security of bonds and under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. This is a very heavy tax, and it is going to be very inconvenient to commerce unless you, as far as possible, emancipate commerce from unnecessary restrictions; and as the cotton cannot be removed from the district until a permit is given, let there be free transit from one point to another in the district.

Mr. MORRILL. I think if the gentleman will read the section he will see that the party may move the cotton to any other district upon giving the proper bonds or other security.

Mr. KASSON. There may be one removal. I want more than that.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Section five was then read, as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be unlawful from and after the 1st day of September, 1866, for the owner, master, supercargo, agent, or other person having charge of any vessel, or for any railroad company, or other transportation company, or for any common carrier, or other person, to convey, or attempt to convey, or transport any cotton—the growth or produce of the United States—to any point out of the district in which it shall have been produced, unless each bale or package thereof shall have attached to or accompanying it the proper mark or evidence of the payment of the revenue tax and a permit of the collector for such removal, or the permit of the assessor, as heretofore provided, under regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. And any person or persons who shall violate the provisions of this act in this respect shall be liable to a penalty of $100 for each bale of cotton so conveyed or transported, or attempted to be conveyed or transported, or to imprisonment for not more than one year, or both; and all vessels and vehicles employed in such conveyance or transportation shall be liable to seizure and forfeiture by proceedings in any court of the United States having competent jurisdiction. And all cotton so shipped or attempted to be shipped or transported beyond the collection district in which it was produced, without payment of the tax, or the execution of such transportation bonds and other security, as provided in this act, shall be forfeited to the United States, and the proceeds thereof distributed according to the statute in like cases provided.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend this section by striking out after the words "United States," where they first occur, the words "to any point out of," and inserting the words "from any point in;" so that that portion of the section will read, "transport any cotton, the growth or produce of the United States, from any point in the district in which it shall have been produced," &c.

And I also move to amend by inserting after the words "subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury," the following:

Nor to convey or transport any cotton from any State, in which cotton is produced, to any port or place within the United States without a certificate from the collector of internal revenue of the district from which it was brought, and such other evidence as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, that the tax has been paid thereon; and such certificate and evidence as aforesaid shall be furnished to the collector of the district to which it is transported, and his permit obtained before landing, discharging, or delivering such cotton at the place to which it is transported as aforesaid.

As the section now stands, without this amendment, no railroad company, or common carrier, or any party could transport cotton in any part of the United States without having a permit from the collector of the district from which the cotton is taken, to make the transportation. We have provided in the previous sections for the tax on the cotton being paid before it is shipped from the State where the cotton is produced. When that shipment is made, this amendment proposes that evidence shall be had that the tax has been duly paid before the shipment was made. My object is that when the cotton arrives at New York, or Boston, or Cincinnati, the transportation of it shall be free like that of any other article; that the railroad that conveys it shall not be responsible for the fact that the tax has not been paid upon it.

I believe this amendment has the sanction of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MORRILL. I am not quite sure that I fully understand the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hooper.] I will ask the gentleman if his amendment will cut off the right of transporting cotton in bond from one port to another.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. There has been no power given by the previous sections to transport from one port to another. The power given in section four is to transport from the district where the cotton is produced to any one other district, meaning to cover the district from whence the cotton is shipped. For instance, cotton produced anywhere in Alabama or Louisiana may be sent from the district where it is produced to the port of New Orleans, from which it is usually shipped, and the tax on the cotton can be paid at New Orleans.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would inquire of the gentleman if the latter part of section five does not provide that this transportation may be in bond. The amendment which the gentleman proposes requires the tax to be paid before any person can transport cotton from the district.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. From the district where it is produced.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir; from the district where it is produced. I understand that under the fourth section cotton raised in Tennessee may be transported to Charleston, South Carolina, in bond, and the tax there paid. But under the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] the tax must be paid before the shipment is made.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The amendment allows the shipment to be made from Tennessee to Charleston. But it is confined to one district, the district of Charleston. There the duty must be paid. When it is shipped from Charleston to go to the North, to New York for example, a permit or certificate from the collector at Charleston must be obtained, and shown to the collector at New York to satisfy him that the tax on this cotton had been paid when it was shipped from Charleston. Then the collector at New York gives his permit to land it, and after that it is free to be transported anywhere, without imposing upon the railroad, the wagons, or the vessel the trouble of ascertaining that the tax has been paid.

Mr. KASSON. Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether it will not be necessary in that case to make provision for properly stamping or certifying the bale as free. We have these other provisions requiring that it shall be verified as liable to tax; and now the gentleman proposes that at a certain time it shall be discharged from that liability. But in the same market there will be other bales which will be liable to tax; and how will the discrimination be made after the cotton once leaves the ship?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. In reply to that question, I beg to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that all the cotton has to be inspected and marked when the tax is paid, or before it is paid. My object is to provide for what actually occurs, that in handling these bales in the course of the different shipments these marks become erased. What I propose is that after the cotton arrives at New York or elsewhere in the North, it shall be assumed that the tax has been paid although the cotton may not have these marks upon it.

I am told that now, by the regulation, every bale of cotton must have attached to it a tag showing that the tax has been paid. But in point of fact those tags get destroyed in the course of the handling and shipment of the article. If you should examine the cotton in the factories of New England you would find that nine bales out of ten were without tags, or any other evidence that the tax had been paid. Under the bill, as it reads without the amendment which I offer, it would be impossible for any railroad company to take the responsibility of transporting a bale of cotton.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the amendment is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by striking out the word "and" in the twenty-seventh line of the fifth section, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next section was read, as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That upon articles manufactured exclusively from cotton, when exported, there shall be allowed as a drawback an amount equal to the internal tax which shall have been assessed and paid upon such articles in their finished condition, and in addition thereto a drawback or allowance of as many cents per pound upon the pound of cotton cloth, yarn, or other articles manufactured exclusively from cotton and exported, as shall have been assessed and paid in the form of an internal tax upon the raw cotton entering into the manufacture of said cloth or other article, the amount of such allowance or drawback to be ascertained in such manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury; and so much of section one hundred and seventy-one of the act of June 30, 1864, to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes, as now provides for a drawback on manufactured cotton, is hereby repealed.

Mr. LYNCH. I move to amend by striking out, in the second line of this section, the words "when exported;" and also the words "and exported," in the eighth line.

Mr. Chairman, as has been said by one gentleman, a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, the consumer of the cotton goods must finally pay this tax as provided by the bill. The effect of my amendment will be to relieve the consumer from this tax, and place it only upon such portions of the crop as is exported. It will accomplish what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] seeks to accomplish by a constitutional amendment, the success of which is, I think, very doubtful.

This bill is presented as one designed to reduce the taxes of the people; yet it is proposed to put a tax of five cents per pound on cotton goods, which are consumed mainly by the poorer classes of the people. The wealthy people use silks, linens, &c., while the poor use more of the cotton goods. If this amendment be adopted, the consumers of cotton goods in this country will be relieved of the tax, while it will be placed on the exported cotton. I presume this will satisfy those persons who go for an export tax upon cotton, and also that class of gentlemen here who are in favor of reducing the tax; for it will reduce the tax to just the amount of the drawback upon the amount manufactured in the United States. You raise revenue simply on the amount exported. As to the amount consumed in this country, the tax upon it would be paid finally by the consumer here.

Mr. MOORHEAD. The gentleman's proposition would amount to a tax on exports.

Mr. LYNCH. Certainly it would.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Can you do that constitutionally?

Mr. LYNCH. I suppose no one will doubt the constitutional power to collect the tax in the first place; and I think there can be no doubt that the Government has the right to remit this tax by way of drawback.

It seems to me we ought not to put this heavy tax upon the poorer class of the community, while we are reducing the taxes generally in this bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I am somewhat surprised at the motion of the gentleman from Maine. Although he has always said he was in favor of the tax, yet in his motion he is in favor of refunding the tax we are proposing to levy.

Mr. LYNCH. I will say that I intended to propose an increased tax of ten cents per pound, and then to have given this drawback. But I did not get an opportunity to offer that amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman not having had an opportunity to offer that will see that he ought not to have offered this. Of course we understand on whatever we consume or manufacture of this cotton we pay a tax; but the object is to get not only a tax upon that used by ourselves, but on what is consumed and purchased by others.

There is another objection. We have been desirous to avoid all constitutional scruples as to levying this tax. If we levy it upon our own people they have to pay the precise tax paid by those abroad. We obviate all objection on the ground that this is an export duty in disguise.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I move to make the drawback six cents.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not germane to the pending amendment.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I move to strike out the words "when exported."

I understand the effect of this proposition to give this drawback in favor of manufactured goods which are exported is to give a premium to the manufacturers of cotton goods. It holds out an inducement to manufacture cotton goods for exportation, and will of course increase the manufacture of cotton goods in this country to some extent.

If they can make four cents by exporting it, or whatever the amount may be, it is to that extent a discrimination in favor of the manufacturer sending his goods to a foreign market. Or he will charge that on the consumers at home. With the heavy tax upon cotton it will not be exported at all. It will amount to fifty per cent. of its cost. The manufacture of cotton goods will then be done almost entirely in this country, because it will be done fifty per cent. cheaper in this country than in England. It will be sufficient to put it into manufactured goods before exported. These cunning gentlemen will manufacture every bale into goods and get the drawback.

With the increased price who gets the money? The manufacturer. He takes the cotton bales and turns them into cotton padding or anything else he pleases. That is the effect of this bill. We will get no revenue. As soon as they get the spindles at work they will turn them into rope or something else for exportation.

The principle upon which the revenue law is passed is violated by this provision. We tax that article which enters into the consumption of every man, woman, and child, white or black, in the country, and especially the largest portion is used by the poorer classes. The tax is heaviest upon those who wear coarse cotton goods. They must pay this tax, and they almost exclusively, as has been said by the gentleman from Maine, although those who have the means of paying these taxes are by these means exempted. The tax will ultimately be extracted from the toiling millions of the country.

I protest against indirect taxation of the absolute necessities of life. My constituents are clothed almost exclusively in cotton goods. They use some woollens but mostly cotton goods. They sleep on cotton, they walk in cotton, and no matter what the price of corn is they must pay the tax. I am opposed to it. I am opposed to anything like these drawbacks on cotton goods. If manufacturers turn this cotton into the manufactured article let it go to foreign countries without drawback. By making a discrimination between cotton goods and the raw cotton you do violate the principles referred to.

Mr. PAINE. I rise to ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] a single question. He stated that he was in favor of imposing a tax on cotton manufactured in the United States and consumed in the United States so that a tax might also be imposed upon cotton exported to foreign countries.

Mr. MORRILL. Upon raw cotton exported.

Mr. PAINE. I understand him now as in favor of imposing a tax on manufactured cotton made in the United States so that he may be able to impose a tax upon raw cotton exported to foreign countries. Now, it seems to me that all constitutional objections to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] could be obviated if the gentleman from Vermont would state, as I understood him to state, that he is in favor of imposing a tax on cotton manufactured in the United States and consumed in the United States, in order to be able to impose such a tax on cotton manufactured in the United States and consumed abroad. If that should be done, then if a drawback is allowed on cotton exported to foreign countries manufactured in the United States, it might with equal propriety be allowed on cotton manufactured in the United States and consumed at home. Because, if no discrimination is made in cotton manufactured and consumed here and against cotton manufactured here and consumed abroad, there can be no evasion of the constitutional provision. And it seems to me if we can, without invading the constitutional provision, do something for the poor men of the country who consume cotton manufactured here we ought to do it.

Now, it is true, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] has said, that most of the consumers of cotton in this country are poor men. They do not wear silks and broadcloths as do the rich; and if a tax is imposed upon cotton manufactured in this country and consumed here, it must ultimately be paid by those who are least able to bear it.

I am in favor of fostering the manufacture of cotton. I shall vote for protection here whenever the opportunity shall offer. But I cannot see why we should take this mode of fostering domestic manufacture, whether in cotton or anything else, by a discrimination in favor of the purchaser in a foreign market and against the purchaser in our own market; in favor of the foreign consumer and against the home consumer.

I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and I desire, as he does, to foster domestic manufactures; but I do not wish to do it at the expense of home consumers and for the benefit of foreign consumers. I would do it in such a way that the poor people of this country who consume cotton goods mainly may not have this heavy burden to bear.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I withdraw it.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out the word "exported." I believe it is there somewhere.

I agree with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] if you could fairly reach what he is at; that is, if he would make it ten cents, and then withdraw the home duty so as to leave it on the exported article, it would come to just what I propose in my constitutional amendment which I sent to the committee the other day. I think there never was a grander time in the world for the manufacturing of all the cotton for the world wherever civilized man exists. An export duty of ten cents on cotton would give to your home manufactures the markets of the world. That is the true way to protect home industry and to wrest from foreigners a revenue which shall pay off your national debt. That is what ought to be done.

I suggest to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] that I would go for an amendment of ten cents provided it was not liable to the objection, as a gentleman here suggests, of chasing the old fellow around the stump; for it is whipping the devil around the stump there is no mistake. [Laughter.]

Mr. LYNCH. No matter, if you can only hit him. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. Now, as to the effect which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] speaks of, I should be glad if this measure did have that effect, if it did induce our people to manufacture every dollar's worth of the cotton we raise, and send it abroad in a manufactured shape. I should be glad if our institutions and laws were so framed that in Illinois there would be hundreds of thousands of spindles; that the engines which in Europe do the work of twenty million men should be planted all over this country to do the work here, so as to increase still further the necessity for laboring men and augment their wages.

My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] says that he wants to see the provision so fixed as to favor the poor men who are clothed in cotton. Who makes the cotton? Who manufactures it? Is it not the poor man? Why not so arrange it that you can raise his wages? You can do it by increasing the manufacturing interests of this country. When you have done that, when you have given the laborer his wages, he can afford to pay for what he consumes, and when you have done that you will double the price of the products of Wisconsin and Illinois; you will have a market at home for your products and not have to send them abroad to feed the laborer of Europe. But I do not despair of seeing the constitutional amendment allowing an export duty on cotton passed before the close of the session; if my friend from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] will only report it back, I am sure we shall pass it, and that the country will approve it, and then our country will become the great hive of manufacturing industry for all the civilized nations of the world this side of the Indies.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL. I move pro formâ to strike out all after the word "drawback" in the third line and insert in lieu thereof "one half cent per pound." I do it merely for the purpose of submitting a remark or two in regard to the subject of taxation upon cotton.

I am opposed on principle to the whole tax; at least I think if there is any at all, it should be very small in amount. And it is for this reason: in raising revenue to support the Government, we should endeavor, as far as possible, to impose the burdens of the Government upon the wealthy, and not upon the poor.

The effect of this tax upon cotton is manifestly to shift the burdens of the Government from the rich to the poor. The cotton fabrics of the country are consumed almost exclusively—the heavy articles especially—by the laboring white men of the country, and by the poor freedmen. By reducing the tax upon incomes, and increasing it upon cotton, you are shifting the burdens of the Government from the rich to the poor, and putting the tax directly upon the poor men of the country which ought to be imposed upon the wealthy men of the country.

This tax upon cotton will not be felt by the wealthy monopolist whose family are clothed in silks and satins, and in expensive imported goods from foreign countries. He will pay no part of it. The wealthy man who can afford to wear fine linen will pay no part of it; but the poor and humble men at the South, at the West, and at the East, and all over the country will bear the burden of the tax that is imposed by this provision of the bill. And I must say here, that while there are many features of this bill of which I approve, if these clauses are retained I shall feel compelled to vote against the entire bill when it is submitted for the determination of a vote of the House.

This clause which we are immediately considering I regard as exceedingly objectionable. What is the effect of it? You propose to raise the tax to five cents per pound on the raw cotton of the country; and when it is manufactured here, and the poor man of the country buys his shirt or his calico or the humble garments to clothe his wife and children, he must bear the burden of this tax; but when it is exported to Germany or France, or any other foreign country, you take off this tax; you lay the burden upon the poor men of this country, while you are furnishing shirts and other garments to the men of other countries at a lower price than you are furnishing them for to the citizens of your own country. It is an unjust and, it seems to me, a most outrageous discrimination against the poor of the country, in favor of the rich of this country and the people of foreign nations.

It seems to me that the system of legislation here for the last few years has been to discriminate in favor of the wealthy, in favor of the manufacturers, in favor of the bondholders, in favor of the capitalists and monopolists of the country, and to impose the burdens of the Government upon the agriculturists, upon the poor men of the West and of the South, and even the poor men of the East, shifting it from the shoulders of the wealthy who ought to bear the principal burden of the Government.

Mr. GRISWOLD. The main object, I suppose, of the bill under consideration is the raising of revenue, and I presume it will be conceded by all that the more generally you can distribute the tax the less onerous it is.

Now, I desire, for the information of the gentlemen who have made use of the argument that this tax will oppress the poor of the country, that the Clerk will read from the report of the revenue commission the extract I have marked showing the bearing of this tax on cotton.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The above proposed rate of taxation on cotton, it is believed, will not prove in any degree detrimental to any national interest, and will yield a revenue, at twenty-two dollars per bale, of $22,000,000 for every million bales produced and sold for consumption. With a crop of three million bales, and a tax of five cents per pound, the Government might derive an annual revenue of $66,000,000; or of $88,000,000 on a crop of four million bales, which would be less than the crop of 1859-60. Of this sum—if the consumption of the United States shall reach, in either of these years, the consumption of 1860—the inhabitants of the United States would pay about twenty-one million dollars; and it is believed that there are few taxes which can be levied which would be so slight a burden to the consumer. The consumption of cotton per head in the United States, at the highest point ever attained to, has not exceeded twelve pounds. A tax of five cents per pound would therefore be an average of about sixty cents to each individual per annum. (See Special Report No. 3.) As the crop of the present year, in the opinion of competent persons consulted by the commission, is not likely to be less than two million bales, and if good seed can be obtained may exceed this figure, the commission are of the opinion that the Government may safely rely for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, upon a revenue from this source of at least $40,000,000.

"With an increase of the crop, in subsequent years, beyond two million bales per annum, accompanied by a consequent reduction of the market price of the same, a corresponding reduction of the proposed rate of tax may probably be found expedient; but, in any event, the commission believe that for the future an average revenue from cotton of at least $50,000,000 may undoubtedly be relied upon."

Mr. MARSHALL. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out this entire section.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not germane to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. LYNCH], which is pending, to strike out the words "when exported" and also the words "and exported."

Mr. RAYMOND. Is debate exhausted on the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. RAYMOND. I move, pro formâ, to strike out the word "exported" from the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. LYNCH]. I do it merely for the purpose of having an opportunity of saying that I think there is much in the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] that is entirely misplaced. The appeal that he makes on behalf of the poor of this country is entirely misplaced, is based on a wrong estimation of the facts.

He asserts that cotton goods are used exclusively by the poor, while the rich use linen, silk, and other expensive articles. Now, while it is true that the poor use little but cotton, it is also equally true that the rich use far more cotton than the poor do, and pay far more of the tax upon cotton in proportion.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman and of the House to this fact in addition. If this section of the bill stood by itself, and there were no compensating clauses in other parts of the bill, there might be some force in the argument of the gentleman. But as we go on through the bill we will find various sections bearing almost exclusively upon the wealthier classes of the community. It is not right, therefore, to make an argument against any particular section because it applies to a certain class more than to another. When we come to the portion relating to the income tax we will find enough to offset anything that may be in this section.

I trust the argument brought to bear against this particular section will not be considered to have any special weight. It seems to me that it is important to allow a drawback on cotton exported when manufactured in order to enable our manufacturers to compete with the manufacturers of other nations in foreign markets. We have hitherto had access to the markets of China and the Indies for our poorer qualities of cotton goods, and have held our own there against the looms of England and other nations. In order to maintain that ascendancy we must allow a drawback on goods exported. It seems to me but simple justice to our manufacturers, who export to foreign markets where they must contend with the manufacturer of England, to allow the drawback here proposed. It is not an excessive drawback. All those who testified in favor of a tax upon cotton also testified that in order to maintain our foothold in those markets a drawback equivalent to the excise tax will be absolutely necessary.

I now withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. Before the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] is withdrawn, I desire to say a few words. The debate has wandered widely from the proposition of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. LYNCH.] But it may be as well to confess that upon this section rests the whole question in relation to the imposition of a productive tax upon cotton. So far at least as I am concerned it certainly does. I shall not be in favor of the tax if we so hamper it as to secure all the trade in cotton manufactures now and forever to British looms and spindles.

The question arises here, and it is suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARDING], that we are made to pay more for our cotton goods at home, in consequence of allowing this drawback upon manufactures exported. Now, with all respect for that gentleman, I do not conceive that to be the fact of the case.

Mr. UPSON. Will the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORRILL. I prefer not to be interrupted now. If we do not allow this drawback, then the result will be that we shall not manufacture the amount of cotton we have hitherto done, or shall not manufacture any increased amount to send abroad. Now, would it not be to the advantage of this country if we were to admit raw silk, and the means of manufacturing it, and laborers to manufacture it, to come here and manufacture a large amount of silk goods such as we now import from abroad, even if we allowed them to be exported and reimported to this country? Would not so much added to the industry of the country be a public benefit? Would it not be a blessing to the State of Wisconsin and the State of Illinois to have one hundred thousand more laborers employed than they now have consuming their products? Certainly that would be a desirable result.

As to this drawback making our products here any higher for our people, I say, with all respect, that that proposition is an absurdity; for the only duty that is levied upon our goods is levied upon the raw cotton and upon the manufactured cotton. Does it make any difference in regard to the prices of what we consume, whether there shall be one million more bales of cotton manufactured in this country or not? Certainly not. But by the introduction of improved machinery and the employment of a larger force of laborers in manufacturing cotton, we should inevitably in a short time reduce the cost of even what we consume at home.

As I stated in my remarks of yesterday, we allow the same principle to apply to any other article of manufacture. For one, I would be very glad to apply it to everything in the way of manufactures that it is possible to make provision for, so that we may accurately ascertain the amount of duty that has been paid upon the raw material. Suppose, for instance, we could provide some means by which we could ascertain the duties paid upon the raw materials used in the article of shovels, manufactured by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. AMES,] a large sale of which he has hitherto enjoyed in Australia on account of the superior quality of the article he made. He is now perhaps in some danger of competition from manufacturers abroad, so that that trade may become extinct. Would it not be a proper course of legislation if we could reach the matter precisely and ascertain the amount of duties paid by him upon the iron and steel he uses, to allow him a drawback upon the shovels he may manufacture and send to Australia? And the same remark applies to boots and shoes, to agricultural implements and to steam engines in which our artisans particularly excel.

That is all we propose to do in relation to this article of cotton. Even if the amount manufactured should be no more than was manufactured before the war, I want to set in motion all those factories that have been stopped since the war of the rebellion began even in the South. Take the one hundred and eighty-five cotton manufactories in a single State, the most of which are now idle; pass this bill, and we at once set them in motion again.

Does any gentleman object? I cannot see for myself how any gentleman will object. If we succeed in manufacturing the whole cotton crop I would gladly give it up, because instead of a revenue of forty-four we would have added to the wealth of the country more than one hundred million.

Mr. PAINE. I rise for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Vermont if he can inform us how large a proportion of the cotton crop is manufactured in the United States, in order that the House may judge how large a proportion of the internal revenue of the United States would be lost if a drawback be allowed.

Mr. MORRILL. From one quarter to one third—perhaps not more than one fifth usually of the cotton crop is used in America, and not more than one tenth of that is manufactured by us for export. The amount is very trifling.

Mr. RAYMOND, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. LYNCH's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out the entire section.

Mr. Chairman, the only theory on which this tax on raw cotton can be justified, and the only theory on which it is justified, is that we have the monopoly of the production of cotton. The testimony taken before the revenue commissioners, as well as that taken before the committee, was to the effect that we would have the monopoly of the production of cotton in this country.

The proposition of the committee is to take from the Treasury of the United States whatever amount of revenue we collect from the raw cotton manufactured in the United States for exportation and placing it in the hands of manufacturers of cotton goods.

For one I am in favor of protecting the manufacture of cotton wherever it needs protection, but the testimony is that the manufacturers do not need any protection. It is true they cannot manufacture what is needed in this country. It is therefore that I am not prepared to take money out of the Treasury of the United States, when it has been placed there to raise revenue, and to place it in the hands of the manufacturers of cotton goods, to specially stimulate that interest.

I do not think for the next three or four years we will have erected many new manufactories of cotton goods. The cost of machinery is too great. There are manufactories enough to manufacture what is needed for this country, and I am not willing to take money out of the Treasury to encourage that industry. I would be willing to encourage it, but not to take money from the Treasury that we put there to pay the interest on our debts and to meet current expenses.

The evidence is that the manufacturers of cotton goods need no protection at home; that they can compete successfully with British manufacturers of cotton. I know gentlemen say there is a certain class of cotton articles in this country in which we cannot compete with British manufacture, low-price cotton goods, but they are a small amount. But we have not exported, for the last four or five years, any great amount of cotton goods.

A leading gentleman of a manufacturing county of Massachusetts said, before the committee and before the revenue commissioners, that the tax to-day was paid by the manufacturer of cotton, and not by the consumer—why? Because of the great advance in cotton. We allow a drawback on the exportation of manufactured goods, and we also allow two cents drawback on raw cotton. I think that is sufficient until we test the effect of this law. Therefore I am in favor of letting the drawback remain as it is. I believe this tax on raw cotton is an experiment. I think we can stand a small duty on cotton. I do not believe, when we produce from five to six and ten million bales, we can afford to levy a heavy tax when exported from the country.

Mr. BLAINE. What is the average duty on manufactured cotton goods abroad?

Mr. ALLISON. Twenty-eight per cent.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that with an average duty of twenty-eight per cent. abroad and an excise duty of five per cent., American manufactures can compete with foreign manufactures?

Mr. ALLISON. That is not my statement. My statement is only the testimony of Mr. Atkinson, a distinguished manufacturer of Boston, who said to the Committee of Ways and Means that the manufactures of cotton could compete in the future in the finest articles.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course that gentleman must have meant that with the existing rate of duties, both external and internal, we could compete. He could not have meant anything else than that. I admit that. If we need an import duty of twenty-eight per cent. to enable us to compete here, to place us on a level at home, it is a simple absurdity our competing with any foreign market. Therefore, unless we give to the American manufacturers the advantages we propose in this section, we just simply give up all idea, we surrender here and now all pretense of competing anywhere except on our own soil.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would ask the gentleman whether cotton manufacturers at the present time are not able to compete with foreign manufacturers in a great many articles.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not pretend to say but they do.

Mr. MORRILL. I will state that for the last two or three months our manufacturers have been doing a losing business, and many have stopped.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not hesitate to say that it is a perfect absurdity to attempt in this country to compete with these manufactures, for we have demonstrated over and over again that with from twenty-five to forty per cent. before our excise taxes were put on, we could not compete with them. Therefore, to take the ground of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] and strike that drawback section out, is simply giving up all and surrendering to British and other foreign manufacturers. That must be the inevitable result.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of adjourning.

Mr. MORRILL. Dispose of this section first.

Mr. SPALDING. We cannot get through. Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. If the vote can be taken now, I will withdraw it.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ALLISON to strike out section six, no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Messrs. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, and KUYKENDALL.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 14, noes 56; no quorum voting.

Mr. ANCONA. I raise the point of order that there being no quorum present it is necessary that the roll shall be called.

Mr. MORRILL. I regret that the gentleman makes that point, but if he insists of course we shall have to adjourn. I was in hopes we should sit until ten o'clock each night.

Mr. ANCONA. I will withdraw the point of order if the gentleman will move an adjournment at ten o'clock.

Mr. MORRILL. I will as soon as we take the question on striking out this section. I think the House is ready to vote on it.

Mr. ANCONA. I will withdraw it with the understanding that the committee rise.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. This is a very important question and we ought to have a quorum.

The question being again taken on striking out the section, there were—ayes 20, noes 60; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PERHAM and ELDRIDGE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 28, noes 65.

So the motion to strike out the section was disagreed to.

The Clerk commenced to read the seventh section.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being bill of the House No. 518, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. WINDOM, (at ten o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. BAXTER: The petition of Hon. Russell S. Taft, and Hon. A. L. Catlin, and others, citizens of the city of Burlington, Vermont, praying for an additional tariff on foreign wool.

Also, the petition of Hon. Amasa Pound, and 42 others, citizens of Lowell, Orleans county, Vermont, praying for an additional tariff on foreign wool.

Also, the petition of 30 wool-growers of Smithfield, Jefferson county, Ohio, on the same subject.

By Mr. HOLMES: Remonstrance of Dwight H. Clarke, and others, citizens and practicing attorneys of Chenango county, New York, against passage of act reorganizing the Federal judiciary.

By Mr. KELSO: A petition from the citizens of Springfield, Missouri, for a law regulating inter-State insurances of all kinds.

By Mr. McINDOE: The petition of C. Moser, and others, asking that a mail route be established from Alma, Buffalo county, Wisconsin, to Durand, Pepin county, Wisconsin.

Also, the petition of Hugh Douglas, and others, asking for the extension of mail route No. 13151 from Melrose, Jackson county, Wisconsin, to Sparta, Monroe county, Wisconsin.

Also, the petition of O. L. Maxson, asking that mail route No. 13166, from Reed Landing, Minnesota, to Bay City, be extended to Prescott, Wisconsin; also, for the establishing of a mail route from River Falls, Pierce county, Wisconsin, to Brooksville, St. Croix county, Wisconsin.

Also, the petition of Otis B. Lapham, and 310 others, in relation to the disposition of the grant of land to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a railroad from Portage City, or Berlin, or Fond du Lac, or Doty's Island, to Bayfield, on Lake Superior.

Also, the petition of H. Lewis, and 63 others, praying for the passage of a law for the regulation of inter-State insurance.

Also, asking a mail route from Manston, Juneau county, Wisconsin, by Germantown, to Werner, Juneau county, Wisconsin.

By Mr. MORRILL: The petition of Isaac H. Morgan, and others, citizens of Poultney, Rutland county, Vermont, praying for an additional tariff on foreign wool.

Also, the petition of J. R. Parish, and 55 others, citizens of Randolph, Orange county, Vermont, praying for an additional tariff on foreign wool.

Also, the petition of Hon. K. M. Bell, and 36 others, citizens of Lapeham, Orange county, Vermont, praying for an additional tariff on foreign wool.

Also, the petition of Hon. Augustus P. Hutton, and 42 others, citizens of Bethel, Windsor county, Vermont, praying for an additional tariff on foreign wool.

Also, the petition of T. A. Roundy, and 103 others, citizens of Windsor county, Vermont, praying for an increase of tariff on wool equal to protection given to the manufacturers of woollens.

By Mr. ORTH: The petition from officers and soldiers of Indian brigades, asking for bounties.

By Mr. PAINE: The petition of George W. McCalvy, and others, citizens of Wheatland, Kenosha county, Wisconsin, for increase of duty on foreign woools.

Also, the petition of Thomas Slade, and others, citizens of Wheatland, Kenosha county, Wisconsin, for increase of duties on foreign woools.

By Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts: The petition of Franklin Childs, and 41 others, tobacco-growers in the town of Conway, Massachusetts, asking for increased protection against the importation of cigars.

Also, the petition of George W. Groves, and 33 others, tobacco-growers in the town of Sandorland, Massachusetts, for the same purpose.

By Mr. WOODBRIDGE: The petition of William H. Hull, and 80 others, citizens of Wells, Rutland county, Vermont, praying for an additional tariff on foreign wool.

Also, the petition of Seymour Harwood, and 58 others, citizens of Rupert, Bennington county, Vermont, praying for an additional tariff on foreign wool.

Also, the petition of Horatio Templeton, and others, citizens of Washington county, Vermont, praying for an additional tariff on foreign wool.

Also, the petition of Jason P. Lord, and 42 others, citizens of Keedsboro, Bennington county, Vermont, praying for an additional tariff on foreign wool.

Also, the petition of S. W. Webster, and 42 others, citizens of Stamford, Bennington county, Vermont, praying for an additional tax on foreign wool.

Also, the petition of Charles M. Bruce, and 44 others, citizens of Danbury, Rutland county, Vermont, praying for an additional tariff on foreign wool.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 9, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of Charles W. Whitney, praying for additional compensation for building the iron-clad gunboat Keokuk; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COWAN presented the petition of John A. Wood, and others, representing that they are engaged in running coal to market down the Ohio river from Pittsburg, and that in the prosecution of that business they are much annoyed and suffer great loss of property by the bad navigation of the upper Ohio river, and praying that Congress will grant the necessary assistance for the purpose of preventing the evil of which they complain; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented twenty-one petitions numerously signed by citizens of Delaware county, Pennsylvania, praying for such a modification of the internal revenue laws as will tend to relieve the manufacturing and laboring interests from the oppressive burdens under which they now suffer; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLEY. I present the memorial of one hundred and sixty-two citizens of Harper's Ferry, West Virginia, setting forth the fact that they purchased homesteads in that village from the Government of the United States, and contributed to the building up of the town, with the assurance of the Government that the armory established there would be permanent; but in consequence of the results growing out of the war the armory has ceased to employ any hands there in the service of the Government, so that work has been discontinued, and they are nearly ruined in consequence of the depreciation of their property growing out of these facts; and they conclude by asking that the Government may dispose of the property owned by it at the junction of the rivers to a manufacturing company or otherwise, so that the property may be still valuable, otherwise they will be utterly ruined. I ask the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

It was so referred.

Mr. CRESWELL presented the petition of George C. Cooper and John G. Mitchell, on behalf of a large number of citizens of Prince George county, Maryland, praying for the establishment of a post route from Buena Vista to Mitchellville and Coopersville, in that county; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. POMEROY presented the memorial of Lucy B. Armstrong, in behalf of certain stewards of the Wyandot and Quindaro mission, Kansas conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, praying for an appropriation of $6,000 for the purpose of building churches and enclosing the graveyards of the Wyandot Indians with permanent enclosures; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. STEWART, it was Ordered, That John Graham have leave to withdraw his petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Enos Kelly, of Napoli, Cattaraugus county, New York, setting forth that he has not a dollar's worth of property in the world, and that of seven sons who entered the service of the United States at the outbreak of the rebellion, he lost three, and praying that he may be granted a pension, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia; which was agreed to.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 289) to provide for the probate of and for the recording of wills of real estate situated in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 482) to incorporate the Howard Institute and Home of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Sarah J. Purcell, praying for a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 314,) for the relief of Sarah J. Purcell. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of George W. Martin, praying for an investigation of an alteration which he alleges to have been made in the executive record of the Senate, whereby the confirmation of his nomination as a military storekeeper in the Army was not communicated to the President, in consequence of which he failed to receive his commission, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That immediately upon the close of each session of Congress, the Secretary of the Senate shall make a list of all nominations not acted upon by the Senate, and after having made a record thereof, shall transmit the same to the President.

The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 130) to carry into immediate effect the bill to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy; reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 295) repealing the thirty-fourth section of the declaration of rights of the State of Maryland so far as the same has been recognized or adopted in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 72) for the relief of Ruth Ellen Grelaud, widow of John H. Grelaud, deceased, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 97) in addition to the several acts for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of government of the United States, and to resume the legislative powers delegated to the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the levy court in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 265) to protect the manufacturers of mineral waters in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 510) to incorporate the Academy of Music of Washington city, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. The same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 305) to amend an act entitled "An act concerning notaries public in the District of Columbia," approved April 8, 1864, have instructed me to report that legislation on the subject is inexpedient. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have received a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relating to the Sioux Indians, accompanied by a bill. I ask leave without previous notice to introduce the bill that it may be read twice, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and printed.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 312) to restore to certain bands of Sioux Indians the balance of certain annuities heretofore confiscated; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 313) to regulate the transportation of nitro-glycerine, or glycin oil; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 315) to regulate appointments to and removals from office; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have that bill read at length, if there be no objection.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; let it be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. As the subject is under discussion before the Senate now, I should really like to have it read.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is not lengthy.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is very unusual to read bills at length when they are introduced. I ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be entered, if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 316) to establish a post route from West Alburg, Vermont, to Champlain, in the State of New York; and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NATIONAL THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.

Mr. WADE. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 352) to incorporate the National Theological Institute, to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage, and I am requested to ask for its immediate consideration. Those who have it in charge are exceedingly anxious that it should pass now on account of the great synod that is about to be held here in reference to it. If there be no objection—and there can be no objection to it that I can see—I ask that it be put on its passage now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to create and declare Abram D. Gillette, Edgar H. Gray, Edmund Turney, Zalmon Richards, Robert J. Powell, William T. Johnson, Henry Beard, Charles H. Morse, Joseph C. Lewis, John S. Poler, David Rees, D. W. Anderson, Daniel C. Eddy, Leonard A. Grimes, Justice D. Fulton, William R. Williams, Isaac Westcott, Howard Malcom, Joseph H. Kennard, Newton Brown, T. Dwight Miller, and all persons who shall or may be associated with them, and their successors, a body corporate and politic, in deed and in law, by the name of "the National Theological Institute," with the usual powers of a corporation. The object and purpose of this corporation is to be for the education of persons for the Christian ministry, and those associated with them as assistants, in such course of theological and general studies as may be deemed proper for that purpose; but no person is to be excluded from the advantages of education afforded by the institute on account of theological belief.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. I simply want to inquire of the Senator reporting the bill whether this is a corporation confined to this District by its terms.

Mr. MORRILL. It is.

Mr. POMEROY. I listened to the reading of the bill, and I thought that by its terms it was not confined to the District. It simply says that they may have a right to do anything not inconsistent with the laws of the District; but if I heard it aright, it is not confined to the District by express terms.

Mr. WADE. Their principal place of business is here, and if they do business in other States they expect to get acts of incorporation for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not like, even by implication, to assent to the proposition that the Congress of the United States cannot do as much in this District as any State may do within a State.

Mr. WADE. Of course they can.

Mr. SHERMAN. In every State of the Union corporations are incorporated by a general law, and they go all over the United States and have the rights of persons. So far as this bill is concerned I do not raise the point, but I do not for a moment admit, even by implication, that Congress ought to surrender the power that we have in this District, to make corporations with the power of corporations all over the United States of America or Europe, Asia, or wherever they may choose to go.

Mr. WADE. There is nothing unusual in this corporation. It is a mere ordinary church corporation for the establishment of a theological institute, and has nothing in it that does not relate to that particular thing. It locates it in the District, and that is all there is about it. Where they will do business, I do not know, and I do not care.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator will not consider that I was objecting to the bill. I only thought that if he intended to confine it to the District, he ought to say so in the bill itself. I do not object to it.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 567) to amend an act to establish the grade of vice admiral in the United States Navy; and

A bill (H. R. No. 568) to repeal section twenty-three of chapter seventy-nine of the acts of the third session of the Thirty-Seventh Congress relating to passports.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 137) to provide for the exemption of crude petroleum from internal tax or duty, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

COMMANDER CHARLES HUNTER.

Mr. GRIMES. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 307) authorizing the restoration of Commander Charles Hunter to the Navy of the United States, to report it back with an amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator will ask for the present consideration of that bill. There will be no objection to it.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask the Senate now to proceed with its consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to restore Charles Hunter, late a commander in the Navy, to the position which he held on the retired list of the Navy when dismissed therefrom.

Mr. GRIMES. I will state that at the outbreak of the rebellion, Commander Charles Hunter was an officer of the Navy on the retired list. He was appointed to the command of a vessel which was employed in keeping up the blockade. In the discharge of his duties he pursued a blockade-runner, and ran her ashore upon the coast of Cuba, and destroyed her while he was within a marine league of the shore. The Spanish Government took umbrage at that action of an officer of this Government, and, in obedience to their demand upon this Government, he was dismissed from the service. It is now deemed proper by the Administration that he should be restored to his former position; and it is but justice to Captain Hunter that I should send to the table, to be read by the Secretary of the Senate, a letter from the Secretary of State, and also one from the Secretary of the Navy, upon this subject.

The Secretary read the following letters:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, May 5, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to propose for the consideration of the Committee of the Senate on Naval Affairs a resolution authorizing the President to restore Charles Hunter to the position which he held on the retired list of the Navy.

The inclosed copy of a letter from the honorable Secretary of State explains the circumstances under which it was deemed proper to remove Commander Hunter from the public service. As no other reason than one of "public policy" required his separation from the service, and no such reason now forbids his reinstatement, it would seem but just, by restoring him to the Navy, to remove any undeserved stigma which his dismissal might attach to him.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. J. W. GRIMES, Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, April 16, 1866.

SIR: In the opinion of this Department, no reason of public policy now exists against the restoration of Commander Charles Hunter to the position in the Navy of the United States which he held when he was cashiered pursuant to a complaint of the Spanish Government for violating its territorial jurisdiction by chasing ashore on the island of Cuba the insurgent steamer General Rusk alias Blanche.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Hon. GIDEON WELLES, Secretary of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time and passed.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution for printing extra copies of the Report of the Smithsonian Institution, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, by way of substitute, and to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution; and the amendment reported by the committee was agreed to; so as to make the resolution read as follows:

Resolved, That five thousand additional copies of the Report of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution for the year ending 30th June, 1865, be printed; two thousand for the use of the Smithsonian Institution and three thousand for the use of the Senate: Provided, That the aggregate number of pages contained in said report shall not exceed four hundred and fifty pages, without wood-cuts or plates except those furnished by the Institution.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island if he can give any assurance to the Senate about the time we shall get this Report in printed form. I make this inquiry because about three months ago, on his motion, we voted for printing a large edition of Bancroft's oration, and we have not yet got them. I have no objection to voting this order if we can be assured that we shall have the copies during this session, or, indeed, at any time during our lives. We voted also for printing another oration, delivered by my friend from Maryland, [Mr. CRESWELL,] and we have not got that yet. It occurs to me that we ought not to increase this public printing if we cannot get it done.

Mr. RIDDLE. As a member of the Committee on Printing, I will answer the question of my friend from Kansas. The difficulty in getting out the oration of Mr. Bancroft arose from the fact of the printers not having been able to get the steel plate of Mr. Lincoln to put in the book. The delay is not the fault of the printing office. That, however, does not interfere with other printing.

Mr. ANTHONY. I presume this will be printed with the usual rapidity. The pressure on the printing office has been very great during the war, but it is now in a very great degree removed, though not entirely. Unless Congress should be disposed to enlarge the facilities for the public printing, it is impossible that the work can all be done as rapidly as it used to be in quiet times. The Senate yesterday reduced sixty per cent. a very large document, and I think now that the work which is ordered will go on as rapidly as practicable. My friend from Delaware has explained the reason of the delay in printing the oration of Mr. Bancroft. They have been waiting for a steel plate of the late President. The oration delivered by my friend from Maryland [Mr. CRESWELL] will be out very soon. The Public Printer received only a few days ago a single order to print three million blanks for the internal revenue branch of the Treasury Department.

Mr. GRIMES. I thought they had a printing office of their own.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not for such purposes as that, only for engraving.

Mr. GRIMES. They print reports.

Mr. ANTHONY. They have a little printing office there; but this job I speak of will employ seventeen presses for some time. This is the usual resolution that has been adopted every year.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print one thousand copies of the eulogies delivered upon the late Hon. Solomon Foot, for the use of his widow and family, to report it back and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That one thousand extra copies of the addresses and funeral sermon delivered in the Senate on the death of Hon. Solomon Foot, a Senator from the State of Vermont, heretofore ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate, be printed for the use of the widow and family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

DEPOSITS OF PUBLIC MONEY.

Mr. GRIMES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that no public moneys shall be deposited by any public officers elsewhere than in the office of the sub-Treasurer in any city where there is a sub-Treasury, nor elsewhere than in the Treasury of the United States in the city of Washington.

NEW YORK POST OFFICE.

Mr. DIXON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 66, in relation to the courts and post office in the city of New York.

Mr. CHANDLER. I would ask if the House joint resolution No. 116 was not the unfinished business of yesterday at the close of the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not the practice of the Senate, when a motion is made to take up a bill, to give precedence to the unfinished business of the morning hour. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to take up House joint resolution No. 66, relative to the courts and post office of New York city.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which proposes to appoint the mayor and postmaster of the city of New York, the district attorney for the United States at New York city, the president of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, and Jackson S. Shultz, of New York city, a commission to select a proper site for a building for the post office and for the accommodation of the United States courts in the city of New York. They are to report to the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Interior, at their earliest convenience, the selection upon which they, or a majority of them, may agree, and the price at which the site can be purchased by the Government for the purposes contemplated in the resolution; and if the report shall meet the approbation of the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Interior, they shall communicate it, with such additional suggestions as they think proper, to Congress.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was in line six, after "Jackson S. Shultz," to insert "Charles H. Russell, and Moses Taylor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "resolution," in line fourteen, to insert "if a new site should be selected;" so that the clause will read:

That they report to the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Interior, at their earliest convenience, the selection upon which they or a majority of them may agree, and the price at which such site can be purchased by the Government for the purposes contemplated in this resolution, if a new site should be selected.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time. It was read the third time and passed.

ASIATIC CHOLERA.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to take up House joint resolution No. 116.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R.

No. 116) to prevent the introduction of the cholera into the ports of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not propose to go largely into the discussion of this question. Whether this measure will prove effective or not, I cannot say. I have not had, perhaps, as much experience in the matter of cholera as some other Senators. I have only had the disease twice, and have only spent about four or five years of my life in attending upon patients afflicted with it, [laughter,] and I do not pretend to know as much about it as the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN.] Eminent surgeons throughout the world have had doubts as to the character of this disease. Great Britain, France, and the Powers of Europe appointed a commission to visit the East and ascertain the sources, the dangers, and the symptoms of the disease. Had they been aware of the learning, the knowledge, and the information contained in this Senate, they never would have sent that commission to the East or anywhere else. They could have got all the information they desired from the Senator from Pennsylvania, who, I regret, is not in his seat. During the debate yesterday, that Senator said:

"If there is any one thing I think well settled, it is that cholera is not contagious in that sense of the word which would enable you by means of some legislative enactment to keep it out of the country. I think for the credit of the body in that respect, we ought to avoid this mode of dealing with that which is now pretty well understood."

Again, he said:

"It is an epidemic instead of a contagion. It exists in the air; and hence there was great propriety in the jest of some Senator the other day who proposed to refer the whole subject to the ventilation committee."

Now, sir, that is a question that had never been settled until yesterday. The most eminent surgeons on earth had been in doubt as to whether it was contagious, infectious, or atmospheric. That point being settled, and probably settled to the satisfaction of the Senate, they may deem that no further action is necessary upon this resolution. As I remarked yesterday, the Committee on Commerce have had this resolution under consideration for two months. There was a great diversity of opinion in the committee as to the propriety of action on the subject. The medical profession, not having been aware that the point was settled, appointed a convention in Baltimore, which assembled on Friday last, I believe. In that medical convention were eminent men from Canada and other British Provinces, from New York, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, and the most eminent medical talent in the United States. They deemed the subject of sufficient importance to send a delegation from that convention here to advocate the passage of some such measure as this. A meeting of the Committee on Commerce was called, which was attended by all the members except the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. CRESWELL,] and they unanimously decided to recommend the Senate to adopt this plan, which that delegation said would be effective.

I made the suggestion to the man of that delegation who seemed to have the most experience on this subject that this disease was by many considered not to be contagious, but rather infectious or atmospheric. He replied that last fall they had in the harbor of New York one hundred and fifty cases of Asiatic cholera, but the board of health put their hands upon it and held it in the bay, and not a single case reached the city of New York, although the train was laid, and New York city was never in a better condition for its reception and for its terrific ravages than it was at that time. The opinion of these medical men differs materially from the opinion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and yet I have no doubt the Senator from Pennsylvania must be correct. I never knew him to be wrong in anything—politics, religion, law, or anything else. He knows this thing to be so, and of course it is settled; and I suppose the Senate will adopt the learned opinion of the Senator from Pennsylvania and reject the opinion of the medical convention which assembled at Baltimore! I leave the case in the hands of the Senate. If they think that the knowledge and information of the Senator from Pennsylvania is greater than that of the convention that visited the East during this summer to investigate this subject, and greater than that of the convention which assembled in Baltimore, and greater than that of the medical faculty of the world, I hope they will adopt the views of the Senator from Pennsylvania and reject those of the medical faculty. The Senate will vote upon this question as they see fit.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to have the original resolution, as it came from the House, read. I believe it has not yet been read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, &c. That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized to make and carry into effect such orders and regulations of quarantine as in his opinion may be deemed necessary and proper, in aid of State or municipal authorities, to guard against the introduction of the cholera into the ports of the United States; and the President is further authorized to empower the military and naval commanders in ports and places in the States that have been or are in insurrection to enforce such quarantine regulations as may be deemed necessary for the purpose of guarding against the introduction of cholera or yellow fever, and to provide for the proper care and treatment of patients. And such an amount of money as may be necessary to carry into effect this joint resolution is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. MORRILL. Perhaps the attention of the Senate should be called to the action of the House of Representatives in contrast with the action of the Senate committee. It will be seen that the resolution from the House, for which the Senate committee substitutes its own resolution, provides for a method of treating this subject in coöperation with the States. The President is authorized to make rules and regulations to coöperate with the State and local authorities. That is the chief feature of the House resolution. The resolution reported by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, which is proposed as a substitute for that, inaugurates a system independent of the local authorities and independent of the States; and it is different in some other respects. The object of the two resolutions, of course, is the same, to prevent the spread of the cholera.

The question which I desire the Senate should understand and should consider is, whether it is advisable to invest the President and his Secretaries with the powers of quarantine and sanitary regulation over the whole country. The statement of that question will show the Senate at once the importance of this measure and the magnitude of the undertaking; and they must judge for themselves as to the probability of its being effective. A measure authorizing the President and his Cabinet to use the war power of the country and the Treasury of the country to make, in the first place, a system broad enough to quarantine all the ports on the coast, and a sanitary system or a cordon of sanitary posts extensive enough to guard your whole frontier, and also to be effective in all the cities and towns throughout the whole country, the Senate will see at once will be very comprehensive and very extensive, and involves the exercise of very extensive powers; and whether so spread out and so acting independent of the States—to raise no question now of the right to do so—by any possibility, within a reasonable time, it could be made effective as a practical question, it seems to me admits of very serious doubt. I ought to say, therefore, calling the attention of the Senate to these two propositions, that it seemed to me that the measure, as it came from the House of Representatives, was preferable in two particulars: first, that it avoids all questions of authority; and secondly, that it proposes to coöperate with the systems already in existence. The city of New York, the great metropolis, for instance, has a very effective system to-day of quarantine and health police, more so than could be perfected by this Government in twelve months if it should set to work to-day to do it. Now, are we to act independent of that, or to coöperate with it? Just as you settle that question so will you settle whether you will amend the resolution as it comes from the House, and adopt the proposition of the committee, or concur in the resolution as it came from the House.

I was in favor of the House resolution because it proposed to confer with the States and with the cities and avail itself of the local systems of quarantine and health police, organized and as they have existed for fifty years. It may be said that our authorities can avail themselves of that; but that is not the theory of the bill. The theory of the bill is that it is to be independent, that a system is to be organized here by these Secretaries, and that it is to be carried out over the whole country. It seems to me that you will lose entirely the efficiency which is desirable and which you would secure if, instead of that, you cooperated with the systems already in force.

For these reasons—not to argue the question in any way, but merely to make suggestions—because of the doubt on the question of authority, and especially because efficiency will come from cooperating with the States, it seemed to me that the House resolution was preferable; but of course I rise to make no hostility to the measure. It seemed, however, to me to be advisable, as nobody had stated the precise position in which the measure was presented to the Senate, that I should make this statement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it appears to me that the amendment which the Committee on Commerce have recommended to this joint resolution very much improves it as sent from the House of Representatives. The honorable Senator from Maine has correctly stated the essential difference between the two propositions, that of the House being to authorize the President to act in aid of the State and local authorities, and which proposition, therefore, necessarily implies the consent of the State and the municipal authorities who are invested by local regulations with present power over the subject, while the Senate amendment proposes to make a uniform system of quarantine under the paramount regulations of the General Government, which shall be coextensive, irrespective of State and municipal lines and boundaries, with the disease which it is sought by both processes to exclude from the country; and the simple question is, which is the most likely to attain the desired end?

Now, I think it must be admitted by my friend from Maine that the cholera will not pay any regard to State lines. It does not know anything about State rights; it does not recognize the distinction between Federal and State authority; and, therefore, while one regulation may exist in New York which shall require a quarantine, if you please, of thirty days, another may exist at Jersey City which only requires a quarantine of ten days, another at New London, in Connecticut, or at Newport, in Rhode Island, having a different length of time and a different process of security; so that the result is without uniformity, that a regulation which is enforced with safety and security in one city, operating to the temporary disadvantage and injury of its commerce and disturbance of its trade, is evaded in an adjacent city to the advantage of its commerce and its trade, and by means of which the pestilence which we all seek to exclude is introduced into the country.

It appears to me that this is a subject which concerns the general welfare of the people of the United States, irrespective of State or local organizations and irrespective of State boundaries. It concerns the general welfare, and therefore, in my judgment, it is the highest duty of the General Government to promote that general welfare if anything can be done by exercising its paramount authority over the subject. My friend from Maine suggests that there is doubt as to the authority of the United States. I think he will reconsider that doubt and change his opinion, if it be his opinion that we have not the power, when he recurs to the cases which have been decided on the subject of the introduction of passengers, known as the passenger tax cases, in which the Supreme Court of the United States held, and rightly held, that the States, while Congress undertakes to regulate commerce at all, have no authority to regulate the admission of persons or merchandise from foreign countries into this. Therefore this concerns, in the most eminent and exact sense, that power which is granted by the Constitution of the United States to us under the head of the regulation of commerce; and inasmuch as we must all agree that it concerns us all, inland States and inland districts as well as the sea-board ones, ought we not—assuming that we can frame and pass any law which will have any prospect of attaining the result—to go as far as prudence and as courage will allow to accomplish it? Most certainly we should.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the unfinished business will be permitted to lie over informally. I think this will not take long.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is very manifest that this will take time.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think but very little.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not occupy three minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not interrupt the Senator from Vermont in the midst of his speech.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the unfinished business of yesterday will be laid aside in order to proceed with the joint resolution now before the Senate. No objection being made, it is laid aside informally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it was made manifest before the Committee on Commerce—and it is a subject so serious that I cannot regard it in the jocose light that my friend from Pennsylvania did yesterday—it was made manifest before the Committee on Commerce by the concurrent testimony of many doctors, who for once did not disagree, that cholera is the subject of preventive regulations; that it is capable, in a very large degree at least, of being excluded from districts, territories, and countries by the enforcement of sanitary and quarantine regulations; and a very eminent instance of that fact and a very strong proof of it is found in what we know of the history of cholera in Europe last fall. The quarantine in the Italian ports on the Mediterranean was very strictly enforced, and consequently the cholera passing from the East went by those Italian ports to the ports of France, and at last first reached the Italian territory by way of the railroad from Paris, having gone completely around the sea-board and returned into that country from the interior, where the quarantine regulations were not enforced. Therefore it behooves us most certainly to try the experiment, and to try it upon that scale of uniformity and of severity which is commensurate with the danger of this pestilence, which certainly is as dangerous as any pestilence or any evil can possibly be.

It has appeared to me, with all deference to my friend from Maine, that we ought to go to the length of intrusting these large powers to the Government as we did in the case of the rinderpest, which is a case in point as to the power, and to authorize the Secretaries of War and the Navy and the Treasury to put in force with uniformity and impartiality a system which will operate for the protection of the whole country.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I must say that in reflecting upon this question I find that I traveled with my friend from Maine through his inquiries and his doubts, but it was only to arrive substantially at the conclusion of my friend from Vermont. I thought that the criticism of my friend from Maine was in many respects, at least on its face, just; I went along with him, and yet I hesitated in adopting the conclusion which he seemed to intimate. I doubt, if we proceed under the House resolution, whether we shall do the work thoroughly. I doubt whether that resolution can be made sufficiently effective for the occasion. Indeed, I may go further and say I am satisfied, all things considered, that it cannot be effective for the occasion. We then have the substitute proposed by the committee of our own body. Against that there is certainly this remark to be made, that it is novel. I am not aware that any such proposition has ever before been brought forward. It has, therefore, to meet the argument of novelty; but when you consider it, certainly it has in its favor the great argument of efficiency. If adopted, it will be effective for the purpose. But then the question remains behind, to which the Senator from Maine has directed our attention, whether this proposition of the committee is not something more than even a novelty, whether it is not a departure perhaps from the just principles of our institutions. I am not inclined to say that it is anything more than a novelty. I admit that it is such. It does invest the Government with large and perhaps unprecedented powers in order to meet a peculiar case where a stringent remedy must be applied.

But, as the chairman of the Committee on Commerce suggests to me, the powers are temporary. I am not ready to say that such powers cannot be intrusted to the Government. I believe they can be; but while I agree in that, and am ready to vote for intrusting these powers to the Government, yet, if I can have the attention of my friend, the chairman of the committee, I should like to ask him why these powers are to be placed under the direction of the Secretary of War rather, for instance, than of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CHANDLER. They are placed jointly in three Secretaries, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not mean to express any decisive opinion on the question, but I mean to call the attention of the Senate to it, that it may go for what it is worth. The language is:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, with the cooperation of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury, whose concurrent action shall be directed by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, to adopt an efficient and uniform system of quarantine against the introduction into this country of the Asiatic cholera through its ports of entry, &c.

Mr. CHANDLER. With the permission of the Senator, I will state that all the southern cities are now guarded by United States soldiers, and naturally, those points being more exposed, it would come more directly under the Secretary of War than any other Secretary. The condition of things on the northern frontier is the same.

Mr. SUMNER. I proposed simply to call attention to the point; I do not intend to pass upon it myself; only I must say that on the face of the proposition it does seem to me as if it was to make this proceeding for a quarantine a military transaction, as if it was to a certain extent to continue military power for this purpose. I cannot say that I have scruples on that point; but still I am not disposed to vote for such a proposition, at least without fully considering, and I desire that the chairman of the committee should consider whether it is expedient that this quarantine proceeding shall be placed under the direct charge, management, and control of the military power, or whether it shall be placed where in times past it has been, with the Treasury Department, which has, as I need not remind the Senate, the direction of the custom-house and of the revenue, and also, I may say, the direction of the revenue cutter which is the police power in our harbors.

The question I ask is, whether the Department which thus far has had charge of the police of our harbors, which controls the hospitals there, to say nothing of the custom-house, should not be intrusted with control with reference to the quarantine? Thus far it has had exclusive control with reference to the quarantine. We are now, to a certain extent, to dispossess it and put the War Department in the front. If Senators are disposed to do so; if my honorable friend, the chairman of the committee, thinks, after having his attention called to it, that upon the whole it is advisable that the War Department should be put in the front, and that the others should but follow up in the rear, I am not going to raise any question, because I start with the idea that this bill must be made effective for the purpose. I believe the House bill cannot be effective for the purpose; and therefore I am ready to accept the bill of the committee, if after having called attention to this point the committee feel that upon the whole it is advisable to proceed with the bill in its present form.

Mr. MORRILL. I did not intend to do more than to call the attention of the Senate to the bill coming from the Committee on Commerce, of which I happen to be a member. Having dissented from the bill, I thought it was perhaps advisable that I should state the distinction between the proposition which came from the other House and that reported by the committee. As the Senator from Massachusetts apprehends, the measure proposed by the committee is a war measure. There is no question of that. It addresses itself to the war power; it seeks to find its authority nowhere else; and I think it will be difficult for anybody to find an authority so broad as is contemplated by it; outside of the war power, with which, in the last four or five years, we have become so familiar. It proceeds on the idea of using the war power; and in aid of the war power it puts at the disposal of the Government the entire means of the Treasury. They are not appropriated in so many words, but those Secretaries are empowered to use all the means at their command. Of course that includes the military and naval forces, and, in aid of them, the resources of the Treasury.

I did not care to raise the questions which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has so rightly apprehended. It was on account of the extraordinary powers to which he has referred that I shrank from the consideration of the bill, I admit. I thought it inadvisable, and I intimated some doubt about the power to which the honorable Senator from Vermont has so properly alluded. After a proclamation of peace, which has come to us, the effect of which I never could exactly understand, and which I think it will be left to future historians and commentators to define, and after peace has come to us in a general way, why we should pass a bill putting at the discretion of the President of the United States, through the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, the entire military and naval power of the country to fight the cholera, is what I cannot exactly comprehend as a question of constitutional power. The measure reported by the committee, I say, proceeds upon that idea, and invokes that authority, and does not find its authority anywhere else.

My honorable friend from Vermont suggests for my consideration that the authority is clearly justifiable upon the ground of the decision of the Supreme Court in the passenger cases so familiar to the country and to the Senate. But let me suggest to him whether there is an analogy between the facts of the cases. There we were proceeding under the commercial authority of the Government—not under the war power, but under the power to regulate commerce. The fact was, in those cases, as the honorable Senator doubtless recollects, that the States of New York and Massachusetts had imposed a tax of one dollar a head upon persons who should be imported into this country under the regulations of commerce prescribed by Congress. The United States, in whom is the supreme authority over questions of commerce, having regulated the importation of such persons, of course the States could not interpose. The States were in direct conflict with the asserted and conceded authority of the Government of the United States. That was a case not like this, of war, but a case of commerce. I therefore submit to my honorable friend whether the cases are at all analogous, whether the facts justify the comparison; and I suggest to him that this is more analogous to the license cases. Under the authority of Congress importers were authorized to import into this country from abroad ardent spirits, and having brought them in under the authority of Congress they claimed the right to sell them, and they claimed that the sale was authorized, and that under their police powers the States had no right to interfere with the disposition which they should choose to make; but there the court drew the distinction between the authority of the State and the authority of the General Government; and whereas they said that over foreign commerce the jurisdiction of the General Government is supreme and exclusive, yet when once the foreign article has been introduced within the limits and jurisdiction of the State entirely, the State may then apply to its police regulations, either of health, sanitary regulations, or what not, and may impose such conditions and limitations on the article so imported under the authority of the Government of the United States as the State, in its own judgment, having exclusive jurisdiction of all matters of police in its own State, shall determine to be necessary for the protection of its own people.

Now, apply that doctrine to this case. We are to fight the cholera; where? I concede that we may fight it on our exterior limits, either by weapons of war or through the agency of the Treasury Department, as suggested by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts; but can you enter the States and fight it over the railroads and the turnpikes and the common highways, and in the cities and the towns, and visit the houses and take possession of all the cities and towns in any district of country? For that is what is implied in cordons for sanitary purposes. You absolutely for the time being have the custody socially, politically, civilly, economically, in every sense which is intimate, of the entire American people, houses, lanes, streets, everything as perfectly as the police regulations of the several States and the cities and towns. Can you do that? If so under what power? If we were in a state of war, there is nothing which we could not do against a foreign enemy. I doubt whether we can do it against an enemy such as the cholera; but against the enemy that invades, you can do any or all of these; but can you do any one of them in this case under the war power? I question very much whether it can be done. Certainly it cannot be done under the authority suggested here; under the power to regulate commerce. The cholera is not commercial in its character; it is pervasive, and it invades everywhere and knows no Federal or local lines. I agree with my honorable friend from Vermont that it knows no State boundaries nor any boundary whatever.

My honorable friend from Vermont suggested—I do not know that he meant to be committed to it—something about the general welfare. Whether he intends to draw the authority for this bill from that provision of the Constitution which speaks of the general welfare, I do not know. I hardly think there is anything in the history of the country which authorizes so broad an interpretation of that provision of the Constitution. But the answer to that suggestion would be that this bill does not proceed on that idea. Suppose, however, that any specific authority could be drawn, or ever had been drawn, from the phrase of the Constitution relative to the general welfare, which I am not aware there ever was, would anybody contend that, under the language of the Constitution in regard to providing for the general welfare, a general system for doctoring the American people against cholera, for that is what it is, could be provided by Congress? The power involved in this bill assumes, if it is effective, to go the whole extent of doctoring the American people upon the great emergency of the cholera, providing dry and wet nurses of all descriptions, medicines, sanitary regulations, cordons, and what not; there is no limitation. Whatever is needed to be done in the premises to prevent the introduction of cholera, and control it after it is here, is to be done by authority of the General Government, by physicians, by police regulations, &c. Whatever may be done, may be done, and is to be done, in contemplation of this bill, by authority of the General Government.

So much for the authority. I rose in the first place simply to suggest what was obvious upon the reading of the two measures, that the proposition of the House of Representatives proceeded upon the idea of the General Government doing something in aid of the State institutions which already exist, sanitary and otherwise, in the several States, as it very properly may to render those local and State institutions effective. There are a thousand ways in which that may be done. The Government has now in all the States a great variety of hospital stores and other stores which might very properly be delivered over to the State authorities. In that way the aid of the Government might be very efficient; but I have no faith at all in the operation of the measure reported by our committee. If you take the matter out of the hands of the State authorities; if you undertake to inaugurate a system here at Washington which is to supplant their regulations and be independent of them, I have no belief that you will render the scheme efficient. That is my difficulty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President—

Mr. SHERMAN. I must interpose and call for the regular order of business. This debate is evidently going to be much longer than was anticipated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business having been laid aside informally, is liable to be called up at any moment.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. TRUMBULL, to add the following as an additional section to the bill:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That no person exercising or performing, or undertaking to exercise or perform, the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall, before confirmation by the Senate receive any salary or compensation for his services, unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened by death, resignation, or expiration of term, during the recess of the Senate and since its last adjournment.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the country clearly understands why the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois upon this bill is moved. It grows out of an apprehension, of which there are significant signs, that executive patronage is to be used to influence the action of the country, to influence the public sentiment upon the great question of reconstruction. It seems to me that it is legitimate and proper upon this proposition that the action of the President, the condition of the country, and the relations of the men who made him President of the United States should now be discussed.

I propose, Mr. President, to notice very briefly one or two of the observations made yesterday by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] and by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN.] The Senator from Pennsylvania set out with the declaration that the President had been charged by me with a betrayal of the Republican party. When I indicated to him that I had made no such charge, the Senator repeated it and reasserted it. Sir, the record shows that I made no such charge against the President of the United States. I have endeavored at all times and on all occasions, in public and in private, to prevent any disagreement between the President and Congress, any disruption of the ties which bound him to the men who brought him into power.

A year ago, within thirty days after the assass-sination of Mr. Lincoln, I learned from various sources that there was a class of public men among us who hoped to have a new cast of the Administration, a reorganization, a reconstruction of political parties. It was more than hinted by some of these persons that the radicals would be "sloughed off," that the extreme men of the rebel States would be "sloughed off," and that there would be a great political organization composed of conservative men. The belief was expressed by these managers that the President of the United States would be the founder of a great party, as were Jefferson and Jackson. It was a new era, just the lucky moment to found a great party of the future—a party that would take care of its founders.

Sir, I confess these hints gave me some anxiety, some alarm for the country. I am among those who believe in the faith and creed, in the motives, objects, and purposes of that political organization which made Mr. Lincoln President in 1860, which carried the country through the fire and blood of civil war, and reelected Mr. Lincoln in 1864. I believe it to be a liberty-loving and patriotic organization, composed of the noblest, the truest men of our country, and that an overwhelming majority of the thoughtful, reflecting, conscientious, Bible-reading, and God-fearing men of the country are in its ranks. Every sentiment that great organization has ever breathed has been for liberty, for patriotism, for justice, for humanity, for the elevation of every being who breathes God's air or walks His earth. I do not claim that its public men are better than the public men of other parties who have gone before us or of other parties that have existed in our time; but the great masses, the rank and file, the men who give the votes, are swayed and controlled by as lofty motives as ever animated the bosom of humanity. Thus believing, I felt it to be the duty of patriotism and of liberty to labor by day and by night to prevent a rupture and to preserve the integrity of that political organization that held the control of nearly all the States and of the national Government. Animated by that desire, during the last autumn, for six weeks, before vast throngs of men in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York, I maintained everywhere that there need be no difference among us, that there must be no rupture, that there should be none. I came here in December animated by that spirit, resolved that no word or act of mine should precipitate a disruption of the great Union party of the country. It was only when the civil rights bill, the dearest measure I ever yet supported in the twelve sessions I have been here, was vetoed; it was only when the 22d of February speech was made and a determination avowed to maintain the President's policy against any policy that might be devised by the Congress of the United States, that I thought the disruption of the ties that bound the President to the great Union party of the country possible if not probable.

The Senator from Pennsylvania said another thing, which, as he was replying to some remarks of mine, I choose to notice now. He spoke of the hate that animated some of our people. Sir, I can say before my conscience and my God that during these thirty years of struggle between the irrepressible forces of anti-slavery and slavery in America, I have never entertained one sentiment of unkindness toward my countrymen of the slave holding States. As I have gazed upon the graves of neighbors and of kindred who have fallen in this war, I have never had a feeling of revenge. I have felt that this struggle, which was a contest of ideas, of thoughts, of acts, and of blood, was a logical and philosophical contest. It was a contest between men trained in the spirit of liberty; that spirit which embraces in its affections all the children of men of every clime and race; that spirit which pulls not the highest down, but lifts the lowest up, on the one hand, and on the other the dark, malignant spirit of slavery, which shrivels the mind and debases the soul. For two hundred years the one side had been trained to the love of freedom, justice, and humanity, and the other had been trained in the spirit of caste. It was a contest of giants; it was the "irrepressible conflict," and it came to blows; and when it did come to blows it rocked the continent with its power. We have triumphed. Slavery dies a traitor's death, and leaves a traitor's name in the history of the Republic. Liberty, patriotism, justice, humanity, all that is noble, all that inspires men to lofty deeds were with us in that contest. I look upon the contest as one that could not well be avoided. We have triumphed; and I want no more blood, no more confiscations. I want none of their houses, or their lands, nor anything that is theirs. From the day that Kirby Smith surrendered his army to this hour, no person from the rebel States has asked a favor from me that I have not freely given. I mean to give act, vote, and thought to elevate, improve, and build up that war-blasted section of the country. What I say of myself I can, I am sure, say of the great masses of the State I represent. We would build the church, erect the school-house, send the teacher, send capital, send skill, do everything to build up the war-worn and waste places in the rebel States.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, as usual with him, was very boastful; he was prophetic. I have heard that Senator make predictions before. I remember that during the late long and bloody war that Senator, who opposed many of the measures advocated by the majority on this floor and sustained by the Administration, often predicted the direst disasters from the enactment of those measures. When the confiscation bill was pending he opposed it. When the proposition was made to make free the slaves captured from the rebels in the places our Army should take possession of or who should come within the lines of our Army, the Senator declared it a disruption of the Union and a desecration of the sacred charter of the Constitution. The Senator gave his vote against that measure recommended by President Lincoln to aid the loyal States in emancipation; and yet he told us yesterday that he supported the President now, as he did once before, and we had to submit before, and we would have to submit now. The Senator opposed the repeal of that dark act that blackened the legislation of the country—the fugitive slave law. To that measure of humanity, of justice, of the organization of labor—the Freedmen's Bureau—that Senator gave his persistent opposition. To the act allowing the negro to give testimony, an act of simple justice, that Senator gave his opposition. To the act to make free the wives and children of the men who were fighting the battles of the country, that Senator also gave his opposition. In fact, most of the leading measures of the Administration of Mr. Lincoln met, as is well known, his stern opposition, and those measures were carried by those of us here whom he then branded as radicals, and whom he now continues to brand as radicals.

The Senator told us that he belongs to one wing of the party and that we radicals belong to the other. I must say I would like to see the wing of the party to which that Senator belongs in the State of Pennsylvania. If he belongs to the very tip of the tail of the party in Pennsylvania I have yet to see it. The Senator well knows that during the past three years he has had the sturdy opposition of the Republican press of Pennsylvania and of the Republican masses of Pennsylvania. I remember, in 1863, when the contest, so important to the country, between Judge Woodward, the representative of opposition to the war, on the one hand, and Governor Curtin, who had contributed so much to carry on the war, on the other, stirred Pennsylvania to its profoundest depths, that the Senator took no part in the contest. I remember, in 1864, when the contest was between Mr. Lincoln, whose friend he now professes to be, and the nominee of the Chicago platform party, he had little voice or counsel to give, except very severe criticisms upon the Administration, and not very stinted laudations of General McClellan. To-day all the Republican presses but one in Pennsylvania support the general policy of Congress. There are one or two others that give a sort of divided support to Congress and to the President. I will not remind the Senator of the action of the Republican convention a few weeks ago, or of the action of the Legislature of his own State. Surely their action is an indication of the temper of the people of his great Commonwealth.

The Senator tells us now that we radicals do not belong to the Republican organization. Sir, they have a delegation from Pennsylvania in the other House, and no one man among them of the Republicans stands where that Senator stands. In truth, every indication in that State shows that at least ninety-nine out of every one hundred of the Republicans of that State are with Congress. We radicals do not belong to the party! I should like to see the party with the radicals weeded out.

Why, sir, I have not a doubt of the fact that in the free States to-day there is not a representative or a senatorial district in which the Johnson men can elect a man opposed to Congress to their State Legislature without the votes of Democrats. Here are thirty-nine Republican Senators. How many of them are outside of the ranks of the branded radicals? There are one hundred and forty Republicans in the House. How many of them are outside of the ranks of the radicals? Sir, you can put all the Johnson men in the Senate and House of Representatives on one side of one of the street cars on the avenue. They could be packed on the front and rear, and they could carry their market baskets, too. [Laughter.] Of one hundred and eighty members they have, perhaps, ten, and they are stronger here, by far, than they are in any portion of the free States to-day.

Sir, let any one of these much reproached radicals start for his home, and from the moment he leaves yonder depot until he reaches his home he will receive an ovation, hearty God's blessings, from almost everybody, and he may travel for days and never hear a word said in favor of "my policy" from any party or set of men. The Senator from New York [Mr. HARRIS] went home the other day, and I venture to say he met nothing but approving smiles and applauding words from the men who made this Administration. There is not one percent. of the Republicans of New York who do not approve of the votes he has given in this Congress. And when the other Senator from New York the other day gave his vote in favor of the civil rights bill, it brought the instantaneous applause of the galleries, and it was repeated by the hundreds of thousands of the Union men of the great State of New York. So it is with all these Senators about me and of the members of the House of Representatives. They never had so much the confidence, the respect, and the love of the people as they have now, and if any one man of them is specially singled out for opprobrium he is from that moment dearer to the people than ever before.

Although I do not like to make predictions, I will venture to say, in answer to what was said by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Wisconsin, that in almost every State the Republican party is stronger now than it was a year ago. We gave seventy-eight thousand majority for Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Johnson in 1864 in Massachusetts. I would pledge my life that we can give one hundred thousand majority for impartial suffrage in Massachusetts now, and that where we have one Republican against it we have fifty Democrats for it. I will make this suggestion to the Senator from Pennsylvania—and he and I will remember it when we meet, if we live, in December next—that he will find that not more than an average of one per cent. of the Republican party of the country has been led off into any stray movements.

Do the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Wisconsin believe that they can go to the country—appeal to the Republicans to elect Representatives or elect Legislatures against us? They will not elect, in the free States, a single Republican against us, unless they do it with the aid of those who are ever opposed to us. I say to our friends in Pennsylvania and Wisconsin and everywhere else, that these Senators, who tell us they are fighting within our ranks, mean to go beyond our ranks; they mean to make combinations with the men who stood on the Chicago platform in 1864, and with the traitors whose bayonets were in front of our legions in the rebel States. Without that countenance and that support, there is nothing of them, and can be nothing of them. Sir, how is it with Wisconsin? One paper there, started within a few weeks, supports the policy advocated by the Senator from Wisconsin. The Legislature, with scarcely a dissenting vote among the Republicans, have spoken in condemnation of their Senator, and asked him to resign his seat.

Mr. HOWE. With the leave of the Senator, I should like to correct him on one point. He does not quite do justice to the Union party of Wisconsin. He enumerates one paper there that supports the policy of the President and of my colleague and of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I believe there is no Union paper of that kind. There is a paper which was started a few weeks ago, and I suppose it is the one alluded to by the Senator from Massachusetts, which supports the person of the President and of my colleague very actively; but I believe it has never ventured to support their policy. It regrets the defeat of the Freedmen's Bureau bill and the defeat of the civil rights bill.

Mr. WILSON. I am much obliged to the Senator for the correction he has made. Then it appears that none of the old journals of the party sustain "my policy" or support the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE.] We all know that that Senator is a gentleman of talent and personal character, for whom we have great respect. It is a great thing for a people to pronounce against such a Senator or to pass a vote asking him to resign his seat. It requires an immense pressure coming from the body of the people, and can only come from men actuated by the purest motives and loftiest purposes. The fact that it is done is only another evidence of the depth and strength of the feelings of the people in favor of giving equal, universal, and impartial liberty to the four million men whom we have made free by this war. I tell you, sir, if there be one thing down deep in the heart and soul of the American people, it is the purpose to see that these poor bondmen are free in fact as well as in name. They remember that Abraham Lincoln, in his immortal proclamation of emancipation, pledged the faith and the power of the Government to make them free. They have passed a constitutional amendment clothing us with full powers to make them free; and they have resolved upon it, and they will not be baffled. They have vowed it on bended knee before Almighty God. I tell the Senators from Wisconsin and Pennsylvania that it is that motive animating the heart and impelling the action of our people that makes them doubtful of the policy of the President. It is no hostility to the President; it is no personal hostility to the Senator from Wisconsin, for I think he is among that class of men who would excite personal hostility as little as almost any man I know.

The action of the people of Wisconsin in regard to the Senator is the most striking evidence of our time of the love of the people for liberty, justice, and humanity. Does the Senator expect to go before these people and have them reverse their action? Does he believe he can elect a single member to Congress from that State by the votes of the Republicans who will support the policy indicated by the President and oppose the action of Congress? Does he believe he can elect a Representative in his State by Republican votes to the Legislature that will do it? Every victory won by that Senator and by the Senator from Pennsylvania over us is to be won by coöperation with the men who stood on the Chicago platform in 1864, pronounced the war a failure, and denounced Abraham Lincoln as a tyrant.

Sir, I know not what we have done that God should send afflictions upon us. I know not why the hearts of loyal, devoted, and true men that have been wrung with anguish during five years of bloody strife should be made longer sorrowful! We put this Administration in power. We took Mr. Johnson, placed him on the ticket with Abraham Lincoln, when he had not a vote in America to give us. We did not nominate him because he would give us strength or power. He had proved true to the country when his State, section, and political friends proved false; he rendered service to the country, and we recognized it. We had hundreds of able men in the field and in the civil councils, but we passed by them and nominated him. We put aside the ever faithful Hannibal Hamlin, by the votes of his own New England, to nominate Mr. Johnson. We put this Administration in power, and it went into power to do precisely this: to put down this rebellion; to cement the Union; to put down slavery, to exterminate it root and branch; to make the bondmen citizens of the Republic, and clothe them with the rights of manhood. Sir, I say to the Senator from Wisconsin, who talks so much of suffrage, that one year ago, after the surrender of Kirby Smith, it was in the power of the Administration to impose just such terms as it believed the good of the country required upon the rebel States. They were defeated, conquered, humiliated. They expected some punishment for their crime of treason. They expected the bondmen would be put under the protection of just and equal laws. Many of their leading men not only expected suffrage, but were ready for it. A systematic effort was made last spring to tone down the sentiment of the country. Sir, had the Administration seized that glorious opportunity we could have established impartial suffrage; we could have proclaimed universal amnesty; these seats would have been filled; and law and order, harmony and peace, would have reigned all over the country.

But the Senator from Wisconsin told us that this Administration was pursuing precisely the policy of Mr. Lincoln. I deny it altogether. Mr. Lincoln organized Tennessee by the loyal men of Tennessee. Traitors had to take the back seat. He organized Louisiana by the loyal men of Louisiana, although their numbers were not many. In the State of Louisiana they made a constitution emancipating slaves, leaving it to the Legislature to fix suffrage; established nine hours as the measure of time of a day's work, and they made liberal provisions for education. They made one of the most liberal constitutions ever framed in America. Our friends told us that their Legislature would give suffrage, and the moment we had the relations restored here that suffrage would come to the freed people. Some of us thought so, and if we had admitted them and the war had continued, I do not doubt it would have been so. What is the result under this Administration? They have elected two Senators in place of the men elected by the Legislature under Mr. Lincoln. They have elected five Representatives, all of them rebels. Not one of them can take the oath. All their State officers are rebels.

Tennessee, Arkansas, and Louisiana were organized under Mr. Lincoln by the loyal men of those States. They went for freedom. They adopted a progressive policy; not so fast as we desired, nor so far, but still it was all in the right direction. Some of us thought it would be safe to admit their Senators and Representatives; others thought otherwise. I am content with the result. But what has been the organization under this Administration? Mr. Lincoln, with Mr. Johnson's approval, organized the States that he organized with loyal men. He compelled the rebels to take, as Mr. Johnson well said, "the back seats." The Legislature elected by the loyal men of Virginia in the days of Mr. Lincoln selected Mr. Underwood and Mr. Segar to represent the State in the Senate of the United States. Both of these gentlemen now are and have been devotedly loyal to the Union. Of the delegation of eight members to the House chosen under the reconstruction policy of Mr. Johnson, two signed the secession ordinance and were active rebels during the rebellion. Mr. Chandler, of the Norfolk district, has ever been loyal. Three only of the delegation, I am assured, can conscientiously take the prescribed oath. The three judges of the court of appeals, recently appointed by Governor Peirpoint, and sixteen judges of the circuit court were active rebels to the end of the war. One only of the nineteen judicial nominations made by Governor Peirpoint was a loyal man, and he was rejected by the Legislature, receiving only nine votes. Every State officer elected by the Legislature of Virginia at its recent session was an active rebel. No Union man stood any chance whatever to receive any office at the hands of that Legislature.

North Carolina was organized by the election of Governor Worth, a rebel, over Governor Holden, professedly loyal, the election of a Legislature that elected two United States Senators who cannot take the required oath, and by the election of an unbroken delegation of disloyal men to the House of Representatives. South Carolina was reconstructed by the election of Mr. Orr, a disloyal civilian, over Wade Hampton, a disloyal soldier; by the election of Perry and Manning, identified with the rebellion, to the Senate of the United States, and a delegation to the House of Representatives, none of whom can take the oath, unless it be Governor Aiken.

Reconstructed Georgia sends the rebel vice president, Alexander H. Stephens, and the unrepentant rebel, Herschel V. Johnson to the Senate, and an entire delegation of traitors to the House of Representatives. Unrepentant rebels reorganized the government of Florida, elected a disloyalist for Governor, one Senator and her Representative, and sent Governor Marvin, a loyal man, to fill the term that expires on the 4th of March next. Judge Marvin was elected Senator for that brief period as a matter of policy, but he has not the shadow of a chance for reelection. Reconstructed Alabama made Robert M. Patton, a bitter secessionist, Governor, and elected Lewis E. Parsons and George S. Houston Senators of the United States, although it was admitted that they could not take the prescribed oath of office; Langdon, a bitter rebel; Freeman, a colonel in the rebel army; Battle, a brigadier general in the rebel army; and two other secessionists, one of whom was a member of the rebel congress,* to the Congress of the United States.

Reorganized Mississippi elected General Humphries, of the rebel army, Governor over Mr. Fisher, supposed to be partially loyal; Governor Sharkey, who may be able to take the oath, and General Alcorn, of the rebel service, Senators of the United States; Colonel Reynolds, of the rebel army, Mr. Pierson, Mr. Harrison, and Mr. West, so compromised by the rebellion that they cannot take the oath of office, and Mr. Peyton, a consistent Union man, to the House of Representatives.

Louisiana, reorganized under Mr. Lincoln by her few loyal men, passed under the policy of Mr. Johnson into the hands of her leading secessionists. Her Legislature, pronounced by Governor Wells in a recent telegraphic dispatch to the President to be in favor of reactionary measures, elected Mr. Hunt and Mr. Boyce, who registered themselves when General Butler had command of New Orleans as enemies of the country, United States Senators, to crowd out Mr. Hahn and Mr. Cutler, elected by her loyal Legislature. She elected to the House of Representatives, Mr. Martin, a register of voters under the rebel government; Jacob Barker, editor of the Advocate, twice suppressed for disloyalty; Robert C. Wickliffe, of the rebel army, who was captured at Port Hudson, Mr. King, and Mr. Ray, active and influential secessionists.

Texas has not completed the work of reconstruction and reorganization. Governor Hamilton, one of the truest and noblest Union men of the South, and a few true and tried Union men are bravely struggling to make Texas loyal to the Union and to liberty, but I fear they are struggling in vain. In a few weeks the government of Texas will pass into the hands of unrepentant rebels, and disloyal men will be selected to represent her in the Congress of the United States. Of fourteen Senators chosen in the States reconstructed under Mr. Johnson's policy, two only, Governor Marvin and Judge Sharkey, can take the oath of office. Of the Representatives chosen from the seven States, five only can take the oath prescribed by the laws of the country.

By the election of these Governors and Legislatures, these Senators and Representatives, the people of these States have manifested in the most signal manner that they are unrepentant though subjugated rebels. Tried, true, and loyal men are proscribed, hunted down, put under the ban of public opinion. Can that policy that has put down the loyal men of the rebel States and clothed rebels with power pass unquestioned by a patriotic people or their representatives? The late rebel States are a part of our common country, within the Union, subject to the authority of the Government. Their people are as amenable to the laws of the country as they were the day they raised the standard of rebellion. They undertook to break up the Union and establish a government of their own; they fought four years to dismember the Union, and they signally and ingloriously failed. These States are members of the Union, but their practical relations with the Government are not yet completely established. The demand is now made and persistently pressed upon the country that these States that have defiantly chosen unrepentant secessionists shall be clothed with political power, that they shall come into these Chambers without any conditions, qualifications, or reservations. From the Potomac to the Rio Grande, ninety-five out of every hundred of the loyal men are earnestly opposed to this demand. These loyal men of the South, wronged, outraged, and oppressed, are vehemently opposed to that policy that allows rebels to mark and brand them for their fidelity to their country. Tennessee, the President's own State, is strongly opposed to this policy which tends to make treason respectable and loyalty "odious."

When this presidential policy was inaugurated the nation was comforted with the assurance that it was but an experiment; that if it failed, the Congress, the representatives of the people, could correct all errors and mistakes. Mr. Seward more than once telegraphed that the final action was in the Congress of the United States; but when Congress met in December last, when it manifested its intention to investigate, to examine, to exercise its high powers, Democratic presses and politicians rained upon Congress their fiercest maledictions. But Congress, cheered by the potential voice of the people, has investigated and examined, and will, I trust, fearlessly discharge the high duties imposed upon it by the needs of the country. Let Congress promptly submit to the people a constitutional amendment not to pay the debts incurred in support of the rebellion, not to pay for four and a half million slaves emancipated, not to permit one man in the rebel States to be equal in the Electoral College and in the House of Representatives to two men in the loyal States, and to admit any rebel State when it accepts that amendment, and the people will sustain the action of the Thirty-Ninth Congress and elect another House of Representatives that will adhere with unwavering fidelity to the amendment till it shall become a part of the organic law of the land. Most cheerfully would I accept the proposition of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] for impartial suffrage and universal amnesty; but if I cannot secure that great measure of justice and mercy, I will cheerfully act with friends who have preserved the unity of the Republic and achieved the freedom of a race.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, it may be well now to recur to the origin of this debate, for it really seems to have no relation to the subject-matter at present before the Senate. I rose yesterday to say to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] that I thought he was in error in every way, politically as well as morally, in attempting to get up a quarrel with the President of the United States, in assailing his motives, in expressing apprehensions of his future conduct, and particularly in personally attacking him for two appointments which he had made. I regretted the language which the Senator made use of both toward the President and toward the persons to whom I have just referred. I stated what that language was; it was not denied at that time, although there was a dubious shake of the head which might have been taken for a denial; but I reiterated it, and I reiterate it again, and I have only to ask in this connection the candor of the gentleman himself to confess that he has toned down his speech, and that the "record" to which he appeals is not a witness who has not been tampered with on this occasion.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator will give way I will state that not a single word or line in reference to the President was touched in the report. The Senator charged that I had accused the President of betraying the party. There is no such word there, nor anything like it. I was sure of it at the time and I looked at the report and found that I was correct. If the Senator will consult the reporter he will find that he is mistaken.

Mr. COWAN. I ask the honorable Senator if he did not soften the charge against the marshal of western Pennsylvania recently appointed; whether he did not change the word "penitentiary" to "prison?"

Mr. WILSON. I did.

Mr. COWAN. That is sufficient for my purpose. I do not wish to enter into any personal controversy with the Senator. He has a right to do with his speeches as he pleases before they are sent to the country. I have no complaint whatever to make of that; but I think it would be well in all cases where a controversy has arisen as to the identical words of a Senator, he should leave his speech to be published according to the notes of the reporter. If I misunderstood the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday, I of course was willing to make any retraction or apology which was necessary in order to set him right. I thought I did not misunderstand him, and being positive in my opinion at that time I asserted that he had made use of that word which implied treachery on the part of the President. I say it is enough, though, that he admits that that speech has undergone supervision in some of its parts.

There would have been no dispute if the President had not been attacked yesterday, if his appointees had not been attacked. It was that attack which I met, and it was that error, as I conceived it, which I desired to correct. But, sir, this is not the first time, it is not the only time, that these attacks have been made. It is well known to the country that ever since the President announced that he was opposed to the imposition of negro suffrage upon the southern States, but was willing to leave that question to the States themselves, there has been a systematic and continuous warfare upon him; and it is upon that question that the party is divided, if it be divided at all. My honorable friend thinks it is not divided; and as it is not necessary to speculate on this point just at this time, I will simply say that we shall all be wiser about it after next fall.

What is party fealty, Mr. President? What is the criterion as to whether a man is a good party man or as to whether he is a bad party man; whether he betrays his party or whether he is faithful to it? Is it that he always votes with the majority upon every question that is submitted to the Senate? I certainly do not understand that to be the rule; and if it is the rule, I am free to say I am not a party man and never can be made one under any circumstances, and I think it would be a sorry day for the country and for the Senate if men were to become so slavish as to do that thing. If this is a free country, and if it is to be governed upon the great principles of liberty of which we hear so much, thought and opinion must be free; men must be as free to dissent as they are to agree, and as free to agree as they are to refuse. What, then, does a man agree to when he belongs to a party? As I understand it, when a national convention meets it establishes certain principles, and the members of the party, as gentlemen, agree to stand upon those principles and abide by them. This is not positive. A man may change his mind even upon these principles; and when he does it, and honestly avows it, he honestly avows himself out of the party. But as to every other thing, not embraced in that platform, and as to all other things to which he never assented, I never heard that any gentleman was bound to lay down his private opinions and yield them to a majority. A majority may be right; it may be oftener right than a minority, but we have no evidence of it heretofore in the history of the world.

Now, I think it would not be very difficult for me to demonstrate that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, according to the tenor of his speeches, is to-day a Democrat. Why? The last half hour of the speech he has just made was nothing but a verification of Democratic predictions. I am a Union man; I have always been a Union man; and I was a Union man because I had faith in the Union; and I not only had faith in the Union, but I had faith in the people of the Union. I not only had faith in the people of the Union North, but I had faith in the people of the Union South; and I have to-day. What was the burden of the last half hour of the Senator's speech? It was to show that union is impossible. What were we told, at the outbreak of the war, by the Democrats? They said, "You are all wrong in making war; you cannot preserve the Union by war; you will only widen the breach, and you will only make it more difficult than ever to compromise your differences." What was said by the Union men? They said, "The southern people are misled by factionists; they have not had a fair opportunity of determining in this matter; a large majority of them have always been in favor of the Union, and always opposed to its disruption; if they are properly supported and properly treated, and the factionists are put down and the conspirators routed in every direction, the people will come back to their allegiance if we treat them as we ought to treat our fellow-citizens and men with whom we expect to live in union and harmony; they will behave very well, and everything will go on just as it did before."

What was asserted in the Chicago platform of 1864, of which the honorable Senator complains? That the war was a failure. A failure in what way? That the war was a failure because it could not restore the Union. The men who made the Chicago platform, I suppose, were just as honest as the honorable Senator himself, and I suppose they had quite as much stake in the Union. This is another thing, I regret to hear, to have one half the people made out to be traitors. If I thought I lived in a community where one half the people were traitors, or where one half the people could not be trusted with the administration of the Government, I would leave it. What did the men who met at Chicago in 1864 say? They said the war was a failure. They did not mean to say that it was a failure because it did not kill anybody, because it was not full of great battles, because it did not cover the earth with blood and slaughter and desolation. They did not mean to say that; but they meant to say "You cannot reconcile your differences with the southern States in that way, and so far it is a failure." What did the Union men say? "No; it is not a failure; just wait until the war is over and then we will heal our differences, and we will unite as before; everybody will be under the dominion of the Constitution and the laws." That was what Union men said, and it was upon that theory that the war was conducted.

What then? The war is over; the southern people submit, and submit to whom? Not to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, or to the Senate of the United States, or to the President of the United States, or to anybody else. Nobody asked them to do so; they had no right to do so; but they submit to the Constitution and the laws. If there is a rebel in the South to-day you have his neck in your halter. What more do you want? "Terms" do you say? What right has an officer of the law, when a resisting felon yields himself, to talk to him about "terms?" The felon, the vilest though he may be, covered with crimes of the deepest dye, has a right to say to the officer, "Who imposes terms? I am under the law." These men are under the law; they have come back and done precisely what all wise and good men, I think, said they would. They regret their folly. They have suffered and atoned for it. Talk about punishing! Was there ever a people so punished on earth before? I ask Senators in all candor and sincerity, is there a man on the earth who would be willing to inflict any further punishment upon the people as people? Is it not the law and the rule of history and of politics that war purges the people? What man ever attempted, and succeeded in the attempt, to punish a conquered people? Nobody. No just man of good sense ever tried it, and no one ever tried it but what failed.

Then the rebellion is put down and we attempt to restore the Union. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts gets up and the whole burden of his speech here is to prove that the Union cannot be restored, that the southern people are just as bad as ever, that they are just as rebellious as ever, and that, in fact, the rebellion exists there just the same as it ever did; except that it is not carrying muskets, or standing behind cannon, or riding a trooper's horse. That is the argument. Now, I ask him wherein that differs from the Chicago platform of 1864. How far is he away really in opinion from his Democratic friends who were in favor of that platform? I cannot see it, I must confess; and, sir, what is more, I am unwilling to verify that remarkable passage in that platform. I did not believe it at the time it was made; I do not believe it now. I believe with my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] that the Union will restore, and that it will restore immediately, and that all that is necessary to restore it is for a few men to forget their animosities, to turn their attention in a charitable direction instead of that of crimination. If it will not restore, why are we sitting here? If it is impossible to reconcile this difference between the loyal and the rebellious States, if it is impossible that the hearts of these people can ever come into union with us, what do we expect to come from it? Hold them as vassals, as conquered people? What benefit shall we derive from that, and how long will you hold them? You will hold them precisely as long as you have force to hold them and no longer. It is certainly not to be expected that men of our race would submit to any domination of any kind imposed upon them longer than that.

Mr. President, the doctrine that the rebel States are in that condition, that their people are in that condition, is disunionism; instead of reconstruction it is obstruction—I believe that was the word used by the Senator from Wisconsin. Impregnate the people with that idea, satisfy them of its truth, and the Union is gone beyond a peradventure, because gentlemen will remember that a Union is not a thing of force, a Union is not a thing to be imposed upon a people. A Union imposed upon a people is called by another name; it is a yoke, and that yoke will be thrown off whenever the first and fitting opportunity occurs; and any speech, any utterance made with the intent of establishing that fact to-day is disunion, and it is of the same kind with and will have the same result as those speeches had and were intended to have at the outstart of the rebellion, in which we were told, "Union is impossible; you cannot restore it by war." It is in the same spirit and will be followed by the same result as the declaration of the Chicago platform of 1864 that the war was a failure.

Mr. President, as I stated before, this discussion arose upon the question whether the President of the United States had been true to his party fealty. I asserted yesterday that he had been, and I defied any gentleman to put his finger upon any part or parcel of the Chicago or Baltimore platforms of 1860 and 1864 respectively, the published platforms of the party, to which he had not adhered literally and distinctly, and I say that he is standing there upon them to-day, and I defy contradiction. To make the matter short, I have to say to the honorable Senator who boasts about the popularity of his wing of the party, and about the strength he has with the people, that he durst not now avow his principles, and he approached them very cavalierly even after he was obliged in this present speech to allude to them. What are they? Does he believe those States are in the Union or out of the Union? Are they States or are they not States? Are their people our vassals, or are they people having the same rights that we have under the Constitution and the laws, subject to such punishments as the laws inflict upon them? Is he in favor of negro suffrage, or "impartial suffrage," as he calls it? If so, I should like to meet him in Pennsylvania where he has been talking to such multitudes upon that subject. I will promise him a good reception there, and as handsome entertainment as a Pennsylvania landlord can serve for the occasion; and they are famous for having good things to eat and good places to stay at. Let that be avowed. I have no quarrel with one who believes in universal negro suffrage; but announce it, avow it, put it in your platform, and let us discuss it.

Mr. SUMNER. I am for it.

Mr. COWAN. The other Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] is for it, and he has said so. He avows it. I have the highest respect for him and his principles, and no difficulty whatever about them. But put it into your platform. The President says that question belongs to the States. Does it? Is it solely within the province of a free State to determine who shall be the depositaries of political power within that State? If it is, the President is right. If, however, the other States under this Confederacy and the powers which they enjoy under the Constitution have a right to amend it so as to take away from free States that power, then avow that, and put it down and make it your platform and stand upon it. I have a right then, if I choose, to get upon it, I suppose, but you have no right if I do not get upon it, to say that I have abandoned any previous platform. Nobody has a right to say that I have not been faithful to my party obligations because I do not happen to vote with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] and his friends.

Now, I will say further to that Senator that I was a member of the Republican party, the party that adopted the Chicago platform of 1860, the party that denounced John Brown for his raid into Virginia. The honorable Senator and his set as I call them—because I really think they never had a party, they never amounted to more than an abolition society—the people who entertained the views and insisted upon the doctrines which he says now ought to be the doctrines of the American people, and perhaps it may be so, had no part or lot, with their extraordinary schemes and measures, in the Chicago platform of 1860. I ask in all candor, suppose somebody at that time had mentioned in that platform, or could have got a plank inserted in it, that the Republican party were in favor of negro suffrage, where would the honorable Senator have been with his tremendous majority to-day that he talks about? Put it in your platform in the coming election, and I can show where he will be after the next election in Pennsylvania. I do not profess to know anything about Massachusetts, and indeed I do not profess to care a great deal. She is of great importance when newspapers are to be printed and speeches are to be made; but when the votes come to be counted she is not of so much importance, and almost anybody can tell a long while before hand what she is going to do upon any question. Her people have a very large margin within which to display themselves. If there is a hundred thousand majority in favor of the Republican platform as announced by her representatives, there is plenty of room for a diminution without much danger.

Mr. SUMNER. She is a sure State.

Mr. COWAN. She is a sure State, but we have a much narrower plank to travel on in Pennsylvania. Our people are divided in opinion there; they do not all go one way. We have half a million voters, and I suppose that eight or ten thousand men will turn the scale one way or the other.

Mr. SUMNER. We are outspoken in Massachusetts. If you adopted Massachusetts ideas perhaps you would have the same majority.

Mr. COWAN. I do not know about that. We have been entertaining Massachusetts ideas for a very long while, and I must confess that they have never attained to any very warm reception there. Massachusetts is supposed, on the part of the Teutonic tribes who inhabit the State from which I come, to be somewhat vagarious in her political notions, somewhat visionary. I suppose they have not yet forgotten the time when you cut off the ears of our Quakers for going up there and trying to propagate their notions among you. It may be that that still sticks in the minds of our people. I do not know why it is, but they have not very high regard for the politics of Massachusetts, nor, I may say, for its poetry, either, in Hiawatha.

But to come back; I am taken to task for the votes which I gave during the war. I want simply to state a few of the things which guided me during the war. In the first place, we were in the war, and I was utterly and totally opposed to any discussion of the causes of the war; I was utterly and totally opposed to the discussion of any of the issues which had divided the people of the North in the past; and above all I thought it was of the utmost importance for every patriotic man to avoid giving offense to the Democratic party, constituting as it did about one half of the people. I was, moreover, opposed to every measure, no matter by whom concocted, that was calculated in any way, either directly or indirectly, proximately or remotely, to revive any dissensions between the Republican party and the Democratic party during the war. And who did revive them? If the Democratic party stands before the country to-day a great party, almost equal to yours, by virtue of whose schemes does it stand there? By virtue of whose projects? Upon what meat did it feed? I can tell the honorable Senator; it fed upon the measures, and the very measures, which he blames me for opposing. About the very first item of grand political capital which was given to the Democrats of the North was the confiscation bill. Was Mr. Lincoln in favor of that? Was that a measure of his? I opposed it.

Mr. CRESWELL. Let me ask the Senator if Mr. Johnson did not advocate a very general confiscation bill in some of his public speeches in Tennessee.

Mr. COWAN. I cannot tell anything about that. I was not talking about him in this connection.

Mr. CRESWELL. The gentleman will find that to be the case.

Mr. COWAN. That may be—

Mr. CRESWELL. Especially in the speech in which he accepted his nomination.

Mr. COWAN. The question is not what Mr. Johnson did twenty years ago, or five years ago, or six years ago, or at any other time; the question now is, whether he stands upon the platform of the Republican or Union party, its published, declared platform before the world. I suspect that if gentlemen here were to go back to their own old records in order to establish a character for consistency, they would not succeed very well. I do not know, indeed, how my friend from Maryland would succeed, for if I have been correctly informed—

Mr. CRESWELL. I think I could measure it squarely and fairly with the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COWAN. That may all be. I do not make the allusion for the purpose of reflecting upon the honorable Senator; but I have only to say that I found upon my table the other day what purported to be a copy of resolutions, I think offered by him in his State, and which looked to me very strongly like secession, in the early part of this difficulty. I do not blame the Senator for that; I have no want of charity for a man who fell into an error of that kind.

Mr. CRESWELL. The gentleman of course will not blame me for that, inasmuch as I never offered such a resolution. I never offered a resolution which intimated that I or any part of the people of Maryland were in favor of secession, and no such resolution was ever adopted anywhere with my consent.

Mr. COWAN. I do not know how that is. I only state this fact to justify what I hinted.

Mr. CRESWELL. I say it is not a fact.

Mr. COWAN. It is a fact that the resolutions are here and were put upon the desks of members. It is not such a very great distance but that the record, I suppose, may be found.

Mr. CRESWELL. Not at all; the record can be produced.

Mr. COWAN. I suppose the correctness of the resolutions laid upon our tables can be verified. Now, Mr. President, let us see what the platform is, as announced at Baltimore; let us get back to the platform. I do not know who was the author of this instrument. I was not a member of that convention, nor was I present, and therefore I have no means of knowing who the scrivener was; but I find in that platform this first resolution:

"Resolved, That it is the highest duty of every American citizen to maintain, against all their enemies, the integrity of the Union and the permanent authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States."

I think I do remember a time when, if a gentleman had offered that resolution in this body, he would have been hooted at from all radical quarters as having "Constitution on the brain." Yes, the platform declares that the highest duty is to maintain the integrity of the Union and the authority of the Constitution and laws. I have insisted upon that always; I insist upon it now. It is the remedy that I suggest now for the difficulties under which the country labors. The President has a plan of policy; what is it? The Constitution and the laws; that is the whole of it. Certain gentlemen here wish to introduce an entirely new plan; they wish to remodel the Constitution and they wish to change the laws. Now, what ought to be done in a case of that kind, if men want to preserve the harmony of the party, if they are satisfied that on the safety of the party depends the safety of the country? Is it not the most rational thing in the world that they should come back at once to some point where we could agree? You cannot make a party by continually introducing new schemes, as Wendell Phillips said the other day, blinding the pilot with the storm of constitutional amendments, upon no one of which can any half a dozen men agree. When a measure is introduced as a party measure, and it cannot command the undivided support of the party, the man who persists in it afterward is guilty of the division, and if division and separation and defeat results, it is to be attributable to him, not to the slave who puts his head into the collar and follows with servility a majority.

I am asked by a Senator whether I belong to the Wendell Phillips party. I never belonged to the Wendell Phillips party; but I consider Wendell Phillips as the outspoken, grand man of that party; he is the typical man of that party; and whether he wins or loses he has the advantage at least of speaking out his desires and his designs. There is no concealment about Phillips, which is one good trait in his character.

I ask, then, instead of blinding the pilot with a storm of constitutional amendments, can we not come back to something on which we can all agree? Can anything be more simple? We have sworn to support the Constitution. Cannot we agree upon that? We have compelled the President to swear that he will see that the laws shall be executed. Cannot we agree upon that? The rebels have agreed to that, too; have they not? They have laid down their arms; they submit themselves to that same authority; and your authority is established everywhere all over the States lately in rebellion.

Now, if we could concoct a new measure upon which we could all agree, I would say that would be meritorious; but when you concoct measures, and cannot agree upon them, why persist in making them tests? As I understand, there has been such a divergence between Agamemnon and Achilles, even so late as yesterday, that Troy is not likely to be taken soon. Agamemnon has taken Briseis, the captive of Achilles, and insists upon carrying her away into captivity as his prize, notwithstanding by the laws of war she is claimed by the other. That is significant, to start upon. When the Achilles of the House and the Agamemnon of the Senate divide and differ, such poor doctors as we are may well disagree, and as we are all members of a common family, although belonging to different wings, why is it that we cannot compromise and agree, upon what? That of which above all other things our country has reason to be proud, her Constitution and her laws, and trust to time to work out the proper results.

The question is asked, why not try rebels and execute them? As I said before, surely no man can thirst for vengeance against communities, against States, against people. However much he might desire to see an individual mischievous rebel punished, surely the women and children and the Union men of the southern States have suffered their share for any folly of which they may have been guilty in this war, and especially so when we remember that at the outstart of the war this Government had forgotten its duty. What is a Government created and instituted for? It is that it shall be a standing organization for the protection of the people. If the people could get up a governmental organization as soon as a conspirator could usurp an organization you could put off having a Government until the contingency happened; but a Government is a standing organization of the people, whose duty it is to protect the people against hostile and usurping organizations seeking to rule them. In 1861 there were conspiracies against the General Government all over the southern States. They were covered over with societies whose sole business it was to overawe and terrify the people, rendering necessary to them that very protection which it was the duty of the Government to afford them. What, under the circumstances, did this Government do? Does any sane man believe that if this had been a Government vigorous, concentrated with its forces, knowing its duty, it would not have throttled the rebellion upon the instant, that it would not have dispersed the vigilance committees, dissolved the order of the Lone Star, and punished as criminals all the men who were engaged in getting up the plot to overturn the Union? The Government did not do this. It allowed itself to be kicked out of the possession of seven States ignominiously. What, then, was it expected that the people should do? Was it expected that they were able to stand up against their State governments; that they were able to resist the organized bands of the various kinds of secessionists who were plotting together for the dismemberment of the Union? The man who supposes they were able to do so in the absence of their Government, which was not there to protect them, which had gone away and left them helpless and defenseless in the face of that tide of secession, has not reflected on the nature of government enough to qualify him to govern anybody.

Allegiance and protection are reciprocal. I owe allegiance to the Government of the United States, and the Government of the United States owes me protection; and when I fall under the power of another organization, of a third party, and I obey that party when the Government of the United States is not there to protect me, that Government is derelict, and not me. There are men, I admit, strong, sturdy, and willful enough even to stand up against a State organization and refuse obedience to it; but they are the rari nantes in gurgite vasto; they are the stray swimmers in that pool. There are very few of them. Most people submit to the authority that is over them, to its insignia and to its emblems, and especially in this country where the General Government is a confederacy of States, the States themselves being in effect the governments most directly in contact with the people, and to which they have been in the habit of looking for the administration of their laws.

I say, then, that it is one of the principles of the Baltimore platform that—

"Every good citizen should maintain the integrity of the Union"—

I suppose that meant that everybody in the Union should have the right which the Union confers on him—

"and the permanent authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States; and that, laying aside all differences and political opinions, we pledge ourselves as Union men, animated by a common sentiment and aiming at a common object, to do everything in our power to aid the Government in quelling by force of arms the rebellion now raging against its authority, and in bringing to the punishment due to their crimes the rebels and traitors arrayed against it."

Has the President violated any part of that? Fix your tribunal; put your judge upon it; get your machinery ready, and five hundred chief criminals, with Jefferson Davis at their head, or five thousand if you demand them, are at your service. I suppose it is not intended that the President should be common prosecutor; I suppose it is not intended that he should usurp the functions of the judiciary; and I suppose it is not intended but that the American people now at this time are qualified to pass upon the question of crime. I do not know but that perhaps I am wrong in saying that; it is pretended that they are not qualified to play the part of public prosecutor; because we passed a law the other day by which an office for that purpose was created so as to put in it somebody to play public prosecutor, but he was not to prosecute traitors; he was not to prosecute rebels; he was not to bring them to criminal punishment, but he was to punish judges and magistrates who did not put the negro on an equality with the white man before the laws of the South. I say I suppose, however, that if rebels are to be punished, there are American citizens of intelligence enough, love of country enough, desire enough to bring them through the ordinary channels of the administration of justice into the clutches of the law; and I say on the part of the President, and I say it for him, fix your tribunal, get your machinery ready, and you can have five hundred of them to try to-morrow. We will not be particular about the selection; you can select them yourselves; but it is time that the blame was thrown from his shoulders because he does not himself, in some way not known to the law, bring them to trial when it was utterly impossible, according to the decision of the Chief Justice of the United States, that he could do anything. These men could not, under his ruling, be put to trial unless you undertook to try them by military commissions; and that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided, and very properly, I think, to be extra-judicial. If you can make out a case before a military tribunal; if you have the evidence by which you can show that these men violated the laws of war, then they are properly triable before a military tribunal. You cannot try them for treason before it. That is pretty clear, I think.

I go on to the next resolution, which is also significant of the position which this party occupied in 1864:

"That we approve the determination of the Government of the United States not to compromise with rebels or to offer any terms of peace except such as may be based upon an unconditional surrender of their hostility and a return of their just allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the United States."

That is right. If we had any right to make war at all, our right was founded in the fact that these people were bound by the Constitution and laws. If we had any authority to strike with the sword at all, that was the source from which we derived it; and having struck for that purpose, this resolution declares that it is fit and proper that nothing less shall satisfy us. Have they returned to their allegiance? Are they submissive to the Constitution and the laws? Then they have accepted our terms. What is now proposed? Now, it is proposed to ratify the ordinances of secession next. First you ratify the Chicago platform of 1864 by declaring the war to be a failure and that the Union will not restore, and then you propose to ratify the secession ordinances, you propose to treat these States as though they were out of the Union and to make terms with them in order that they shall come back. Think of it! Make terms!

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask a question of my friend from Pennsylvania; whether, in his opinion, the political crime of treason does not justly involve the political punishment of a forfeiture of political rights on the part of the traitor?

Mr. COWAN. I can answer that very distinctly, and without a moment's hesitation. The political crime of treason, or any other crime in this country, incurs just such forfeiture as the laws impose upon it, and no more and no less; and I have no doubt that my learned friend from Vermont will see in an instant that that is vital and is essential to the very theory of our Constitution and laws. This is a Government of law, and not of arbitrary will on the part of anybody.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would remind my friend that my question was whether, in his opinion, the political crime of treason did not justly involve the forfeiture of the political rights of the traitor as a theory of government. I was not discussing the question of indictments at law, but the general principles of government.

Mr. COWAN. Well, Mr. President, if the honorable Senator means that the Congress of the United States can impose as a forfeiture upon a community for rebellion the loss of their political rights, I deny it in toto; and I deny further that the Congress of the United States can impose for any offense any punishment whatever upon anybody. It is expressly provided in the Constitution that no bill of attainder shall be passed and no ex post facto law made; and what for? For the very purpose of preventing that. What did the Parliament of England do after a rebellion? It sat down and put the names of leading traitors into an act of Parliament, Parliament being the judge, being clothed with the judicial authority, and by an act of Parliament imposed the penalties of treason upon all those named in it. That was a bill of attainder. It was called a bill of attainder when the blood of the persons charged with crimes was corrupted, when they could not inherit, when nobody could inherit through them. If it imposed any less punishment it was called a bill of pains and penalties; and if this Congress were to pass a bill by which any State in this Union or the people of any State were deprived of any of their rights as a punishment, that would be, properly speaking, a bill of pains and penalties. The Supreme Court of the United States have decided that, as the greater includes the less, bills of attainder being forbidden, bills of pains and penalties are also forbidden.

The Constitution provides again that no ex post facto law, no law shall be passed which imposes a punishment upon an offense which was not the punishment due to the offense when it was committed. I know you do not like the law. The law has been the bugbear all the way. After a war of four or five years, to get back to the Constitution and the law is difficult. Of course none of you want the law; you do not appeal to the law; you appeal to the committee of fifteen; you appeal to a constitutional amendment; you appeal to some new regulation that is to be made. Why not appeal to the law? If a deprivation of political rights can be imposed upon a community, where is the law for it, where is it found? It is not found in our Constitution; it is not found in the history of the country; it is not found anywhere here; and this is a Government of written law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my friend from Pennsylvania if it is not found in the general laws of nature, by which all communities are entitled to exclude from the functions of society persons who are dangerous to it?

Mr. COWAN. I am sorry that every man in the nation is not fully and thoroughly impregnated with the doctrine that there is no such thing as absolute power in this land. Communities have power in a state of nature; but communities have found that when they delegate that power belonging to them in a state of nature to parliaments, omnipotent parliaments, parliaments abuse power; they found when they delegated it to monarchs that monarchs abused the power; and our fathers when they established this Government limited its powers, and they said to their rulers, "You shall have no power except that which we delegate to you." Now, I agree that if this was the Parliament of Great Britain, omnipotent, not bound or fettered by any constitution of delegated powers, we might do that; we might impose upon a State the penalty of forfeiture of political rights for what we supposed was political treason. But that is not the case. It is not true. The law is different. This is a Government of law, written, express law; and he who attempts under it to exercise any authority or control whatever over his fellow-men, by way of punishment, must show that he has the law on his side.

But I was going on to state that the resolutions of the Baltimore platform forbade any offer of terms to the States in rebellion. I am opposed to-day to any offer of terms. When you offer terms to your antagonist you mean that he has a right to reject them. If you offer terms to the southern States, what do you mean? Do you mean that they may reject them? If you do not, it is a very strange proposition of terms. And suppose they do reject them, what then? You have either to satisfy yourselves with that which you have now, or you have to enforce your terms by another war. You make a war first to compel them to come to the terms of the Constitution and laws, and then you make war to compel them to other and new terms!

Mr. President, the common sense of the American people never will agree to reconcile itself with that doctrine; and to talk about "indemnity for the past and security for the future" is as utterly idle as the idle wind that blows about the very topmost dome of the Capitol. "Indemnity for the past and security for the future" is well enough in foreign wars and in disputes between foreign Governments; but who ever heard of a sovereign stipulating for terms with his rebellious subjects? The terms are that you must submit to the law; and when the rebellion is put down and you are in the grasp of the law, the law is satisfied. Offer terms to rebels! Terms to the rebel States! If you do that you ratify the ordinances of secession, and you admit that they are out and that they are treating with you on equal footing. We made the war to compel these people to observe the Constitution and the law. Are you satisfied? If you want more you must put them on a footing to treat with you, or else you must compel them to more; and when you compel them to more, where is your right?

Mr. President, it is said here that an attempt has been made to reconcile with the President of the United States. Why, sir, I can say that this war upon the President is a war of that society of which I spoke; I can say that its inspiration comes not only from people in this country, but one half of it comes from England, where one half of the society is; and I can tell you, sir, that the programme of the war upon the President was published in a letter from England in one of the leading journals in this country written before this Congress met, in which it was laid down that the President must be attacked and that the President must be restrained even to the verge of war. I refer to a letter of Professor Newman to a friend in this country. The professor is well known. The person to whom the letter was written is unknown. If he is present, he can avow it. That letter was dated November 8, 1865, and it contains, not only the animus of this war upon the President, but it contains exactly and particularly the animus of the party who assail the President.

"My dear friend"—and I may remark at the outstart that its tone is almost as lugubrious and doleful as that of my friend from Massachusetts when he tells us of his praying men and women on their bended knees beseeching Heaven to protect them against the President, or against the doubts of the President—

"MY DEAR FRIEND: I confess that it makes me sorrowful to write to you. I have indeed put it off on that account."

He had evidently been written to before and had not answered as promptly as was proper.

"In your war I was never gloomy. I did not lose heart after Fredericksburg. But I am becoming gloomy now. Nor can I get comfort from other minds. All whom I meet that were your warm friends in the war are more or less sad, some direly so; but those who were your bitter enemies think President Johnson 'very judicious,' and seem highly contented."

That is a favorite argument with this set, and always has been; it is not a question what you say or what you believe, but what does somebody else say. I suppose that nothing could so far condemn a man in their eyes as that the Democratic party should approve of what he does. Why is that? I think a man should be thankful for having the approval of an opposition. I think it shows that his conduct is, as this writer says, "judicious," when even his political opponents approve it. Remember these men say they stood by Lincoln. Professor Newman goes on to say:

"You all had the fond hope—and in spite of Mr. Lincoln's weakness, so had I—that this was to be your only civil war. You fought it with magnificent, unsparing energy, in order to give peace forever to your children. But the ghastly vision now rises over me, and makes me sick, that you are doomed to follow in the bloody routine of the Old World. With us it is an axiom, that kings have to be deposed and a dynasty exiled before they cease to conspire against the constitution."

That may be an axiom, but it has not proved true in Europe. The King generally goes back there, or has done so far. They roll their heads sometimes off the scaffold, but they restore the son, or the heir in some way usually gets to the throne afterward.

"I now miserably forebode that you will have a civil war to decide whether President or Congress is to set the policy of the Union."

Here is the Englishman talking as good Massachusetts doctrine as if he had been bred and born there. You will have to have a civil war between the President and Congress in order to determine who shall set the policy of the nation? Did not this writer know that the policy was set in the convention at Baltimore? Did he not know that neither the President nor Congress set policies here except each in its own department? There was no policy about it. The question was to compel a parcel of recalcitrant people to return to their obedience to the Constitution and the laws. That was the question; but he assumes that there was to be a war, and I will show you he advised it, too:

"All is in train for it, unless the next Congress sternly call the President to account. Nothing is clearer than that he has pretended to do things experimentally and provisionally, with the express aim of so entangling matters that the Congress should have no choice but to ratify all that he has done and have no real direction of the public policy."

The same doctrine that we hear continually, the same apprehensions, the same misapprehensions, of the motives of the President, and the same charge made against him of criminal motive!

"It is just what Aberdeen or Palmerston have systematically done with the English Parliament, but would hardly dare to do in so terrible a crisis as yours."

This, by the by, is exceedingly characteristic; this gentleman, as he goes along, cannot help taking a turn at his own Government. He seems to have a universal disposition to scold and find fault, and never be satisfied with anything; but that is characteristic of this class of people. They seem never to be satisfied and never to know what they want.

"The first error was in not prosecuting Buchanan in the summer of 1861. The next was in enduring Mr. Lincoln's Louisiana constitution, and his reply to Congress that he meant to violate the confiscation act if he saw it to be for the public good."

That ought not to have been endured! Mr. Lincoln should have been "sternly" restrained at that point!

"Out of President Lincoln's high-handed settlement of affairs without Congress is developed the present policy of President Johnson."

I suppose this is authority enough to show that the President is treading faithfully in the footsteps of his predecessor. It is so understood across the water, and that, I should think, would be conclusive of it.

"The conduct of Louis Napoleon"—

I beg my friend's attention to this, because, perhaps, he has read it, and it is at the bottom of his apprehensions—

"The conduct of Louis Napoleon in 1849, 1850, 1851, shows what a President, elected by the people and independent of the Parliament for four years, can do if he have large patronage."

There is the apprehension. There is that which makes the knees tremble and the hand unsteady; the fear that in this contest between the President on the one hand and Congress on the other, the President, with his patronage, may succeed. It is not very complimentary to the people, I confess; but still a good joke comes from the head of the table.

"He has unity of action"—

I hope he will have—

"promptitude, continuity. Congress has factions and long debates and long vacation; and when it comes to debate, finds itself too late. Your President's course (unless violently arrested) assures to you many years of instability and alarm, and therefore many years of high expenditure and high patronage, during all which time you will become accustomed to the Executive forestalling and superseding the legislative. Out of this it will be almost a miracle if so vast an Executive do not (like that of old Rome) involve you in another civil war, even if the negro question was to blow over in ten or twelve years' time."

That is the nitro-glycerine that is concealed in the cargo of the ship of state. Your pilot is treacherous; he contemplates running her upon the shoals; and he will do so and perhaps destroy her, even if this combustible material were not there ready to blow her to pieces in ten or twelve years' time!

I will not detain the Senate much longer with this. I only desire to give you this gentleman's advice to his friends here, and I beg the attention of Senators to it, because it seems that it was followed:

"As your President is not at all deficient in understanding, I do not like to tell you what I think of this sentence; but he might surely be asked by a negro to explain wherein is the virtue of such patience. Sidney Smith would say that A exercises sublime patience with B, while B is tormenting C."

That is a solecism that we have heard matched here very frequently. In order to have this understood I must give the "sentence" here alluded to. It is:

"If the southern States go wrong, the power is in our hands; we can check them at any stage, to the end, and oblige them to correct their errors; we must be patient with them."

"Does the President seriously say that when the Federal troops are withdrawn, the State militia constituted, State rights restored, you have any power of 'obliging' the States to 'correct their errors' except by a new civil war? Mr. Seward (in same paper) tells us at Auburn, for our comfort, that there cannot be a new civil war. It is comforting to the white race, but it is the knell of despair to the colored race."

Do you want another war for the colored race? That seems to be this man's opinion.

"It secures that the 'South shall be victorious,' as Wendell Phillips puts it; and from despair alone will come a negro uprising and war of races. This would bring on you lasting disgrace, instead of that moral glory which you had all but earned; it might make your whole future as stained as that of bloody old Europe. This conversation of the President, following on his heartless speech to the colored soldiers (so unlike his Nashville speech, in October, 1864,) exhibits him as one who cannot come right except by external constraint; and Mr. Seward's speech is the warrant that the whole Cabinet is going wrong. (Have they corrupted him?) I see no possibility of Congress bringing him right by a mere defensive policy; it must assume the aggressive against him, to give it a chance of success. The mildest form of attack, I think, would be to invite him to explain his apparent neglect of the act of Congress which forbids any one who has been in overt rebellion to hold office or draw pay from the Federal Government."

How many resolutions have we had in obedience to that mandate? And was not the first resolution offered this session, addressed to the President, exactly that kind of one? Was it not in pursuance of this suggestion?

"Also, his allowing the reorganization of State militia should be solemnly denounced as initiating the means of a new rebellion."

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will my honorable friend allow me to ask him to whom that letter was addressed, if he can inform me?

Mr. COWAN. The person to whom it is addressed is unknown. It is written by Professor Newman, from London, November 8, 1865. I could read much more of the same import, and if I had time I should be glad to refresh the memory of my friend from Massachusetts by reading a few sentences from the Anti-Slavery Standard written by a gentleman who signs himself L. B., and who is unquestionably a man of ability and of great acuteness as a writer. He says:

"The moral sense of the country, organized into the Liberty party of 1844"—

That is the word I was struggling for some time ago—the Liberty party of 1844. That was the party—

"was weakened in the Free-soil movement of 1848, and still further diluted in the Republican party of 1854."

Getting smaller and smaller and more beautifully less.

"In 1860 the first irreparably fatal step was taken by the nomination of Mr. Lincoln at Chicago. The success of the Republican party, whoever its nominee, had already been insured. That success, a part of the prearranged programme of the secession conspirators, was predestined"—

It is hard to suppose that the Chicago convention of 1860 had any notice of that predestination, I think; and they were not to blame for taking Mr. Lincoln on that account—

"was in the air"—

Epidemic!

"was patent to the commonest political intelligence. The heart of the country beat for Frémont."

A good deal. It beat in 1864. It beat along for Chase and for a good many people besides Mr. Lincoln, we were told. [Laughter.]

"The heart of the country beat for Frémont, but Republican politicians declared him unavailable. Seward had openly apostatized upon his return from Europe, and his nomination had happily become impossible. The perfidious pretense of a necessity for 'compromise,' the usual readiness of honest Republicans to accede to 'conservative' demands, gave us Lincoln."

I wish they would concede a little now; we might perhaps succeed better.

"The people accepted him upon trust, and have not yet learned how grievously they were deceived. Succeding to the Government in 1861, the leaders of the Republican party took hold of power with the feeble grasp of men conscious of their unfitness to rule. They waited for events—they did not make or control events. From 1861 to 1864, in a period of revolution and civil war, in a crisis which should have called forth the loftiest qualities of administrative ability, the Republican majority in Congress contented itself with merely tiding over temporary difficulties. Campaigns were planned and battles fought, not so much for the purpose of crushing the rebellion as to carry an election in New Hampshire or Pennsylvania. In all those eventful years the voice of a statesman was not heard in the Halls of Congress."

Think of the impudence of the fellow! [Laughter.]

Mr. NYE. He had not read your speeches.

Mr. COWAN. I believe the Senator from Nevada was not in the Chamber at the time alluded to.

"Not until Sumner, breaking the bonds of silence imposed upon him by party discipline and the timid policy of his associates, first took up the cause of the people against the Administration on the question of the final recognition of Louisiana, and defeated for the time the purposes of Mr. Lincoln, was there any action taken by the representatives of the Republican party commensurate to the occasions before them."

I believe that is the same learned Theban who has been doing mischief recently.

"All through the war they had allowed the policy of Mr. Lincoln to prevail, without one word of indignant public protest, with scarcely one instance of the exercise of their prerogatives as the sovereign law-making power of the nation, to arrest the downward course of public affairs."

And so on; it is full of animadversions of that kind.

Now, Mr. President, to get at the secret, what is at the bottom of all this? What is wanted? What will satisfy this Liberty party of 1844, which has been so unfortunate and so much abused and so much thwarted from that day down to the present? What does it want to-day? If negro suffrage will satisfy it, say so. If in addition to negro suffrage there must be negro eligibility to office, say so, put it down, make it into a platform. If, in addition to all that, in order to give effect to these rights conferred upon the negro, there must be social equality, put it down and let us know it, let us draw the lines, and it will not take very long to determine with the people which wing of the party is the one they will favor, notwithstanding the immense amount of machinery that is now brought to bear under the name of the representatives of the party.

Again, what is the condition of these States? Are they in or are they out? Put it down. Are their people subject to us, subject to the will of the conqueror, subject to the political forfeitures of which the honorable Senator from Vermont spoke? If that is a plank in your platform, put it down. If the Union is dissolved, if it cannot exist any longer, put it down; let the lines be drawn; but I say, until your programme is announced, until your platform is made, until you have stated your ultimates, do not assail the President for leaving his party, do not assail anybody else for leaving it, after having urged all the measures for having voted against which I have been taken to task, because every one of them is in direct violation of both the Chicago and the Baltimore platforms. I may say that the principal item of our Chicago platform which has any relation to the politics of to-day is that the perpetuity of the Union depended on the maintenance of the rights of the States, accompanied, as I said before, with a denunciation of old John Brown and his raid upon Virginia. Who assails the rights of the States to-day? Is it the President? Who attempts to hold them within the grasp of a bill of attainder or a bill of pains and penalties by this Congress? Is it the President? Not at all. Sir, the men who stand by the President are those who stand by the principles announced in those platforms, and who have stood upon them; and it is the men who go away after false lights, who wander in dangerous places, who cook up Freedmen's Bureau and civil rights bills, and who get up all these things, to say the very least, of doubtful constitutionality, that depart from the platforms.

Mr. President, I was taken to task here to-day very strongly for voting against the repeal of the fugitive slave law. I must confess I did not expect that from my friend. That was "the unkindest cut of all." If I was in the habit of talking Latin I would have said et tu Brute; or have pronounced the last word as a monosyllable. [Laughter.] If I remember aright there was a caucus of the Republican party, and that caucus decided to repeal the obnoxious fugitive slave law of 1850. As a member of that caucus I adhered to its determination, as I believe I did in all cases where I did not give notice that I would not. It came into the Senate and it was characterized by a most spicy and vigorous debate, in which our present Presiding Officer, not the Senator now in the chair, [Mr. ANTHONY,] but the President pro tempore of the Senate, [Mr. FOSTER,] took the side of the caucus, and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts who sits on the outer ring [Mr. SUMNER] took the other side. The law of 1850 was repealed, but, without any cause and without any consultation with the members of the party, over-zealous gentlemen insisted upon repealing the old fugitive slave law which had the signature of Washington upon it, which had been made by the very founders of the Government, and which had been hallowed by fifty-seven years of undisputed and indisputable operation in this country.

Mr. SUMNER. The fugitive slave law "hallowed!"

Mr. COWAN. The fugitive slave law was hallowed by fifty-seven years of undisputed sway in this country.

Mr. SUMNER. That is a confusion of terms.

Mr. COWAN. There is no confusion of terms when you stand upon the bargain; but it was a confusion of terms for the honorable Senator to take the oath at the desk to support the Constitution of the United States, and then declare, as I understood that he did, that he was not to be bound by the fugitive slave clause. A gentleman making a bargain ought to stand upon it; and if he does not stand upon it, if he does not intend to stand upon it, he ought not to make it. That was the law. It was a law that had not been complained of; nobody had complained of it. It was due to the border States, who were standing by us in the contest, to retain it. I voted against the repeal of that law; and the whip of the majority, cracked sharply as it can be cracked upon that subject, had no terrors for me. I voted against the repeal of that law, and would vote against the repeal of it to-morrow, because the repeal was utterly and totally useless and unnecessary. It was done, perhaps, by way of saying to the South, "Now we've got you; see what we can do!" I would rather they had been here when we did it.

Now, Mr. President, I presume that will settle this account so far. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] has referred to my own State; he has referred to the action of a Republican convention there; he has referred to the action of the Legislature of that State. I suppose that he is correctly informed of the action of those bodies; but I have not been. I have not been officially informed of any such transactions as those to which he alludes. If the Legislature passed any resolution reflecting on me, they never gave me a copy of it. If the convention did so, they did not give me a copy of it. I feel, however, that at some time or other I may be obliged to say something in reply to those resolutions, taking them merely from rumor. I believe they made a request with which I have not complied, and I suppose that there are very few members of the body who would comply with a request of that kind, drawn up very politely, that they should leave their seats and give them up to some other man who had a majority of the Legislature all ready to elect him. No doubt it would have been very comfortable to those who get up the request; but I did not look at it in that light. I did not feel that my duty to my constituents obliged me to be so deferential to a packed Legislature as to yield to a request of that kind, and I trust to appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober on that question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] has been pleased to allude to resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Wisconsin in relation to myself. It is not my purpose to speak upon that subject to-day; but those resolutions are of such a character that I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate on some proper occasion to speak on them and give my views at length. I shall not, therefore, dwell upon that subject now. There is, however, one point which I wish to mention before I take my seat—a point not stated by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania.

In the convention of 1864, upon the platform of which Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Johnson were elected, the Union party assembled at Baltimore declared solemnly in the face of the world the terms on which the rebels should submit, and declared for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which they would press; and because they stated the terms and stated the amendment to the Constitution upon which they would insist, and stated no other terms and no other amendment, the man or the party that stands up now to insist upon additional terms or additional amendments is going beyond the platform of the Union party which elected Mr. Johnson and Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. President, I do not stand here to charge other men that they are false to the Union party or the creed of that great party which gave us power; but I stand here to resist that charge when it is brought against me, or brought against the Administration or the President. When it is averred by gentlemen on this floor that he proves false to his party, false to its creed, false to its fundamental ideas, I hurl back the charge and say to those gentlemen, it is you who abandon the creed of the party and not the President. The first resolution of the Baltimore convention states that "it is the highest duty of every American citizen to maintain against all their enemies the integrity of the Union and the permanent authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States; and that laying aside all differences and political opinions, we pledge ourselves" to the prosecution of the war upon this basis alone. The Constitution, the integrity of the Union, the supremacy of both, was our platform, and we asked all men to vote for our candidates and fight our battles to victory upon that basis. What terms did we say were to be given to the rebels? What does our platform say about the terms? In 1864, in the midst of this gigantic war, and when we were pressing the rebels to the point of surrender, what did we say? What were the terms? That is the question.

"Resolved, That we approve the determination of the Government of the United States not to compromise with rebels, or to offer any terms of peace except such as may be based upon an unconditional surrender of their hostility and a return to their just allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that we call upon the Government to maintain this position, and to prosecute the war with the utmost possible vigor to the complete suppression of the rebellion, in full reliance upon the self-sacrifice, patriotism, heroic valor, and undying devotion of the American people to their country and its free institutions."

We declared what the terms should be to the rebels—no compromise, but surrender to the Constitution and the laws; and we determined to prosecute the rebellion to the end on that basis, and upon that alone. We went further, and declared in reference to an amendment to the Constitution what we would demand and all that we demanded; and what was it?

"Resolved, That as slavery was the cause and now constitutes the strength of this rebellion, and as it must be always and everywhere hostile to the principles of republican government, justice and the national safety demand its utter and complete extirpation from the soil of the Republic; and that while we uphold and maintain the acts and proclamations by which the Government in its own defense has aimed a death-blow at the gigantic evil, we are in favor, furthermore, of such amendment to the Constitution to be made by the people in conformity with its provisions, as shall terminate and forever prohibit the existence of slavery within the limits of the jurisdiction of the United States."

That is the amendment we demanded; we did not demand any other. In the platform of 1864 did we demand suffrage, unqualified and universal, to the negroes of the South as a condition of the surrender of the rebellion? Not at all. I say that the man or the party who stands up to say that that is a part of the creed of the great Union party which put Mr. Johnson in power speaks falsely. It is not true. I hurl back the charge. It is he who undertakes to insert this new programme that is false, to the party, false to the creed upon which it won its victory. Whether it was urged from England, in the letter of Newman, whether it was urged by Wendell Phillips, of Massachusetts, whoever has urged this new idea, it has been war upon the creed of the Republican Union party of 1864, upon which Mr. Johnson was elected; and therefore those who undertake to charge him with betraying the cause or the creed of the party because he refused to assume that great power in his hands to enforce negro suffrage upon the people of the South against the will of the States, and who assert that he is false to the great idea of the party, or false to human freedom, make a charge that is utterly without foundation. The charge rests on those who make it.

What has Mr. Johnson said about the question of suffrage in the southern States? He has said always just what Mr. Lincoln said: It is a question which belongs to the States; it belongs to the States of the South, and it belongs to the States of the North. They are to judge for themselves. If they choose to extend suffrage to the negroes, it is well; if they refuse it, the responsibility is on them alone; the Federal Government has not the constitutional power to assume to enforce it. Sir, this whole war upon the Administration, as well as the war upon myself as a humble supporter of the policy of Mr. Lincoln, which was inherited by Mr. Johnson on this very question, has grown out of the fact, and that alone, that so far as I am concerned, in the State of Wisconsin, in the convention of the Union party which laid down its principles last fall, I as a member of that convention and as chairman of the committee on resolutions refused to adopt what certain men, in my judgment carried away by their fanaticism, if not almost insane on this subject, insisted that we should adopt, a resolution declaring in favor of universal negro suffrage at the South as a condition precedent to the southern States being recognized and their representatives admitted into the Congress of the Union.

Sir, the Senator from Massachusetts wonders why it is that God, in His inscrutable providence, has suffered this great affliction to come upon us, that Mr. Johnson should stand upon the same ground which was occupied by Mr. Lincoln, refusing to exercise the power which the Constitution gives to no department of the Government, to impose upon the States of the South the conditions of suffrage. Why, he asks, has God, in His providence, suffered this great affliction to come upon us? Mr. President, I do not deem it an affliction. That there is a President occupying the presidential chair this day who believes and maintains the rights which the Constitution reserves and defends in the several States, that he is willing to defend the rights of the States, is in my judgment one of the greatest blessings that God, in His providence, ever vouchsafed to this country.

Sir, this country has been in great peril, peril of dissolution, a peril out of which we have escaped at last; but a peril equally as great is impending over it. What is that peril? Not a separation of the territory which constitutes the Union, but the wiping out of the States, the destruction of the rights of the States, the trampling under foot of that which is absolutely essential to the liberty of the citizen. I tell the Senator from Massachusetts that there is, and there can be, no liberty for the individual citizen unless you defend the rights of the States. In defending the rights of the States you defend the liberty of the citizen, for there alone can it be defended. This Government cannot defend the rights of the individual citizen; it covers a whole country; it is impossible in the nature of things that it can defend the individual citizen all over the country. He must be defended by domestic legislation, the municipal tribunals, the local laws, the independence and action of the judiciary and the officers of his own State.

Sir, as I read the providences of Almighty God that are transpiring before us in this great crisis, I look upward toward heaven and thank the Almighty Ruler of the universe that He does permit now to occupy the presidential chair a man who from his convictions and by all his education is determined to protect, preserve, and defend the rights which belong to the States under the Constitution. That is the way I read the teachings of Providence in this great crisis.

Mr. President, I had occasion to remark—and for it I have personally been criticised very much by some of the public press and other persons in my own State—that the people of the northern States to a very great extent were being imposed upon by false reports that are coming up from writers, correspondents of newspapers and others from the South; men some of whom are engaged in the business of plunder, who desire this state of anarchy to continue, who fear that if the Government is perfectly restored their occupation, like Othello's, will be gone; men who are plundering in cotton and the other products of the South. I made this statement and I believe it to be true, and the remark which I made in reading an extract from what was stated by a gentleman of the State of Alabama, who in his letter to me said that the state of opinion and feeling at the South was being caricatured at the North, drew from Colonel Tarbell of the State of New York, of the New York volunteers, a letter from which I will read a few extracts. I never read letters without mentioning the name, for the reading of anonymous communications is a practice that I never indulge in. I refer to it as evidence of the fact which I stated. I say this statement which I made on a former occasion called from him this letter:

"DEAR SIR: Allow me to say that I have been in the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi since December last; that I was a Whig and am a Republican, and hence looked closely at southern society. I have no hesitation in denouncing the reports in northern newspapers of outrages upon the blacks and upon northern settlers as utter fabrications or malicious exaggerations. I traveled by rail, by water, on horseback, on foot, in company and alone, by day and by night, totally unarmed except a pocket knife, purposely, openly and frankly declaring to every one I was a Yankee and Black Republican. I met others who had traveled on horseback from Florida to Mississippi, who, like me, were Republicans, and I do assure you I would sooner travel throughout the South than the North, so far as personal safety is concerned.

"To go from here to the South is like passing out of the work of the week into the Sabbath; all is quiet, all are trying to work for a living, for all are on a level and compelled to work with their own hands. Yankeeland does not present a more active, industrious scene than the whole South, nor could Yankees display more energy, ingenuity, recuperative power in starting on nothing.

"To say that the South is 'caricatured' in the North does not express it; she is slandered, vilified, wickedly, infamously belied. Were the South to come North she would not recognize herself; if she did she would disown herself. Were the North to go South she would be astounded at the misrepresentations and falsehoods and with the cruelly unjust and erroneous sentiments prevailing here. The North is all wrong, not in its consistent anti-slavery sentiments, but in its impressions of southern character. The negroes are neither hated nor ill-treated, northern settlers are not molested; the South accepts the situation in good faith."

I will not read all this letter, but one or two more extracts. The writer says further:

"There are just grounds of complaint against the Freedmen's Bureau officers. Most of them are interested in plantations, and so many are corrupt and incompetent that the service, the Government, and the North are scandalized by their conduct."

"Let me go further, and assure you that the South cannot be forced into another outbreak. The southern people are loyal."

"You will also perhaps remember the report of the seizure of a boat laden with cotton on the Tombigbee river, which was charged to the account of guerrillas. Having been in the vicinity, I am enabled to state authoritatively that politics had nothing to do with the affair. The fact was that the party was a combination of northern and southern men to steal on a grand scale. It was simply the culmination of a grand system of cotton stealing in which Union officials had participated."

"I have personally known of cases of vagabonds from the North arrested by State laws for actual crimes, yet appealed to and received military protection on the false plea of persecution because of northern sentiments! Because a landlord would not allow a black man to eat at his table with his white guests, his hotel was closed by an officer."

"But not to be too lengthy, I assure you, sir, that this terrific public opinion that is driving the North to the support of the startling and dangerous centralization of power in Congress is based upon falsehood and misrepresentation."

"As I expect to be judged by my Maker at the great day of final judgment, I state to you solemnly that from extensive travels in these States, from conversations with all classes and colors, and after listening to hundreds, I believe before high Heaven that all these newspaper reports of hatred to and outrages upon blacks by whites and of the molestations of northern settlers are baseless, wicked fabrications, concocted and reported expressly to create this fearful public opinion which should sustain the change of the fundamental principles of the Constitution, devised by our forefathers with a wisdom and foresight they themselves scarcely comprehend."

Mr. President, the reports of General Grant, the reports of General Sherman, the reports of General Steedman, the reports of those men who have been sent as agents, traveling throughout the South in all its length and breadth, speak in very much the same character of the mass of the people of the South. There are exceptions, it is true. There is anarchy in some places. Bad men, wicked men, drunken men may engage here and there in riots and in oppression, but the great mass of the people of the South this day accept the terms which we laid down in the platform of 1864; that is, "unconditional surrender to the Constitution and laws of the United States." They have gone further, they have adopted the amendment to the Constitution of the United States forever abolishing slavery, and putting it out of the power of any State to establish slavery forever. They have done all that we demanded in the platform of 1864. More than that, sir, under the advice of Mr. Johnson, as President, while they were reorganizing their governments, they went further; they repudiated the rebel debt by their constitutions. They accepted the situation, accepted it in good faith.

I undertake to say, therefore, Mr. President, that all this war which has been waged upon Mr. Johnson and his policy since the present Congress began its session has been a war without cause. He has stood upon the policy of his predecessor on the points to which I have referred. He has stood upon the platform of 1864. I carry the war into Africa, and I say you are the men that are betraying your party and your creed in making these charges against Mr. Johnson and his policy.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish the Senator would carry Africa to the war.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not precisely understand the force of that great witticism of my friend from Massachusetts, but I presume it is all right.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says he wishes to carry the war into Africa. I merely wish that he would carry Africa into the war.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I have said nothing in relation to the resolutions of Wisconsin to-day. As I have stated, on some occasion I purpose to take up those resolutions to discuss them so far as they have bearings upon me personally; and when the question goes home to the people of Wisconsin, I shall look with confidence to their decision. I know that the convention of the Union party of Wisconsin last fall unanimously resolved in favor of the resolutions submitted by me in that convention, one of which was that the doctrine that these States are out of the Union is absolutely false and unfounded, and that there is not a sane man to be found North or South who will advocate that doctrine. That was one of the resolutions of the Union party of Wisconsin. They are sustained, and sustained even by the action of the reconstruction committee, for they abandon this idea that they are States out of the Union, recognize them as States in the Union to which they propose to submit some constitutional amendments for their ratification, recognizing them as States, organized as States, with the power of States to give or to withhold their consent from constitutional amendments.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No; I do not propose to be interrupted now, as I am nearly through, and the Senator can then take his time.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator does not understand me. I do not wish to interrupt him; I was about to ask him whether he desired to finish to-night, and if not, I would move to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is too late to consider executive business to-day, and I am willing to come at once to the close of my speech if we can come to a vote. If the Senate is ready to vote I will sit down now. ["No, no."]

Mr. CONNESS. My purpose was not to interrupt the Senator at all.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, my friends will find, when they come to deal with me on this question, that I am neither to be driven from the doctrines of the Union party because they attack me and charge me with treason, nor am I to be driven from the doctrines and the platforms of that party because the Democracy now resolve in favor of the same doctrines and the same platform. I am neither frightened by the one nor by the other.

I have stood in the midst of rising and dissolving parties. I have been at their birth and at their funeral; and these charges which are made here upon me of desertion of party are as the idle wind when I stand by the principles of the Constitution and those great principles to which during my life I have been devoted; and what I say of myself I can say with a great deal more force of him who is the subject of continual denunciation in both Houses of Congress. I refer to the President of the United States; a man who acts from conviction, in my judgment; with whom his belief that a thing is right or a thing is wrong, that a thing is constitutional or a thing is unconstitutional, is like a religion. He will stand upon his belief, though you may take him to the scaffold or the cross. That is the kind of material that he is made of, and I thank God for it.

Mr. President, the pending amendment is based upon the idea of an attack upon the President of the United States. It means that; it means nothing else. It grows out of a fear that the present Executive will exercise the same power which every Executive has exercised from the beginning of the Government. It is not founded on principle. It is founded on a fear that is unfit, in my judgment, to control the minds of statesmen in a great crisis. It is based upon the idea of attacking the President, attacking his administration, of throwing around this Executive some kind of cords or leashes that have never been thrown around any others. That is the way it originates. It is unjust toward the President. It is not warranted by anything that he has done, and it is what we ought not to enter upon or suffer ourselves to be drawn into.

Mr. NYE. The question before the Senate, if my memory serves me, is on an amendment to a bill making appropriations for the Post Office Department. I think that a stranger, who had not been present at the time the amendment was introduced and discussed, would be at a loss to determine what the question under consideration was for the last two days. As was suggested by my friend from Oregon, [Mr. NESMITH,] most of the gentlemen engaged in the debate have got so far from the post office that it will trouble them to get their mails. [Laughter.]

As to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] I have no particular anxiety, and certainly no fears. It is a question that I am ready to vote upon. I am in favor of the amendment, because I have always believed since I have been able to reflect upon the question that the power of absolute removal and appointment should be limited. I have no particular fears, and I mention this to quiet the nerves of my apparently agitated friend from Wisconsin, that the present President would abuse this function. I do not believe that the simple removal or appointment of an officer gives much additional strength to him, but I know from sad experience that it brings a horde of additional weaknesses.

I would not occupy a moment in this debate after it has been so long protracted were it not for the fact that I have been an ardent and earnest supporter of the Union party of this nation. I was born into the party that begot it, as early as the distinguished champion of all the Presidents, the Senator from Wisconsin. I entered this list in 1848, and the Senator from Wisconsin was with me in that early struggle.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I will state that I drew up in the convention at Syracuse, New York, and introduced the "corner-stone" on which the Free-soil organization of 1848 was founded.

Mr. NYE. It is quite likely that the Senator drew it, as he is the author of most good things, in his own judgment. Whoever drew it, or whoever introduced it, I believed it then and have ever since. As the Senator has drawn me into this point, he will pardon me for saying that there was a period when he slipped a little off the "corner-stone," in the State of Wisconsin, and was elected by the Democratic party a judge in that State.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to say to the gentleman that the Democratic party in the State of Wisconsin had adopted that corner-stone resolution as a part of its creed.

Mr. NYE. Quite likely, and it has not adhered to it much longer than the gentleman did. When I read that, knowing he was the author of the corner-stone, I asked myself the question that was asked Peter when the Saviour came from the garden and found him off guard, whether he could not watch with me one hour.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have watched almost twenty years for this, and fought for the victory, too.

Mr. NYE. I understand perfectly well the history and origin of the Union party, and its faithful servants. I say I should not have been drawn into this discussion now were it not for the sensitiveness that I feel in regard to the honor of that party. Sir, since the formation of parties in this country there has been no party, and there never will be another, that has crowned itself with as unfading glory as the Union party of this nation. I admire all of its adherents, and the Senate will bear me witness that in the heat of all this debate I have not uttered one word prejudicial to the integrity, honor, or loyalty of the distinguished gentleman of whom my friend from Wisconsin appears to be the special guardian. I am going to watch, and while I watch I shall not forget to pray that he never may be guilty of that unpardonable error, that one unpardonable sin of bringing a wound or a stain upon the character of that party that has elevated him to the proudest position on earth. I am going to watch, not without anxiety, to see who brings the first wound upon this party that has saved the nation, and has given to the world a lively demonstration of the word that my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania said he had been looking for, liberty.

Having forgotten the principle he had forgotten also the name, [laughter,] and I was glad that he read an anti-slavery paper to find the word that he had been so long looking for, liberty. To him it was lost. I advise him to consult more the anti-slavery papers to refresh his memory upon the principles on which he was sent to this Senate.

Mr. President, it seems to be the especial charge of the Senator from Wisconsin to defend the President. One year ago last February I came into this august body, and the first speech I listened to was a speech from my distinguished friend defending Mr. Lincoln; the last one I have listened to is defending Mr. Johnson; and if the angel of death should spread his wings over the White House to-night and another

President were to come in to-morrow, I suppose the first speech we should hear after that sad event would be one in defense of the incoming or the in-come President.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly, if he was right and was attacked.

Mr. NYE. I do not need any indorser.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And I should defend the Senator from Nevada if he were unjustly attacked.

Mr. NYE. Thank you for that. Sir, there is something the matter, or my friends from Pennsylvania and from Wisconsin would not be so nervous. There is some parting of old ties; there is something in the breeze that they snuff; there is something in the signs of the times that agitates them, for my oracular friend from Pennsylvania is never moved by usual breezes. As his colleague said, he was elevated above the breezes of the earth and shook the flag of some department here so high that the winds did not affect it. [Laughter.] Then, sir, it becomes us to inquire what is the matter. I have heard it rumored that the President was not acting in consonance with Congress. I presume that same rumor has reached the ears of his two distinguished champions here, or they would not be so ready in his defense. If that be true, what is the reason? What has Congress done? Over and over again I have heard it reiterated—and my distinguished colleague chimed in beautifully the other day with that—that Congress had done nothing. Then the sin of Congress is the sin of omission, not of commission.

Now, I wish to ask my distinguished friend from Wisconsin a question. Did he expect, when this country was turned upside down, when it was upheaved in every part, that it would be quieted and settled by the word either of Congress or the President? When it has been tossed on the stormy billows of a tempestuous sea for four years, and when the storm that woke those billows had been gathering for thirty years or more, did my distinguished friend, who boasts so much of his faith, ever believe he could step forth upon those troubled waters and with a word speak peace and quiet to an upheaved continent? If his faith leads him up to that point, mine never has so led me. I have expected that long months and perhaps long years would be necessary to heal and cicatrize the wounds that this wicked rebellion imposed upon us; and whoever has dreamed that "my policy" or yours was to calm the troubled waters in a day has dreamed of a thing as impossible as for the Senator from Wisconsin to speak a word into existence.

Peace, said the distinguished Senator, is what the country wants and demands. Sir, peace, with all her beauties, was what we had when this wicked storm was evoked by spirits as devilish as they who heated the furnace seven times hot through which Meshach, Shadrach, and Abed-nego passed. They lighted the lurid torch of war. Were the Republicans to blame for that? My distinguished friend says, and no doubt truly, that he had the honor of making the first speech for the congressional amendment, though I have searched the Globe carefully and cannot find it; the index does not give it; but I ask him, had he any part in evoking this war? No. Had the Republican or Union party any part in it? No. They walked steadily forward in the pathway of constitutional right and elected a President in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. I had labored with my friend from 1848 to produce that result, and often have I heard his eloquent notes—and when I say they were out in their full force anybody who was not within hearing it was not worth while to summon, for he was not within the jurisdiction of the court [laughter]—loud, sonorous, long, showing the wicked iniquity of the slaveholders, predicting with prophetic certainty precisely what would occur, that in the end if they would not listen to the charmer it would result in bloody war.

Sir, that war has come, by no aid, by no part taken by the Union party of this country. Who did do it? The rebels. My friend undertakes to show from the Baltimore platform that when they had complied with a certain condition which he read, the war should be over. Sir, a platform is a kind of constitution for a party; it never goes into special enactments. I do not suppose that the Baltimore platform any more than the Chicago platform—if it is proper to use that expression now—attempted to settle the details and point out the manner in which this controversy should be settled.

And right here, sir, let me say, that my friend, in order to a successful defense of the present Executive, deems it important over and over again in this body to show that he is treading in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor. Once for all I wish to say that Mr. Lincoln had no policy upon the reconstruction of these States based upon the condition of things when we mourned his untimely taking off. He had tried the Louisiana policy of one tenth of loyal men, and the result demonstrated that the policy of allowing one out of ten to govern a State was a fallacy. He was honest at the time in attempting to gather in from this wild waste of States some one that was loyal and would come back. The effort was laudable and commendable, but it failed. Beyond that, I assert, from the nature of things, that Mr. Lincoln had no policy. The shouts of rejoicing had not yet died away; this nation was literally intoxicated with joy over the surrender of the wicked foe; and while we were in the midst of this rejoicing, even his self-poisoned mind was incapable of framing and had not time to frame a policy upon the condition of things at the period of that surrender.

Sir, if I had any fault to find with the President, whom the Senator has so ably defended, it would be this: that having started out to establish what he called in his message an experiment, it has now become a settled policy, and whoever differs from that policy is alien from him and from the Union party. I have never come to the conclusion that all of the head or heart of the Union party was in one man. I have never had an aspiration to imagine how I would feel if I were President; but it seems to me that if I were, I should come here to this Chamber and to the other end of the Capitol, or send for them to come to me, the selected representatives of a great party, and see what it was best to do under the circumstances. I can pick twenty men in this circle who are not inferior in intelligence or less earnest or honest in their convictions than the President of the United States. I can point out twenty men in this circle who have kept their fingers upon every position of the Union party from the time it was born until it was victorious—men that have watched it and its interests while the present Chief Magistrate of this nation was denouncing its organization. I make no war with him on that subject. I thank God that if he is born again, it was not to oppose but to share in its glories; but above all men on this earth, he should be the last to tarnish its luster or weaken its power. I do not say that he is going to do it, but there are a few suspicious circumstances.

My friend from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY]—and I know he will pardon me for alluding to him—but a few months ago was hurling all manner of anathemas at Mr. Lincoln, and in doing so he honestly conceived that he was right. What has put a new song in his mouth when your President and mine is pursuing exactly Lincoln's policy? The moment that I make rebels feel good with any political action of mine—and I have no reference to my friend from Delaware—I shall think that I have done something wrong.

Sir, the day has not arrived when the chief executive officer of this nation constitutes the nation. I read in my younger days, with some satisfaction, that the Congress of the United States was the breathing, vital, living power of this nation, that spoke laws into existence and blotted them out; that it was a selection as well chosen in other States as in Wisconsin, where their ablest men were selected to come here—for what? To do as the President tells you, so help you God? No, sir; I never took any such oath, and do not intend to do so; but to come here and frame such laws as the interests of the hour demand.

Now, suppose this question before it had been agitated here at all had been put to the plain, simple people who sent us here, and the question had been asked of them, where is the power that is to rebuild these waste places and heal these breaches that have been made? In their simplicity they would have answered, "The power lies in the law-making authority, in the Congress of the United States." They have no more respect for a President's policy than they have for the Senator from Wisconsin's policy—both ardent, both devoted, both faithful. The Senator has declared his policy. His people reject it. All I ever want, in order to find out what the judgment of the people is upon any question, is to get a dozen men together in a neighborhood and talk to them, and they will tell you what the judgment of the whole community is. There were more than a hundred men congregated in the Legislature of Wisconsin, and their deliberate judgment is, by a resolution that they passed, that the Senator does not represent the wishes of the people of that State. If that be true of the Senator from Wisconsin, it is certainly true as to regards the policy of the President of the United States, for their policy is identical. Be it true or false, I think there is a propriety in consulting this body in regard to this great question.

Sir, there is scarcely a man within this circle but wears the outward badge of mourning for victims immolated upon the altar of this accursed rebellion; and the signs of outward woe are but a faint representation of the more indescribable and heartfelt sorrow within. It seems to me that the signs of the times and the exigencies demand that no man should rear a policy not subject to amendment, not subject to consultation with others, and make it like the bed of Procrustes, of a certain length and certain width, upon which all must lie, or fall under the ban of executive power. I do not know how others may feel, but I should not dare to go back to my mountain people and tell them I had been mute here when I saw such an attempt made.

Sir, neither the Senator from Wisconsin, nor the Senator from Pennsylvania, nor any man with brains, has a right to complain of the tardiness of Congress. Rebellion in its worst and most aggravated form has shaken the very pillars of our institutions to their base. I tell the Senator from Wisconsin now, and he will find it to be the truth, that the frosts of ten more winters will gather upon his brow ere this chasm is healed and perfected and closed. "Take back the States." Certainly we will. When? Just as soon as it is safe to take them back. Does the Senator from Wisconsin, the advocate of the policy of the lamented Lincoln, mean to tell us that his policy was to take back unwashed, red-handed rebels into the power of this Government? He shakes his head. He dare not say it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will say to the honorable Senator that neither Mr. Lincoln nor Mr. Johnson—

Mr. NYE. Do not be too fast. I would have excused you if you said no. I will come right along to Mr. Johnson in a moment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to say in relation to that point, if the Senator does not wish to misrepresent me, as the charge has been made again and again that I am for the admission of rebels, that it is not so. All I claim is that the loyal representatives from these States shall be admitted.

Mr. NYE. Sir, who are rebels?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I say the men who come here who are loyal, who can take the oath prescribed by law, should be admitted.

Mr. NYE. Will the Senator from Wisconsin answer me one question: who are rebels?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator desires an answer I will give it.

Mr. NYE. Yes, sir, I do.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Rebels, as a matter of course, are those who have adhered to this rebellion against the Government of the United States.

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator for his definition. Then they are all rebels. That is just what I was going to assert, and it will have a double force indorsed as it now is. They being rebels, give me the evidence of their repentance. What is that evidence? Not a paper comes from the South, and not one of these pilgrims here who are seeking to get the evidence in their pockets to enable them to enroll their names upon the muster-roll of American infamy, but is as loud-mouthed as the Senator from Wisconsin in denouncing the action of Congress. They do not return as the prodigal son returned, and say to this nation, "I have sinned against thee and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son; let me be as one of thy servants." They come up here in the same spirit that they left. They demand that the doors of the Senate of the United States shall be thrown open to them, and the seats newly cushioned, as a reward for their infamy, their treachery, and their indescribable cruelty.

Sir, I am not to be driven from the honest discharge of my duty here by an appeal to any man's policy. My people commissioned me to come here to guard against a repetition of this wicked rebellion, and though the moon may twelve times fill her horn before it can be done, yet faithfully will I sit here and guard the very portals of the temple against the admission of men who only await another opportunity, by adopting another set of tactics, to hurl this temple of liberty and freedom down. Sir, it is little more than a year since Lee's army surrendered. If I had been going to adopt a policy, I would have hung some rebels first before I granted one pardon. Would not you? [To Mr. DOOLITTLE.] Upon that point, and to show exactly what the now President of the United States thought of the Baltimore platform and its duties, I desire to read an extract from the speech that he made at Nashville accepting that nomination. After the eulogy that the distinguished Senator passed upon the talent and honesty of the President, I trust he will not undertake to say now that the President did not understand that platform as well as he does. He said:

"And let me say that now is the time to secure these fundamental principles while the land is rent with anarchy and upheaves with the throes of a mighty revolution. While society is in this disordered state and we are seeking security, let us fix the foundation of the Government on principles of eternal justice which will endure for all time."

I join the distinguished President in that sentiment; and that is the labor of this Congress, to fix these principles upon a basis of eternal justice that shall abide for all time. Does the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin mean to assert here that the principles of eternal justice would be subverted by permitting the men whose hands are red with the destruction of this Government to come back here to legislate?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly not. I have said a hundred times over that only loyal men should be admitted.

Mr. NYE. I am very happy to hear that the Senator agrees with me, and if he will keep agreeing with me I will get him right after awhile.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will say to my honorable friend that as far as Mr. Johnson has spoken, to my knowledge, he has never intimated that one of these rebels should be admitted here. The charge is unfounded.

Mr. NYE. I am happy, then, to agree with the President of the United States and his distinguished indorser. Hearken a little further. Again he says:

"But in calling a convention to restore the State, who shall restore and reestablish it? Shall the man who gave his influence and his means to destroy the Government? Is he to participate in the great work of reorganization?"

Right there I want to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the attitude of things now. I assert that none others have attempted to form a State government except the men who come within this description, who, the President says, should not share in it. That being the case, what does he mean when he talks to us about passing laws here for States that are without representation when they are taxed? Does the Senator mean that in order to impose taxation upon these rebels they must necessarily have rebel representatives here? Who ever heard of a criminal sitting on his own jury? These men have been engaged with the strong hand of arms in tearing down this temple of freedom and of liberty, and who ever heard of rebels being consulted about the way the temple should be built up that they had attempted to destroy? Sir, the whole thing is in such confusion that I can see through it. I agree with the President that none of these men should be here; but who come here?

Mr. CONNESS. Worse than that; who send them here?

Mr. NYE. Who come here? I am something of a Yankee myself, and you judge the package by the sample article outside; and as a sample of one of these reconstructed States comes this lean, lank, cadaverous Cassius-looking Stephens, [laughter,] who has got treason in every liniment of his face, and never laughs. Who sent him? Loyal men, do you think? Was he, the second in command of this most wicked rebellion, sent here by loyal men? Sir,

"Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud,
Without our special wonder?"

O consistency, what a jewel! Alexander H. Stephens as a sample article for loyalty! He believes, as he swears now, in that mother and parent of secession, the doctrine that my friend has become the distinguished champion of—State rights. I had hoped that that ghost had disappeared with the rebellion. He swears that he believed, and his people believed, and believe now, in the right of the States to secede; and yet the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin comes here and tells us that they accept the issue, and reads a letter from Tarbell, whom I have known longer than he has, from Smithfield, Chenango county, and whose judgment is not worth as much as the Senator's. Tarbell against Stephens! Tarbell must go down, of course, for Stephens is the honored representative of a loyal State!

But again, sir, treason is odious and must be punished. Will the Senator from Wisconsin tell me how he proposes to punish it?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will, if the Senator will allow me to answer.

Mr. NYE. Certainly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Sir, six months ago I introduced a bill, which I had hoped long ere this would have been a law, providing for the obtaining of juries in criminal cases in United States courts, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and has been reported by them, but has not been acted upon—a bill which provides that when jurors are summoned by the courts they shall not be declared incompetent by reason of opinions formed upon history or newspaper reports. I will state to the Senator another thing on that point. The Supreme Court holds that a civilian or a man not in the Army cannot be tried by a military commission.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not understand the decision to go so far.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The decision goes to just that length. We have got to try them in court and by a jury; and so far as the President is concerned, the published documents which we have seen show that he has made an effort to have a court held where Davis could be tried for treason.

Mr. NYE. That answers the question; and the bill that the Senator introduced was in fact supplemental to aid in their being acquitted if they were tried. I read that bill with some care. Will you go down to Virginia and find twelve men who did not sympathize with this rebellion, and who would take the oath and say they were not prejudiced by these newspaper opinions? Not at all. Their minds are made up that no crime has been committed. Sir, somebody has been at fault; treason has not been made odious; or we must acknowledge the infirmity of our Constitution and laws to punish treason. There is not a hamlet in the State of the Senator but what demands that treason shall be made odious.

But, sir, the delay in passing the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin has about done away with the necessity for its application, because they are almost all pardoned, and those who are not are being pardoned every day. The men who have saved their twenty thousand dollars out of the general wreck, and given the balance of their fortune to tear down this Republic are, as we learn from every day's report, and in every newspaper, receiving executive pardons. The clerk told me the other day there were three hundred thousand applications for pardons, and if you take three hundred thousand of these twenty thousand dollar men that are left, you need not trouble yourselves much about the balance.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will ask the Senator how many, in his judgment, ought to be tried and executed.

Mr. NYE. I shall be entirely satisfied, under the present circumstances, if you try one.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then let us pass that bill, so that we can have a jury, and no difficulty in trying a man in any State.

Mr. NYE. Does the Senator from Wisconsin mean to stand here and say that it needs the passage of a bill or any new law to convict a rebel that has declared himself one in this country—an ex post facto law, that the gentleman or his coadjutor has talked so wisely about to-day?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator will allow me on that point, this bill is simply in relation to the qualification of jurors; it is not an ex post facto law, and not liable to any objection of that sort.

Mr. NYE. And I repeat, it is a bill to aid in their acquittal.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is not true.

Mr. NYE. I say in its effect. I do not say you intend it, by any means.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It has no such effect, either. If the Senate and House of Representatives will pass it, there will be an opportunity to see whether a man can be tried.

Mr. NYE. There is where the Senator from Wisconsin—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. These charges—

Mr. NYE. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but this conversation seems to be going around.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I call the Senator to order.

Mr. NYE. I have a right to say that in my judgment that bill, if it should pass, while I charge no such intention upon its author, would be a bill that ought to be entitled "A bill supplemental to aid in the acquittal of traitors." I assert a thing that cannot be gainsaid. There has not been any efficient effort to make treason odious. Has there? Where is C. C. Clay to-day—a man who was charged, and it was reported upon proof ample to hold him, as a particeps criminis in the assassination of Lincoln—a name that I need only mention when an army of associations cluster around him that I cannot describe. Where is Clay? Paroled; which means discharged. Where is Davis? Pro forma, in prison; visited by the officers of this Government; with family associations all clustering around him; and let me inform the Senator from Wisconsin, he, too, will be paroled before he is tried. Where is the attempt at the fulfillment of that guarantee that treason should be made odious?

Mr. President, I do not want blood; I am a man of peace; and I believe I have as much of the welling up of humanity in me as the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin. I never saw a man in trouble but I sympathized with him. But, sir, above all these sympathies here is reared a standard of eternal justice. I called upon the President this morning, with a friend from central New York, to ask him to pardon a man who had served out a part of his time for passing two fifty-cent counterfeit currency pieces. He was not pardoned when I left. Whether he will be or not I do not know. But where is the justice of that Government, where slumbers its sense of justice, that would incarcerate a poor man for passing one dollar's worth of its coin that is counterfeit, and sets these men whose skirts drip with loyal blood at large? Away with such an administration of justice! It is an outrage upon the sacred name of justice.

Sir, treason has not been made odious, nor will it be. Is treason made odious when right under the very guns of our Army, in a captured city, the city of Mobile, toasts are drunk to the pirate Semmes—let it not be said that I call him a hard name; it is the name designated by the law; the name written in heaven and on earth—and the President of the United States in the same sentence or at the same sitting? There is not a traitor on the face of the earth but would court such odium as that.

But let me call the attention of the Senate to another thing. In this city to-day walk men who have trod the fiery furnace of affliction as Union men from 1861 until the rebels laid down their arms at Richmond. They are starving, begging for employment, while men who were baptized early into this rebellion and who have been engaged in it throughout are holding offices of power and emolument in this country. We are told that Union men cannot be found to fill them. Let me tell the Senator from Wisconsin and those who say that, I can find you one hundred thousand maimed soldiers of this Republic who will go there and fill those offices with honor to themselves and fidelity to the Government. Why look for jewels in a toad's head? Why look for men fit to hold offices among those who are yet reeking in the very smoke of the rebellion, and whose only regret is that they failed in the attempt? That is not making treason odious. That kind of odium breaks down the amenities of society and makes Union men seek shelter in the caves and the recesses of the mountains.

My distinguished friend from Wisconsin has pointed forward to the day when he shall meet his people in judgment on this question, boasting in his own strength. Let me tell the Senator that there is a more potent power than the human voice, a more pungent teacher than stump speakers; and it is the irresistible and resistless power of truth. It finds a lodgment in every hamlet, around every hearth-stone, and in every heart. Let no man hereafter presume to trifle with the just demands of the American people. They bring judgment to the question. They are hewing their way through the difficulties that surround us, and the men who do not hew with them, they will hew down.

Sir, we have been educated in the deepest and bloodiest calamity. Every hearth-stone has a tongue, more eloquent than senatorial tongue, that tells a story of the outrages and the wrongs of this rebellion. Everywhere the people cry out against the "deep damnation of the taking off" of the immortal Lincoln. Everywhere they demand that their servants shall step to the music of the necessity of the hour. He that falls back will be a straggler and lost. Sir, the party is not behind; the Union party is going to meet it; it is the party that is in the advance.

My distinguished friend from Delaware the other day said he rejoiced the time had come when the Democratic party could hang out their banners upon the outer wall. That is what ails you. You hang them out, and the people look for the old stars and stripes and do not see them. They see too many stars and bars. Keep your banners in if you want to win, for the moment you hang them out upon the outer wall, it is an advertisement to the world that there is danger of the devil's return to rule. [Laughter.] Keep your banners in.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator will give way, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon that I should like to have a division of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Nevada has not closed, I understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I desire to know whether the Senate wish to continue this debate.

Several SENATORS. It is half past five o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know it is time to adjourn, but I wish to know whether the Senate desire to continue this debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. As I see my friends are in favor of continuing this debate, I shall not persist in opposition.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 9, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Professor B. N. MARTIN, of New York.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

GRADE OF VICE ADMIRAL.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Yesterday morning I asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill to amend an act to establish the grade of vice admiral in the United States Navy.

The object of the bill is to give to Vice Admiral Farragut a secretary. I wish to say now to the House that this eminent and conspicuous officer of the Navy has no assistance whatever in the discharge of his duties. The law allows him no staff, and all the burdens incident to his position are cast upon him individually. And although still in the vigor of health, his eye-sight has become very much impaired by the service through which he has passed, and as his correspondence devolves entirely upon himself, it is absolutely necessary that he should have this assistance. I am certain that no gentleman will object to it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] objected to the bill yesterday under a misapprehension of its object, and he has consented to withdraw his objection. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the bill.

No objection was made, and the bill was received and read a first and second time.

The bill proposes to allow Vice Admiral Farragut a secretary with the rank and sea pay and allowances of a lieutenant of the Navy.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PASSPORTS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to repeal section twenty-three of chapter seventy-nine of the act of the third session of the Thirty-Seventh Congress relating to passports; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In relation to this subject I have received the following note from the Secretary of State:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.
WASHINGTON, April 25, 1866.

SIR: I beg leave to call your attention to an act third session Thirty-Seventh Congress, chapter seventy-nine, approved March 3, 1863, relative to the granting of passports "to any class of persons liable to military duty in the United States." As it was strictly a war measure, and the cause for which it was enacted has ceased to exist, I would suggest that it be repealed.

I am, sir, your obedient servant.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Hon. JAMES F. WILSON, Chairman Judiciary Committee, House of Representatives.

The section which it is proposed to repeal is as follows:

"Sec. 23. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act approved the 18th of August, 1863, entitled, 'An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular system of the United States,' as prohibits the granting of passports to any other than citizens of the United States, shall be, and is hereby, repealed so far as its prohibition may embrace any class of persons liable to military duty by the laws of the United States."

I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the regular order of business.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, reported from the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion to recommit the joint resolution had been made by Mr. STEVENS.

The pending question was upon the motion of Mr. GARFIELD to amend the motion to recommit by adding instructions to the committee to report the proposed amendment to the Constitution with the third section stricken out.

Upon this question Mr. SMITH was entitled to the floor for one minute; but he was not present.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, it was to be expected that the measure now before the House would meet the opposition and denunciation of the unrepentant thirty-three of this body. The gentlemen who have voted on all occasions upon the rebel side of all questions that have been before the country for six years could hardly be expected to change their position at this time.

Mr. ROSS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROOMALL. Allow me at once to say that I have but thirty minutes, and will not yield any of my time to anybody.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that it was not to be expected that those gentlemen would change their front upon short notice at this late day. But it is useless to waste arguments upon them in favor of this measure.

It was also to be expected that the six Johnsonian new converts to Democracy would also oppose and vote against this measure; commencing with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND], who, I believe, has the disease in the most virulent form, thence down to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH], who preceded me on this question, and who has the mildest and most amiable type of the infection. Upon them, too, arguments are useless.

There must then be thirty-nine votes against the measure, and I want there to be no more. I want every member of this House outside of those thirty-nine to vote for it heartily and earnestly. I want every man to come to the conclusion to which I have come, to vote, if not for that which he wants, for the best that he can get; to vote for the report of the committee if he can get it, just as he would have voted for something better; and if he cannot get the measure reported, then to vote for the next best.

It is not what I wanted. How far short of it! But the necessity is urgent, and we must take what will obtain the votes of two thirds of both Houses of Congress, and the ratification of three fourths of the actual States of this Union, those entitled to a voice upon the question.

Now, what is this that is submitted for our action? I will consider the several propositions briefly: I am only sorry that I am limited to so short a space of time. We propose, first, to give power to the Government of the United States to protect its own citizens within the States, within its own jurisdiction. Who will deny the necessity of this? No one. The fact that all who will vote for the pending measure, or whose votes are asked for it, voted for this proposition in another shape, in the civil rights bill, shows that it will meet the favor of the House. It may be asked, why should we put a provision in the Constitution which is already contained in an act of Congress? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] may answer this question. He says the act is unconstitutional. Now, I have the highest respect for his opinions as a lawyer, and for his integrity as a man, and while I differ from him upon the law, yet it is not with that certainty of being right that would justify me in refusing to place the power to enact the law unmistakably in the Constitution. On so vital a point I wish to make assurance doubly sure.

I know that the unrepentant Democracy of this body voted against the civil rights bill upon the allegation that it was unconstitutional. And I rather expect to see them exhibit their usual consistency by voting against making it constitutional upon the ground that it is so already.

That measure, however, will meet with no opposition from those on whom the country depends for its safety, because if it is not necessary it is at least harmless. If we are already safe with the civil rights bill, it will do no harm to become the more effectually so, and to prevent a mere majority from repealing the law and thus thwarting the will of the loyal people.

The second proposition is, in short, to limit the representation of the several States as those States themselves shall limit suffrage. That measure has already received the sanction of all who can possibly be expected to vote for the proposition now before the House; because the joint resolution which passed this body by more than two thirds, and was defeated in the Senate, proposed to submit a similar change in the Constitution to the States for ratification. There is, therefore, little necessity for argument upon this point.

But I will ask, why should not the representation of the States be limited as the States themselves limit suffrage? It is said that this is intended to prevent the southern States from having the representation now based upon their black and non-voting population. The terms of the proposed measure do not so limit it. But I will admit that mainly it will operate only on that population, and in the South. And why not? If the negroes of the South are not to be counted as a political element in the government of the South in the States, why should they be counted as a political element in the government of the country in the Union? If they are not to be counted as against the southern people themselves, why should they be counted as against us? The fact is, the negro of the South does vote, or rather he has his vote cast for him. He is voted by his white and hardly more loyal neighbor—I would say brother only that I might be suspected of having some reference to the Democratic bleaching process which so confuses southern genealogies.

If the blacks were permitted to vote instead of being voted, according to the doctrine of chances they would vote right half the times by mere guessing, be they ever so ignorant; and this is greatly more than can be said of their white neighbors for the last half dozen years. I will not say that this is more than can be said of the northern friends of those neighbors for the same period; but I will not risk my reputation for veracity by denying the proposition.

The next proposition proposes to disfranchise until 1870 a certain portion of the southern people. Now, I am sorry to see that opposition to this feature of the measure comes from this side of the House. I regretted very much yesterday to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] oppose this feature of the joint resolution. I am sure they have not well considered it. Let us see who it is we propose to deprive of suffrage until 1870, and to what extent.

First, we do not propose to do what was done at the close of the Revolution, to disfranchise throughout all time to come the active and willing participants in the mischief, but only until the year 1870, only for the next four years. Again, we do not propose to deprive all the voters of the South of the privilege of voting, but only the willing aiders and abettors.

Look at the words of the proposition:

All persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort.

Now, who are they, and how many are there of that class? This is an important inquiry. It has been said broadly, with the air of sincerity, and as if it were susceptible of being demonstrated, that these people number nine tenths of all the voters of the South. This is a grand mistake. The white population of the eleven States not now represented in the Government was in 1860 five million six hundred thousand in round numbers. Counting the voters as one fifth—and that is about the ordinary ratio of voters to population—we have one million one hundred and twenty thousand voters in those eleven States. Do we propose to disfranchise all these? Do we propose to disfranchise nine tenths of them, as has been said here? By no means.

According to the best estimates that can be made upon the subject—and all are mere estimates, for we are without the means of obtaining accurate information—there were altogether in the southern army about eight hundred thousand men. How many of them were negroes I do not know. I know that the southern Democrats at first entertained the notion of their northern friends, that the negro would not do for a soldier, but after several years of conscription and draft, both wings of the party began to think he would. Toward the close of the rebellion the South commenced to muster the negro into the service. Suppose there were fifty thousand of them—it is true that is but a guess, there may have been twice as many or half as many—this would leave seven hundred and fifty thousand white men actually participating in the rebellion in the field.

Now, let us bear in mind that the masses of the people in the South rendered aid and comfort to the rebellion only in the field. The great leaders of the Democracy rendered, it is true, aid and comfort in various other ways. But they constituted the few. I speak of the masses of the people only; and I repeat that they rendered aid and comfort, within the meaning of this provision, in the field only. We may therefore take seven hundred and fifty thousand as the number of the individuals in the South who rendered aid and comfort to the enemy, not counting (because the number is so inconsiderable) the comparatively few though powerful leaders who rendered aid and comfort outside of the army.

But, sir, we do not propose to disfranchise even these seven hundred and fifty thousand. Some of them were killed; how many we do not know. We do know that our own dead numbered nearly three hundred thousand; and we have every reason to believe the confederacy suffered to the same extent that we did in that matter. Supposing two hundred and fifty thousand of the rebel army were lost, we have five hundred thousand actual voters in the South to be disfranchised by this measure if they come within the meaning of it. But do they come within the meaning of this provision? Why, sir, it does not embrace the unwilling conscripts; it does not embrace the men who were compelled to serve in the army. How many were there of these? I do not know; but I do know that after the first few months in the war of the rebellion the southern people refused to volunteer, and were required to be forced into the army. How many were there of these so forced? If I were allowed to guess, I would say very nearly all. At least it would be fair to say three hundred thousand of these people belonged to the unwilling class who were forced into the army by rigid conscription laws and the various contrivances of the leading rebels. This will leave two hundred thousand; and I say now it is utterly impossible, in my opinion, that the number of people in the South who can be operated upon by this provision should exceed two hundred thousand, if, indeed, it should reach the one half of that number. Is this nine tenths of the voters of the South? Why, it is about one in every twelve.

I am just reminded by my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] that the report of the committee shows us that these eleven States furnished forty-two thousand soldiers to the Union Army. I suppose no one on this side the House will pretend that the pending measure will disfranchise them, whatever may be the desire on the other side. These men can take the "test oath." Why can they not fill Federal offices in the South?

It is looked upon, Mr. Speaker, as a monstrous piece of tyranny that we should ask one out of twelve of the voters to stand aside for four years, to take a back seat, in the classic language of the White House, as a part expiation—if the word is not itself a mockery used in that connection—in part expiation of so enormous a crime. Let it be understood that we do not propose to disfranchise these people for State purposes. They are allowed their own local government, if the people of the States will permit them to vote. They will only not be allowed to control this Government, and they ought not to be allowed to control it. So far as we are concerned, we give them local government to the fullest extent to which we have it ourselves. It is known to every gentleman in this Hall that by far the largest portion of the business of government is done in the States. With respect to this largest portion, we leave it to these States to grant or refuse suffrage, without regard to the condition, the opinions, or the crimes of those claiming it. So much for that.

Now, I know we have it from high authority that in all the southern country there are not enough of men who can take the oath prescribed by the law to hold the Federal offices. I know that is asserted, but I have no belief in it whatever. I am satisfied that it is not true. I do not know why that assertion has been so boldly made unless for the purpose of enabling the Democrats of this body and the new converts to obtain a repeal of the "test oath," and thereby to give seats in Congress to some of their southern political friends. I do not know why otherwise that notion was started, but that it is not true any reflecting man who will read the history of the last five years must see. We know what the truth is. It is this: the manner in which the present Administration has punished treason has made it not odious, but indeed the only popular institution of the South, so that if a man can take the oath he is afraid to let his neighbors know it. Treason has been made popular in the South, and loyalty odious. A man who has always been loyal is compelled by public opinion, forced upon and encouraged in the South by the Administration, compelled, I say, to deny his loyalty, and to simulate treason. Where are the forty-two thousand southern Union soldiers?

The third of these propositions is to prevent the payment of the rebel debt by the United States or any of the rebel States, and to prevent compensation from ever being made for slaves. Is there anybody here who has any objection to that? The former measure has received the sanction of the House heretofore by the requisite two-thirds vote, and might be passed by as a thing settled upon. Is there any reason why we should guard against the payment of the rebel debt? It is strange that there should be necessity for it; but that there is such necessity no one here can doubt. A large portion of this debt is held abroad. The foreign allies of the Democratic rebellion contributed their money to aid the party here; and if the Government of the United States does not provide irrevocably that they shall lose the investment, it will be false to every duty it owes to its citizens. But there is a considerable portion of this debt held by southern Democratic leaders; and it is to guard against the paying of this that the great necessity exists for putting this provision into the Constitution. It may be that the punishment of our country for its national sins is not yet complete. It may be that in the future an inscrutable Providence intends, for our full punishment, to restore to power for a time the Democratic party. What would be the result then? We know what would be the result. I want to put it out of the power of the Government to pay the rebel debt, that our friends on the other side of the House may not at some time be tempted by their old habit of obedience to the southern task-master. These men who have voted upon that side of all questions can hardly be expected to withhold their votes when their possible future leaders shall demand that the rebel debt be paid as far as they are concerned. The only way to guard against that effectually is to put the provision itself in the Constitution prohibiting any portion thereof from ever being paid.

The latter branch of the fourth section prohibits the giving of compensation for slaves. Now, a prominent Democratic member of this House, whose name I will not mention without his consent, yesterday told me that when the Democratic party—he did not say "if," but "when," and he did not even blush to say it—when the Democratic party came to be restored to power it would demand payment for emancipated slaves or the repudiation of our national debt, and I confess I believed him.

Can any man doubt what the position of the Democratic members of this body will be with fifty-eight added to their number from the rebel States—fifty-eight Representatives of those whom they have for years obeyed and who will demand this of them?

Mr. LE BLOND. Mr. Speaker, I demand the name.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to be interrupted.

Mr. BROOMALL. If any man hesitates to believe with me, let him look over the files of the Congressional Globe for the last four years, and then if he is not convinced I will concede that he is beyond the reach of conviction.

They say that we offered in 1861 to pay for these slaves. So we did, and if the offer had been accepted we would have gained largely by it. The cost of the war, counted only in dollars, would have largely paid for all the slaves. But the offer was not accepted, and it will never be renewed with the consent of the loyal people. Let our political opponents call the dead to life, let them restore to their homes three hundred thousand murdered American citizens, and then let them pay the debt which we contracted in putting down their rebellion, and we will renew our offer. We will then pay for their slaves and gain largely by the transaction.

Mr. Speaker, this measure has been spoken of as the punishment to be imposed upon the South. Why, is this all that is proposed to be inflicted upon men who have been guilty of crimes so monstrous? Is there to be no further punishment than this? Is treason not to be rendered odious? In fact, this is not a punishment at all. These people have now no rights. They are the conquered, we the conquerors; and the conquered, as everybody knows, must look to the conquerors for their future political and civil position. We propose to grant rights, we propose to give favors, but we propose to leave out one in every twelve for four years in thus giving the favors. It is not as punishment, it is as a means of future security, that this provision is asked to be incorporated in the Constitution. We have beaten the enemy in the field. He is at our mercy. In a spirit of unparalleled magnanimity, we propose to restore the status ante bellum as far as is consistent with our future safety. Why, there never were such terms as these offered to any vanquished people by the victors. Look through all history and find its parallel. In every other country what has been the penalty allotted to treason, to rebellion that fails to make itself revolution? Death, banishment, confiscation. Look at England in the Indies and in Jamaica! Yet we propose not even punishment, not even the enforcement of existing laws.

These people have murdered two hundred and ninety thousand of our fellow-citizens. The man Probst, who in Philadelphia has been tried and sentenced to be hanged for murder, killed eight persons. That poor, miserable, petty scoundrel only killed eight; these people have killed two hundred and ninety thousand. He is to be hanged, and Alexander H. Stephens, who was one of the main supporters of the rebellion, is to be allowed a seat in the Senate of the United States. What a mockery of human justice!

Sir, the time will come when the poor, ignorant Dutchman who committed his petty crime will be brought to the same bar with Vice President Stephens who aided in the murder of so many of the good and the true men of our country, and these things will all be made even. There is a necessity for a future world that the immense inequalities of the present one may be rectified.

Let it offend no Democratic sensibilities that I should contrast Probst and Stephens, the murderous Dutchman and the murderous conspirator. If there is any one man in the South peculiarly responsible to the widows and the orphans of those whose bones lie upon southern battle-fields or are worn as ornaments about the necks of high-born Democratic ladies, that man is Alexander H. Stephens. He sinned against light and knowledge. He was the great champion of the Union in the South. When he was bribed by the love of office into crime, what wonder that the great masses of the South followed him?

Why, even Probst was the pupil of Stephens. Probst was a soldier, serving by accident on the right side. Stephens made his school, inaugurated the war. Sir, read, if you can read, the miserable man's confession, and then ask yourself whether those horrible details could have been gone through by any one who had not learned the art of human butchery in the school of war.

Both these men "accept the situation;" both acknowledge that they have been defeated in a war upon society; but Stephens appears before a committee of Congress and actually claims rights, like the Pharisee in the temple; while poor Probst can only say, "Lord have mercy upon me a sinner."

Probably my Democratic friends may not like the comparison. Neither do I. I will not put the ignorant upon a level with the learned in responsibility. I will not apply the same rule to the private soldier and to the statesman. I will not compare the murderer of only eight with the murderer of two hundred and ninety thousand. Yet Probst is to be hanged, while the President of the United States and the Democratic members of Congress are at this moment asking exactly such a modification of the "test oath," as will allow Stephens a seat in the United States Senate! Oh, what a mockery of justice in this! Break down your prison doors. Repeal your criminal codes. Let it not be said that in enlightened America we only punish the poor, the ignorant, and the degraded!

To bolster up the pet theory of restoration founded on rebel rights, it is now denied that we have ever been at war. War supposes conquest as one obvious mode of termination, and conquest extinguishes political rights. This would not suit the purposes of those who think the South was right in her demands, but only blundered in the means employed to obtain them. Hence there has been no war, whatever the soldiers and the bereaved ones may think to the contrary.

The President of the United States, in his recent peace proclamation, has given us from a Democratic stand-point the military history of the country for the last five years. He says that in 1861 certain persons in certain States conspired together to prevent the execution of the laws; that the Government resolved to put down the conspiracy, not in the spirit of conquest, but in that of self-preservation, and that the insurrection has now been suppressed; and this is all. This is the official report of the high Executive to his grand constituency.

From the cold official statement, who that did not feel and know these eventful years could imagine what scenes of human sorrow are embraced within the unwritten history of that period? There was an insurrection, and it has been suppressed. Has sated ambition forgotten the immense cost to the country of the process by which it became what it is? Why, in this brief history there are hundreds of thousands of treasons unpunished. In this the blood of more than a quarter of a million murdered victims cries aloud for retributive justice. And this the President of the United States calls insurrection. Why this history would exhibit great armies, such as the world has rarely seen; devastating whole States, and meeting in grand and terrible conflict—all the machinery of war in its largest possible extent.

But who shall write the details? Who shall tell the instances of individual suffering? Who shall say how many husbands and fathers asked but one day of absence from the Army to bury the wife or child and were of necessity denied? Who shall tell of the tired sentinel, awakened at his post after days and nights of toil, from dreams of home, to answer at the bar of the terrible court-martial for not doing what man could not do? Who shall tell of the secret sorrow of the unpensioned widow and orphan of him who fell from the ranks upon the long and weary march to die the death of the dog by the roadside and be marked upon his country's roll of dishonor as a deserter?

Yet the President of the United States calls the occurrences of the last five years insurrection, and tells us with true official coldness that it is suppressed! Surely sated ambition has overlooked the immense cost of what it feeds on. If this is insurrection, in the name of all that is horrible what is war?

America transcends her elder sister in the length of her rivers, in the height of her mountains, and in the tremendous energy of her people. And we are now told that that transcendancy extends even to the art of human butchery. When an American insurrection is so like the most devastating of European wars, the imagination shrinks with horror from contemplating what would be an American war. Surely the heart of the Executive is not in sympathy with the millions who made him what he is.

Mr. SHANKLIN. Mr. Speaker, the subject now before the House for its consideration is a matter, perhaps, of as much importance, and involves as many important interests to the American people, as any subject upon which the Congress of the United States can have to pass. Upon its solution may depend the weal or woe of the American people and their descendants. Those institutions, republican and free in their character, reared by the wisdom, the patriotism, and the sufferings of our revolutionary sires, and consecrated by their blood, may depend upon the action of this Congress upon this subject.

It becomes us, then, as the Representatives of a generous and confiding people, who hold these important interests and trusts in our hands, to divest ourselves as far as is possible of every angry passion, to banish every sectional prejudice or partiality, to discard personal interest and considerations, to break the lines of party, and to rise above considerations of that kind to a higher and purer sphere, that we may act for the general good of the whole country now and forever. If we could but do this our labors would be easy, our task would be more than half performed in its very commencement. But if, from the frailty of our natures and our passions, we are unable to assume a position of this sort let us at least approach our task with clean hands, pure hearts, and patriotic intentions.

Mr. Speaker, the subject which has been submitted to this House for its consideration comes to us clothed with all the power and the commanding influence of a committee of the two Houses of Congress, selected, as charity compels us to suppose, on account of their experience, their wisdom, their justice, and their patriotism; and that which has been submitted to us is the work of five long and tedious months, and represents the views, sentiments, and principles of at least the majority of the House, or the party from which they were selected.

I therefore approach this subject with no ordinary degree of embarrassment and hesitancy; but my own convictions of truth and justice, of right and of duty, must control my action, and I am ready to take whatever responsibility may attach to it.

The joint resolution reported by the committee, and which is now before the House, is as follows:

ARTICLE—.

SEC. 1. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person, within its jurisdiction, the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever, in any State, the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crimes, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age.

SEC. 3. Until the 4th day of July, 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for members of Congress, and for electors for President and Vice President of the United States.

SEC. 4. Neither the United States, nor any State, shall assume or pay any debt or obligation already incurred, or which may hereafter be incurred, in aid of insurrection or of war against the United States; or any claim for compensation for loss of involuntary service or labor.

SEC. 5. Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

That joint resolution presupposes and takes as an established fact that those States lately in rebellion are no longer members of the Union; that the ties which bound them to this Government have been severed, and that the people of those States are aliens and foreigners to this Government. That is the position which has been assumed by this committee, and upon that hypothesis this resolution and these measures are based. I do not design now to discuss the question whether these States are in or out of the Union. That question has been ably and elaborately discussed. Our minds are made up upon that subject. The mind of the public is made up upon that subject. But we all remember that at the commencement of this difficulty these States asserted that it was a constitutional right which they had to withdraw from the Union and form independent and separate governments themselves, and in obedience to this claimed right they passed their ordinances of secession. We took the ground, and rightfully too, as I believe, that they had no such right under the Constitution which had been framed by our fathers; that they owed allegiance to the General Government; that they must obey the laws and Constitution of the General Government, and that they could not withdraw from it. The issue was fairly made up. One party contended that they had the right of secession and to sever the ties which bound them to the Union; and the other party, as I think rightfully, took the ground that they had no such right; and the issue was made and submitted to the arbitration of arms.

Mr. Speaker, after four long years of bloody war, the most desolating that the world has ever seen; after the sacrifice of half a million of our Federal soldiers and citizens, and the slaughter, perhaps, of nearly as many more of the confederate people; after the expenditure of more than four thousand million dollars, a debt entailed upon this country, and which will be handed down for years and years to come, our armies triumphed. These people who asserted this right of secession surrendered it; they said they would give up the contest. They laid down their arms and dispersed; and they then expected to come back into the room and to assume the places which they had occupied before. But they are met at the threshold with, "No, no; you are aliens and foreigners, and you cannot come into this Government unless upon such terms as we may propose to you."

You went to war to sustain the Constitution of the United States and to enforce all the provisions of that Constitution. We triumphed, and then we turn around and say that all their constitutional rights have been lost. We say to them, "You made war to go out of the Union; you have failed with your armies to accomplish your purpose to get out of the Union; and yet you are out of the Union. We fought to keep you in the Union and we triumphed, yet you are out of the Union." That is the result of this whole proposition, and the logic of the committee.

Mr. Speaker, there are two prominent and distinct ideas contained in this proposition. The first idea is to strike down the reserved rights of the States, those rights which were declared by the framers of the Constitution to belong to the States exclusively and necessary for the protection of the property and liberty of the people. The first section of this proposed amendment to the Constitution is to strike down those State rights and invest all power in the General Government. It is then proposed to disfranchise the people of the southern States who have gone into this rebellion, until the party in power could fasten and rivet the chains of oppression for all time to come, and hedge themselves in power, that they may rule and control those people at will. Those are the two ideas contained in this proposition.

Now, how do you propose to carry out that second idea? Is it by degrading, by humbling, by humiliating these people, and rendering them unworthy of the blessings of liberty or of being recognized as citizens? Do you expect to effect the object in that way? Do you expect, by the terms you propose to impose on those people, to render them willing serfs and slaves to your power? If they will submit to the burdens which you propose, then they ought not to come back into this Union; for they will be unworthy to hold the position of American citizens.

But how are you going to humble and degrade these people? By disfranchising them, by oppressing them with taxes, by denying them representation, by dragging them down to the loyal political and social equality with the servile African race. You may impoverish them, you may exterminate them, but you can never reduce them to the condition when they will kiss the hand that strikes them.

How long do you suppose it would take to bring you to that condition? How long would you struggle against those acts of oppression, those acts of tyranny, before you would bow in submission as slaves and serfs? Do you suppose these people in the southern States are intellectually, morally, or physically your inferiors? Certainly you do not believe that. They may be disloyal in the estimation of some. But I will assert that so far as we know these people from their past history, they are not your inferiors physically, morally, or intellectually.

The people of the southern States and the people of the northern States stood side by side in the great battles of the revolutionary war; they met in the councils of the nation; they were as brave upon the battle-field, as wise in the council, and as safe advisers as the people of the northern States. They were the peers and the equals of the people of the North.

In the war of 1812 they stood by the Government and they drove back the foreign invader. Were they your inferiors then? Does history establish that to be the fact? They were your equals wherever tried and wherever met.

In the war with Mexico, men from South Carolina and men from Massachusetts and Rhode Island stood side by side on the battlefields upon the plains of Mexico. Were not the men of the South as brave and gallant as the men of the North? Did they shrink from responsibility? They were your equals in every point of view.

From the commencement of this Government down to the commencement of this unfortunate war they met in councils of the nation; they met in judicial forums; they filled executive, judicial, and ministerial offices side by side with men of the northern States, and in every station and position they were the peers and equals of the men of the North.

You have recently met them in this civil war, with five times their population and ten times their resources, and they kept your gallant and brave armies at bay for four long years. Their councils were as wise, their measures were as judicious for prosecuting the war and to effect the objects which they had in view as yours were. They kept you at bay. The cannon of their army were heard as often in this capital as your cannon were heard in their capital at Richmond. Does this prove that they are your inferiors? You overcame them by numbers, not because you were their superiors in wisdom, in gallantry, in bravery. I admit and assert that they erred in this matter. They claimed rights which did not belong to them. Thousands of them, however, believed that they had these rights. They acted upon that belief. But, sir, they have now surrendered all those claims. What policy will you now pursue toward them?

Mr. Speaker, if the doctrine of the party in power is true, that those States are out of the Union, that they have cut loose from their obligations to the Constitution, and taken themselves outside of the pale of that instrument, I ask you what have you gained by this war. We waged a war to prevent their going out; we waged a war for the purpose of enforcing the laws against them. We were successful, as gentlemen say. The people of the South waged a war to go out of the Union. They were unsuccessful. Yet the doctrine of the party in power admits that the rebels succeeded in accomplishing the object for which they fought.

I ask again, what have you gained? Have you kept them in the Union? You say that you have not. Have you maintained and supported and enforced the Constitution? You say that you have not. Then what have you gained by this war which has cost this nation so much blood and treasure? All that you have gained is that you have entailed upon yourselves and upon posterity a debt which bears the nation down, and will continue to bear it down as an incubus. You have freed, it may be said, four million slaves. Yes, you have freed four million slaves, who were productive laborers, who were contented and happy and well provided for, and you have thrown them upon society unprepared for their condition, destitute of that training and education which are necessary to enable them to protect themselves. You have converted one half of them into vagabonds. That is a part of the fruits of this war. You have done more. By the demoralization of these people, and by the policy which you have adopted in regard to them, you have imposed upon the people a debt which I will not attempt to estimate, for the purpose of supporting a pet institution called the Freedmen's Bureau.

Perhaps you have gained another object. You have through that bureau manufactured the materials that have filled the galleries of this Hall during the whole session. Crowds of these negroes have hung over us like a black and threatening cloud, while we were crucifying the Constitution of our fathers' and trampling under our feet the rights and liberties of the people in passing the Freedmen's Bureau bill, the civil rights bill, and the indemnity bill. They have joined in the shouts of triumph which have gone up when this House has trampled on the rights of the people and set at naught the provisions of the Constitution.

What more do you propose by this measure?

You deny to the States the right of repudiation. Yet, in the very act of denying that right, you yourselves commit an act of repudiation. You violate the honor of the nation, which is most solemnly pledged to payment for the slaves which were enlisted in the United States Army in loyal slave States. In my State, Kentucky, more than thirty thousand negroes enlisted in the Union Army. Before that enlistment an act was passed by this Congress, pledging the faith of the nation to payment for the slaves that might be enlisted in the Union Army in loyal slave States, not exceeding $300 apiece. Has such compensation ever been made? It has not. The nation is pledged to the payment of that debt. The nation to-day owes to my State more than $10,000,000 under the provisions of that act. Yet now you propose a constitutional provision denying both to the States and the General Government the right to pay such debts. By this measure you propose to violate the pledged faith of the nation; you propose to practice upon the people an outrage and a violation of their rights.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are asked by gentlemen here, and asked with an air of great confidence and triumph, "Do you want these rebels to take seats in Congress? Are you willing to admit to participation in the Government rebels who have sacrificed and slaughtered our people?" No, sir.

If these people are not pardoned and acquitted then they have no right, as they have violated the laws of the country, to enjoy all the blessings of the protection of this Government; but if they have been pardoned, if the political sins of which they have been guilty have been wiped out, do you think your garb of loyalty and patriotism is made of such flimsy stuff that association with these men would soil and contaminate it? The mighty host, we are told, that is gathered around the throne of the Most High is composed of pardoned sinners, the associates and companions of angels. But a pardoned rebel must not associate with the political Pharisees of this House!

Where are you going to? You are not willing to associate with pardoned rebels. I understand the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who is ever fruitful in resources in getting you in and out of difficulties, is going to set up a little concern of his own, and you who have been faithful to him in life ought not to desert him in death, and then you will be free from the contamination of pardoned rebels, mercy, and charity. Nor will you be haunted and tormented with the veto messages of Andrew Johnson, the wise patriot and statesman.

Mr. Speaker, there is but one other subject. What ought to be our policy here? Should it be tyrannical and oppressive, or should it be liberal? We are told we cannot trust these people. They have given up the right of secession; they have taken the oath to support the Government and the laws; what are you going to do with them? Are you going to hold them in subjugation? England has tried a policy of that sort toward a noble and generous people, the Irish. What has been the result of that policy? Has it been to conquer them? It has been to implant in the bosom of every Irishman a deep hatred of England. That hatred has descended from sire to son; and I hope it will continue to be transmitted until that noble and generous people will rise in majesty and power and secure their freedom. Russia has pursued a similar policy toward Poland. Has the result been to subjugate the gallant Poles? They are ready at any moment to rise in rebellion. Austria has pursued the same policy. The result has always been the same.

The southern people whom it is proposed to subjugate are a noble, brave people. They may have been deluded, they may have committed a great crime, but they are now anxious to unite with all of our people to sustain the Government. Will you receive them? Will you make them your friends? Will you rather make them your enemies? This question we must solve.

They would be a most invaluable friend. And in my opinion they would, if you would adopt a kind, generous policy toward them, receive them and extend to them equal State and individual rights, and that without delay. By your treatment prove to them that the war you waged against them was not a war of conquest or subjugation or from malice or vengeance, but a war to maintain the Constitution of our fathers and the rights of the Union of the States, as you declared it was when you took up arms and when the strife commenced. Redeem your pledged faith by your acts and your policy, and peace, friendship, and prosperity will once more cover our now distracted country. Then we can bid defiance to the enemies of our free institutions. No nation, however proud or domineering she may be, will dare insult our flag or deny our just rights. Generations unborn will rise up to praise and bless your memories.

Let me beseech you in the name and behalf of patriotism, justice, and a downtrodden and oppressed people, to cease your war on the President of your selection and choice, who has exhibited to the world the highest order of wisdom, patriotism, charity, justice, and devotion to the equal rights of man. We will once more see the charred cities and villages that now dot a large portion of our Union rise up in fresh and pure proportions; our desolated fields will again blossom as a garden of roses. But above all, under the wise and just lead of President Johnson, we will see our people gather around our country's altar, and under the flag of a restored nation renew their vows of obedience and devotion to the Constitution of our fathers. But should you who now hold the power in this House persist in your persecutions and relentless oppression, you may yet live to see the day when you will regret the folly and madness that now hurries you to the overthrow of your power. It may be the overthrow and destruction of the best Government that ever blessed mankind. That your measures of policy will lead to peace or harmony no dispassionate man can for a moment hope. You may discover when it is too late that you have pressed your unequal laws beyond the point from which you can retreat. You may bring down upon your country and Government the condemnation of all enlightened, civilized nations, and you may build up a nation of just enemies in your midst, and this land may again be drenched and deluged with fraternal blood. May we and our children be spared from that terrible ordeal, is the prayer of one who loves his whole country. Discharge your joint committee on reconstruction; abolish your Freedmen's Bureau; repeal your civil rights bill, and admit all the delegates from the seceded States to their seats in Congress, who have been elected according to the laws of the country and possess the constitutional qualification, and all will be well.

PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House papers in the Pennsylvania contested-election case of Koontz vs. Coffroth; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the acting Attorney General, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, a list of clerks, &c.; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, I took occasion at an early stage of the session, while making some remarks on the general subject of restoration, to say that, in my judgment, the joint committee to which it had been referred, ought to lay the whole of their plan upon our tables before asking us to act upon any of its specific parts. I congratulate myself, sir, that, although when first made the demand was received with anything but favor, the committee now concede its justice by complying with it. It seemed to me then, as it seems to the committee now, that when a proposition embracing several branches more or less interdependent and all essential to the object sought to be attained, justice and fair dealing required that Congress should have possession of the whole case before being required to act upon any of its parts. We may see the result of a different course in the recent experience of the British House of Commons. That House was called on to consider a scheme of parliamentary reform, consisting of two branches, one an extension of the suffrage, and the other a reapportionment of representation, or, as they style it, a redistribution of seats. The ministry submitted its programme for the first but withheld the second. Thereupon a portion of the ministerial party demanded to see the whole plan before acting upon part of it. The ministry refused to comply, and the result of their refusal was that, although they commenced the session with a majority of sixty, they carried the bill on its second reading by the meager majority of five, in a House of over six hundred members.

I am glad to see that the reconstruction committee does not imitate the obstinacy of the British ministry. After long delay and several attempts to carry single parts of its proposition, it now submits the whole of the plan by which it proposes to restore the Union. I must say that I see nothing in the report which required any such delay, nothing which depends for its validity or force upon the evidence which, with such protracted pain, the committee has spent five months in collecting. And it is fortunate for us that this is so, for Congress is not yet in possession of any considerable portion of the testimony. It has not yet been printed and laid upon our tables to guide our action.

But, sir, without dwelling further upon these preliminary matters, I will proceed to state the nature of the report which has thus been made. The programme of reconstruction reported by the committee consists of three parts: first, a series of five constitutional amendments, upon as many different subjects, each distinct from the other; and then two bills, one providing for the admission into Congress of Representatives from the States lately in rebellion upon certain conditions, and the other excluding from Federal offices for all time to come certain classes of persons who have been engaged in that rebellion. The House has ordered that these three propositions shall be taken up in succession, and the proposed amendments to the Constitution are the only topics which are properly before us for our action now. I concur fully in the suggestion of the President of the United States, that it would be wise, when acting upon amendments to the Constitution, that all the States to be affected by them should be represented in the debate. I do not understand him to hold, I certainly do not hold myself, that the presence of them all is essential to the validity of the action we may take; and inasmuch as they are to be submitted, if adopted by us, to all the States of the Union for their ratification, and as the assent of three fourths of all those States will be required to make them valid as parts of the Constitution, I am quite willing to take action upon them here even in the absence of those States which are as yet without representation.

And now, sir, with regard to these amendments, five in form, but only four in substance, I have this to say: that, with one exception, they are such as commend themselves to my approval. The principle of the first, which secures an equality of rights among all the citizens of the United States, has had a somewhat curious history. It was first embodied in a proposition introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] in the form of an amendment to the Constitution, giving to Congress power to secure an absolute equality of civil rights in every State of the Union. It was discussed somewhat in that form, but, encountering considerable opposition from both sides of the House, it was finally postponed, and is still pending. Next it came before us in the form of a bill, by which Congress proposed to exercise precisely the powers which that amendment was intended to confer, and to provide for enforcing against State tribunals the prohibitions against unequal legislation. I regarded it as very doubtful, to say the least, whether Congress, under the existing Constitution, had any power to enact such a law; and I thought, and still think, that very many members who voted for the bill also doubted the power of Congress to pass it, because they voted for the amendment by which that power was to be conferred. At all events, acting for myself and upon my own conviction on this subject, I did not vote for the bill when it was first passed, and when it came back to us from the President with his objections I voted against it. And now, although that bill became a law and is now upon our statute-book, it is again proposed so to amend the Constitution as to confer upon Congress the power to pass it.

Now, sir, I have at all times declared myself heartily in favor of the main object which that bill was intended to secure. I was in favor of securing an equality of rights to all citizens of the United States, and of all persons within their jurisdiction; all I asked was that it should be done by the exercise of powers conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. And so believing, I shall vote very cheerfully for this proposed amendment to the Constitution, which I trust may be ratified by States enough to make it part of the fundamental law.

The second amendment which is proposed to the Constitution relates to the basis of representation. That has also been already before this House for its action, and I have always declared myself in favor of the object it seeks to accomplish. As I remarked on a previous occasion, I do not think the South ought to gain a large increase of political power in the councils of the nation from the fact of their having rebelled, as they will do if the basis of representation remains unchanged. But when it was presented before it came in a form which recognized by implication the right of every State to disfranchise a portion of its citizens on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and provided that whenever any portion of any race should be thus disfranchised by any State, the whole of that race within that State should be excluded from enumeration in fixing the basis of representation. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] said yesterday, it provided that "if a single one of the injured race was excluded from the right of suffrage, the State should forfeit the right to have any of them represented;" and he added that he preferred it on that account. Well, sir, I did not. When it was presented before, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] made a very powerful argument against it. He showed that it tended directly to discourage every southern State from preparing its colored population for enfranchisement; that it deprived them of all inducement for their gradual admission to the right of suffrage, inasmuch as it exacted universal suffrage as the only condition upon which they should be counted in the basis of representation at all. I thought that argument entitled to great weight. I have never yet heard it answered. The gentleman from Ohio converted me to that view of the subject, and although he relinquished or waived it himself, I could not. I voted against a proposition which seemed to me so unjust and so injurious, not only to the whites of the southern States, but to the colored race itself. Well, sir, that amendment was rejected in the Senate, and the proposition, as embodied in the committee's report, comes before us in a very different form. It is now proposed to base representation upon suffrage, upon the number of voters, instead of upon the aggregate population in every State of the Union. And as I believe that to be essentially just, and likely to remedy the unequal representation of which complaint is so justly made, I shall give it my vote.

The third amendment embodied in this report is of an entirely different character. It provides that until the year 1870 all persons within the States lately in rebellion who "voluntarily adhered to the rebellion and gave it aid and comfort" shall be "excluded from the right of voting for members of Congress and for electors of President and Vice President of the United States."

Now, the first thing that strikes my attention in this is, that this amendment recognizes these States as States, and as States within the Union. How else, upon what other ground, are they authorized to be represented at all? The amendment does not confer upon them any right of representation. It does not confer upon their people any right of voting. It recognizes their right to representation. It recognizes the general right of suffrage as belonging to the people of these States. It simply limits that right thus recognized as existing. It excludes a portion of the people from exercising that right of suffrage which in the absence of such exclusion they would possess. Now, this discards entirely the doctrine that these States are Territories, the doctrine that they are conquered provinces, and that their people are alien enemies, out of the Union and without rights of any kind. And so far it has my hearty approbation.

But, sir, it proposes to exclude the great body of the people of those States from the exercise of the right of suffrage in regard to Federal officers. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] in his very ingenious argument this morning, attempted to show that it would not exclude more than one in twelve of the voters in the southern States. But it seems to me idle to enter into such calculations, which depend on a series of estimates, each one of which cannot be anything more than a wild and random guess. I take it that we all know perfectly well that the great masses of the southern people "voluntarily adhered to the insurrection;" not at the outset, not as being originally in favor of it, but during its progress, sooner or later, they voluntarily gave in their adhesion to it, and gave it aid and comfort. They did not all join the army. They did not go into the field, but they did, at different times, from various motives and in various ways, give it aid and comfort.

Well, sir, that would exclude the great body of the people of those States under this amendment from exercising the right of suffrage. It is proposed to permit those only who did not at any time nor in any way thus adhere to the insurrection to vote for members of Congress and for presidential electors. I do not think they would number more than one tenth of the whole population. But even if they should number one eighth or one fifth they would still constitute but a very small portion of the people to be clothed with the exclusive powers of government. They would still constitute a government oligarchical and not republican in form. Yesterday the chairman of the joint committee on reconstruction, [Mr. STEVENS,] in his forcible remarks introducing this report, took ground against admitting the members-elect from Tennessee and Arkansas because they do not represent their constituents. "Do not tell me," said he, "that there are loyal representatives waiting for admission; until their States are loyal they can have no standing here, for they would merely misrepresent their constituents." And yet he proposes that we shall allow one fifth, one eighth, or one tenth, as the case may be, of the people of these southern States to elect members from those States, to hold seats upon this floor. Now, would not men thus elected in the most emphatic sense misrepresent their constituents? How can the gentleman from Pennsylvania favor such a proposition as this, which is certain to secure members who will not truly represent their States, when he refuses admission to the loyal delegation from Tennessee? By what process of reasoning can he reconcile the admission of members in the one case, while he denies it so obstinately and scornfully in the other? It is true this provision is temporary; but the effect of it while it lasts must be to plant seeds of discontent and dissension in the southern States which will survive by scores of years the immediate cause out of which they grew.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] yesterday made what seemed to me to be a very strong point—that this disfranchisement of the large body of the southern people would run counter to the terms of the amnesty proclamation of President Lincoln, which restored all but certain classes to their former rights. I think there is great force in that objection. But however this may be as a point of technical construction—and I shall not canvass it in that light—there is certainly great force in this objection, that this provision would be a departure, a retraction from the assurances given all through this war, by acts and resolutions of Congress and by proclamations of the President. Every declaration from any department of the Government conveyed to the South and to the whole country the assurance that the war was waged for the sole purpose of suppressing the rebellion, and that when it was over all the States would be restored to the Union in full possession of all their rights and on a footing of equality with the other States. I know it may be said that we were there in perplexity and in peril, and that it was essential to the harmony of public sentiment and to the vigorous prosecution of the war that these declarations and pledges should be made. I know, too, how general is the truth that “ease will retract vows made in pain.” But it is not a pleasing spectacle to see a great nation like this shrinking from the fulfillment of pledges under which it carried on the war, shrinking from the assurances it has given to the whole country, that upon the termination of the war the authority of the Constitution and the rights of the States should be restored. We should be at least as jealous of our honor now as we were of our safety then.

There is another objection which perhaps may not be entitled to much weight, but is worth consideration. This proposition to exclude the mass of the southern people from voting until 1870 exposes those who advocate and press it, it exposes the Union party to the suspicion, renders that party obnoxious to the charge of seeking to amend the Constitution for the purpose of influencing and controlling the presidential election of 1868. I make no such charge, but I know it will be made. Our vigilant opponents will not omit so tempting an opportunity to trace our action to motives of partisanship rather than patriotism. And I would not like to be put in a position where I shall be compelled to concede the charge, or where facts can be brought forward that would even seem to sustain it. It is quite true that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] accepted what he took to be a suggestion on my part the other day, that General Grant might be the candidate of the Union party for the Presidency in 1868, with great alacrity; and the eagerness with which he responded to that suggestion gave me the most comforting assurance that we shall have no dissensions upon that subject when the time shall come. I do not think it necessary, therefore, to insert such an amendment as this in the Constitution in order to secure the election of General Grant, if he should be presented as the Union candidate or by the country at large, without regard to party, as is by no means impossible. For wherever you find men who appreciate courage, skill, and patriotism in the field, magnanimity in the hour of victory, and wise moderation in political councils, there you will find men who will appreciate that illustrious commander as a candidate for any office which the American people may have to bestow. But upon these points I will not dwell.

I now come to another objection, which to my mind seems fatal to this amendment. This section seems to me to have been inserted for the express purpose of preventing the adoption by the southern States of any of the amendments proposed to the Constitution. I will not say that this was the motive of the committee in reporting it, but that, I think, is the result which its adoption by Congress will secure. The adoption of all the proposed amendments, this one included, by each of the southern States, is made in the bill reported by the committee a condition essential to their admission to representation in Congress. Now, the amendments are to be adopted by the Legislatures of the several States. The Legislatures are elected by all the people—those who have voluntarily adhered to the insurrection as well as those who have not—for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] laid special stress upon the fact that the people are still allowed full control of their State governments.

These Legislatures, thus elected, are expected to ratify all these amendments, to concede an equality of civil rights, to concede a great reduction of their political power in changing the basis of representation, to concede the repudiation of their debts and the denial of compensation for their slaves; and for what consideration? What do we offer them in return for all these concessions? The right to be represented on this floor, provided they will also consent not to vote for the men who are to represent them! Nay more, that they shall accept as the Representatives whom they thus get the right of having here men elected by a small minority of their people who are supposed and conceded to be hostile to them in political sentiment, and against whom they have been waging a bitter war! We offer them, in exchange for all these renunciations of political power and of material advantage, the privilege of being misrepresented in Congress by men in whose election they had no voice or vote, and with whose past political action and present political sentiments they have no sympathy whatever.

Why, sir, this not only “breaks the word of promise to the hope,” it does not even “keep it to the ear.” It is not merely a sham, it is a mockery. The very price by which we seek to induce their assent to these amendments, we snatch away from their hands the moment that assent is secured. Is there any man here who can so far delude himself as to suppose for a moment that the people of the southern States will accede to any such scheme as this? There is not one chance in ten thousand of their doing it.

Representation ceases to be of the slightest value to them under such conditions. They will not seek it or ask for it. They will infinitely prefer to take the chances of change in the political councils of the nation, to await the election of a Congress more propitious to their claims, especially under the comforting assurance which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] gave them some two months ago, when he said frankly that “it is of no importance by whom or when or how reconstruction is effected, for in three short years this whole Government will be in the hands of the late rebels and their northern allies.” They will readily wait “three short years” for representation rather than purchase the mockery of it we offer them at such a price.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] in vindicating the policy of this exclusion of the southern people from the right of suffrage, insisted that it was necessary as a means of discipline; that they are not yet in a proper frame of mind to take part in the affairs of government; that they are at heart still unfriendly and hostile to our authority and institutions; and that we must treat them as parents do unruly children, that we must flog them for their offenses and then exclude them from the family table or shut them up in a closet until they come to a better and more submissive mood. Well, sir, this might answer if the eight million people with whom we are dealing would consent to be treated as children, and to regard us here in Congress as standing in loco parentis toward them. They might in that case submit tamely to the chastisement we propose, and possibly profit by it. But they are not children. They are men, men tenacious of their rights, jealous of their position, brave, and proud of their bravery, of hot and rebellious tempers, and not at all likely to be subdued in spirit or won to our love by such discipline as the gentleman from Ohio proposes to inflict. We have chastised them already. We have defeated their hostility against the Government. And now what remains? They are to be our fellow-citizens. They must form part of the people of our country. They are to take part, sooner or later, in our Government unless we intend to discard the fundamental principle of that Government, the right of the people to govern themselves. And we cannot afford to have them, or to make them, sullen, discontented, rebellious in temper and in purpose, even if they are submissive in act.

We have nothing to do with the sickly sentimentality referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] yesterday. Our object is not to deal in mercy toward them. We are to deal wisely—for their good and for our own. We are to make them friends, because we cannot afford to make or to keep them enemies. How shall we do this best? By what policy can it be best effected? By exclusion, by coercion, by hostile distrust? Can we coerce friendly feeling on the part of a hostile people? Has it ever been done? I would like the reader of history on this floor to point me to an instance in the records of any nation where great communities once disaffected have been brought back to friendly relations and feelings of kindly regard by such measures as are here proposed. Has Ireland been thus appeased? Has Poland? Has Hungary? Has Venice?

Why, sir, if history teaches anything, if any principle is established by the concurrent annals of all nations and all ages, it is that sentiment cannot be coerced; that opinions, even, cannot be controlled by force; and that with any people fit to be free or to be the countrymen of men who are free, all such efforts defeat themselves and intensify and perpetuate the hostilities sought to be overcome. Ireland offers us a signal example of this, and I am amazed that members upon this floor can shut their eyes or close their minds to the lessons which her sad history teaches. England, for her harsh dealings with that unhappy land hundreds of years ago, is paying the penalty to-day and will for all time to come. By mistakes in policy precisely such in kind as we are making now, England, hundreds of years ago, planted in Ireland the seeds of that disaffection which, in spite of all her attempts to undo the wrong, in spite of abundant legislation in redress of grievances, and for the good of Ireland, from time to time bursts out into feeble but bitter insurrection, and which to-day blooms into that shadowy phenomenon of Fenianism, which terrifies one continent and puzzles and poisons the other.

No, sir, this is not the way to deal with disaffected States. I have no sympathy with those in the southern States who have just emerged from rebellion. Never for an instant have I felt or shown the slightest toleration for their crime. From the first moment their purpose of rebellion was made apparent until the hour they laid down their arms, within my humble sphere and by the feeble means which were all I could command, I have demanded, urged, and waged the most vigorous and determined war that could be made upon them. That war has proved successful. The rebellion has been suppressed. Our mission now is of a different kind and must be fulfilled by agencies of another sort.

These, sir, are my objections to the third of these five amendments. The other four commend themselves to my judgment and will receive my support.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

Mr. LAFLIN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report to the House a resolution that there be printed for the use of the House one thousand extra copies of the modified internal revenue bill. I wish to announce that this number of bills has been printed and are in the hands of the superintendents of the folding-room. It will give five copies to each member.

The resolution was adopted.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. McKEE. Mr. Speaker, in the short time allotted for this discussion it is not my purpose to go over the propositions embraced in the pending amendment to the Constitution. Nor do I regard it as necessary, at least so far as my own position is concerned, having already in this House voted for at least three of the propositions in substantially the same shape in which they are now presented. I desire more particularly to discuss the third section of this proposed amendment, as there seems to have been generated more opposition to this than any other, and it being a proposition I regard as one of the most vital of all.

It is, sir, perhaps as well to go back a little to look at the opposition and to examine into the record of this House. On the 14th of December last, after the meeting of the two Houses, a resolution was introduced into this House by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HENDERSON] in these words:

"Resolved, That treason is a crime and ought to be punished."

And on calling the yeas and nays not a solitary Representative in this House who answered to that call but voted in the affirmative, including every Democratic member, with the exception of four who were absent. What did that mean? Did this House then vote their sentiments, or did they not? Since that time, sir, from the Democratic side of the House I have not heard a word that would tend in the least to induce the country to believe they would carry out the resolution for which they then voted. On the contrary, the whole drift of their argument is that these men, having submitted, are now as loyal as those who fought on the side of the Government, and entitled to the same rights. Is this the manner in which they propose to punish treason? Is this the proposition for which we voted? It would have been better had the resolution read in this manner:

Resolved, That treason is a crime, and that traitors should be rewarded for its commission.

The course of this whole Democratic side of the House since the vote on the 14th of December has been in strict accordance with the proposition as I have read it; and I regret to say that even on the Republican side I find men to-day who are willing, aye pleading that these men having laid down their arms are now entitled to all the rights which we who stood by the flag of our country during the late struggle for our existence possess. They have set aside their own work, abandoned their own record. It is very fashionable in these days, I believe, to do that.

Perhaps we can gain nothing by going back to men's records, but I would ask gentlemen this question. They are well aware that by our laws treason is declared a crime, and a high penalty is affixed upon it. Now, sir, the simple question comes to us to-day, have we, the Representatives of the people of this great nation, moral courage enough to carry out that law, or will we turn our back upon those who sustained our country in the great struggle for its existence and say to the eighteen hundred thousand men who waged this war, "All your efforts to crush out treason amount to nothing; these traitors to-day are entitled to all the rights that you possess?" Sir, for one, I am tired of that sickly sentimentality.

It appears to me that in order to uphold the loyal people of this land something must be done by a law ingrafted into the Constitution to protect them in their loyalty. Look, if you please, at the States of Maryland, of West Virginia, of Tennessee, of Missouri, of Arkansas. Each one of these States during this struggle, or since its close, has passed laws by which they disfranchise forever those men who gave aid and encouragement to the rebellion.

Now, sir, the question comes up to-day. The committee on reconstruction report a basis for settlement. They report to this House a proposition which disfranchises these men who have gone into rebellion even for the short space of a little more than four years, and we find it opposed by men who have always been against treason.

That is the proposition. And if it is voted down, how do we go out to the country? The representatives of the nation here assembled say to those five States which have adopted a disfranchising qualification in regard to their citizens, "Your action is wrong. You should not pass such an act. These men who waged war against the Government and against you have as much right to vote as you who have been true to your flag." It is not encouraging loyalty; it is crushing out those men who alone were true during the war, and putting the control of the State governments in their hands. For this cause alone, if for no other, I should say, do not strike out the proposition.

But, sir, it is perhaps true that the carrying out of this law might meet with some difficulty. But we find, in the disturbed state of our country which has resulted from the effects of this great war, that we must meet difficulty in all our efforts to restore peace, harmony, and quiet throughout the whole land. We are told that it is not fair nor just that the great mass should be disfranchised. Now, sir, in doing this we are but following the principles laid down by the lamented President Lincoln. His idea in regard to reconstruction was, if there were only one tenth of the people in any State who were loyal, as in Louisiana, that one tenth should reconstruct, rule, and control. And the idea was announced over and over again by his successor who to-day occupies the presidential chair.

Following out that great principle the people of Tennessee, one of the States declared to be in rebellion, organized a State government under the direction of President Lincoln and under the sanction of Andrew Johnson, then military governor of that State, and they have succeeded in enacting a law by which those who engaged in the rebellion are disfranchised and prohibited from exercising any of the rights of electors in the State which of right belong only to the loyal.

Now, sir, how do we hear this proposed amendment responded to by those who oppose it? We hear one of the gentlemen on this side of the House, from Ohio, [Mr. FROCK] calling upon the people of the South to have independence of spirit enough to rise up and reject it with scorn. And, as has been said by the gentleman from New York to-day, no matter what may be said of these people we may say this for them, that they are not fools, and they are not going to accept it. The inference, then, may be that we are fools in proposing it.

Well, sir, if we are to judge by their actions for the last five years, I think we should not make up our opinion very rapidly that they have not acted very foolishly in some things at least. It appears to me that they exhibited very little wisdom in going into the rebellion; it appears to me that they exhibited very little wisdom in its conduct; it appears to me that they exhibited no wisdom whatever in bringing on a great war; for if they had looked into the subject at all, they might have been satisfied that they could not destroy this Government. And they still show a want of wisdom, when, at the end of the war, having been crushed and having agreed to accept the issues of the war, to submit to the propositions by which we propose to reconstruct the Government, under the influence of the powers at Washington they have come to the conclusion that they are to be again trusted with the management of the affairs of this nation and are to be the rulers here. The sequel will show that they are misled and deceived.

Listen to what the Memphis Avalanche, one of the reconstructed organs of the South, says in reference to a recent law passed by the Le-gisature of Tennessee, and then you will be prepared to judge whether these people are ready to accept our terms or not. I read from the Memphis Avalanche of the 5th of the present month:

"The despotic, infamous, and cowardly franchise bill has become what the régime at Nashville call a law. That is, it has passed a so-called Senate and a so-called House at Nashville, or, in other words, it has received the sanction of a gang of legislative loafers who exist at the public expense at the capital of the State, and call themselves the Legislature of Tennessee."

Such is the language used by the copper-head press all over the country in regard to the Congress which sits here to-day. But I quote further:

"It becomes the good people of Tennessee"—

I want the House to bear in mind that when this writer refers to the "good people of Tennessee," he refers to men who have been engaged in this wicked and infamous attempt to destroy our Government. He goes on:

"It becomes the good people of Tennessee to prepare at once to dispute the further encroachment upon their rights by the wretched despotism now in power at Nashville. Let the State have restored to it the constitution which existed before the war, and which has not, up to this time, been properly, legally, or constitutionally supplanted by any other organic system. What now professes to be the constitution of Tennessee is but an assumption, the creature of a mere mob, a dirty thing, having a dirty emanation, to which a brave and chivalric people have, because of their misfortunes, been compelled to submit, but which they loathe and despise from the utmost recesses of their noble but broken hearts."

This is the class of men to whom we are called upon to-day to extend our sympathies, and to place upon an equal footing with those who have never faltered in their devotion to the Union. But I read on:

"The time has now come when further endurance will entail upon the people additional and more humiliating oppressions."

Hear the language of these men, who to-day we are called upon to enfranchise, and to place upon an equal footing with ourselves. I desire to make one other quotation to show the spirit which animates these reconstructed rebels. I read from the Louisville Journal—a paper published in the interests of the "Conservative-Johnson-Union party"—on the 2d day of May, 1866, describing the convention of reconstructed rebels and Democrats for the State of Kentucky, held in the city of Louisville the preceding day. That paper uses this language:

"We assure the people of Kentucky that the peace, harmony, and safety of the State are more seriously imperiled now than they have been since the ruthless hordes of Buckner and Bragg were trampling down our soil. The same men whose treachery to the Commonwealth and the nation involved the country in civil war five years ago, the same men who robbed and encouraged the robbing of our banks, the destroying of our railroad bridges, the firing of the dwellings of our citizens, and sought to establish rebel provisional governments over our people, by which to coerce them into the whirlpool of treason, are perfecting a political organization in the State for the purpose of placing her political power exclusively in the hands of men who, having been whipped at their own game of powder and ball, are now seeking to use the ballot for the achievement of their revengeful political schemes."

I ask the Representatives of the people to-day if they are willing to turn over the loyal men in these States, who have passed these laws, to the tender mercies of men like these? That is the question we have to meet now on this proposition. There may be some objections to it; but if we can get nothing better it is a good thing to go before the people of the country with; and the people will answer in tones that will be gratifying to the heart of every loyal man who votes for it here.

But, sir, in order to obviate the objections that are made to this third section, I propose to amend the motion made yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD] to recommit the joint resolution with instructions to the committee to strike out the third section, by substituting therefor the following:

Recommit with instructions to strike out the third section, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

All persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving aid and comfort to the so-called southern confederacy, are forever excluded from holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States.

That will obviate the objection that it would be impracticable to enforce the provision depriving the men who were engaged in the rebellion of the right of voting. It will provide that they shall vote for none but those who have been loyal. The loyal men will be encouraged, because the nation will say to them, "You alone, who have remained true, shall hold office," following out the resolution of the House that "treason is a crime, and ought to be punished." As nobody expects now that any traitors will be hanged (which is the punishment provided by law) let us cut off their heads politically, and say to them, you can never hold office under this Government.

By this means we will affix the brand of treason upon the traitor's brow; and there I would have it remain until the snows of winter covered their graves.

In my opinion, we are compelled to do one of three things: we are compelled to adopt something of this kind to prohibit these men, who with treacherous hearts sought the very life of the nation, from again seizing the offices of the Federal Government, by excluding them forever from office; or we are to turn the loyal men in all the border States as well as throughout the whole South over into the hands of the traitors, with the probability that the nation itself will follow in the same wake. The second follows from the refusal to do the first; the first, in my opinion, being the only salvation for the Union and protection of Union men. There is one other course which might have the effect of saving the nation with the Union men of the South. That is, if you will enfranchise these traitors, then enfranchise all men; and in that way the vote of the loyal man may counteract the vote of the traitor. Now, so far as I am concerned, I have not arrived at the point yet when I can believe that all men should be enfranchised. But if I am asked which I would the sooner trust, I would answer that I prefer to trust the meanest black man with a loyal heart who ever wore the chains of slavery to the most intelligent traitor who has waged war against my country.

But this House is not prepared to enfranchise all men; the nation, perhaps, is not prepared for it to-day; the colored race are not prepared for it, probably, and I am sure the rebels are unfit for it; and as Congress has not the moral courage to vote for it, then put in this provision which cuts off the traitor from all political power in the nation, and then we have secured to the loyal men that control which they so richly deserve. We will then have rewarded them for their devotion, and punished treason as it deserves to be punished.

Let me ask gentlemen here, why do you want these men to vote? Why are you clamorous for the support of men who have been engaged in treason, and whose hands are yet reeking with the blood of more than three hundred thousand loyal slain? Simply that you may turn out of power the great Union party who alone have upheld the Government in this grand and glorious struggle for liberty; simply that you may hand the reins of Government over to the hands of that sickly, pale, copperhead party, which was only the left wing of Jeff. Davis's army during the late war. That is why you want to have them vote, and such would be the result of the policy if adopted. You do not want to have traitors punished. Why? Because you want their aid; you desire that they shall help you, just as you were willing to help them during the war which has just closed.

You talk about this question of State rights. We thought the war had killed that dogma. But you are now attempting to bring it to life again. And if you have power enough to do it with the aid of the votes of traitors you are willing to summon them here to these Halls and give them a share in our deliberations. Now, for one, I want none of it. I desire that the loyal alone shall rule the country which they alone have saved. I desire that the brave and war-worn veteran shall be rewarded for his toil and privation. I desire that the widows and orphans of the slain soldiers of the Republic shall be spared the insult of having traitors make laws for them. I desire that the loyal heart of the nation shall continue in power the great party which sustained our armies in the field, and I desire that that party shall not be prevented from rewarding the heroes who survive with broken and maimed limbs and feeble bodies; shall not be prevented from dealing out pensions and bounties to the orphans of the slain soldiers of the Republic.

Permit these men to come back and assume their places here again, and I tell you to-day that having obtained equality for themselves you must go a little further and place their widows and their orphans upon our pension list, or they will not vote for any pension to yours. I want to prevent all that. And when the charge comes to me that I desire these propositions carried out in order to perpetuate the strength of a political party, I reply I do desire that party still to rule this land, because they alone having been loyal, they alone should rule.

Now, in regard to the section which forbids the payment of the rebel debt or compensation for slaves that have been emancipated, I most heartily support it. Having already put myself upon the record in favor of such a proposition, it is not necessary I should now say anything in regard to it. In order to secure the payment of the national debt, in order to prevent the payment of compensation for slaves who have become freemen, and the assumption of the rebel debt, the control of this Government must be by the loyal men of the land.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] if he desires to occupy the few minutes I have remaining.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McKee] will expire in four minutes.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desired, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] was speaking, to interrupt him, in order that I might understand fully the position in which he placed himself concerning his vote on the civil rights bill. I understood him to say that he voted against that bill because, as he believed, Congress had not the power, under the Constitution, to pass the bill, and that it would require such an amendment as is now proposed to clothe us with the power to pass such a measure. I could not at the time harmonize that in my mind with the record of the gentleman during this Congress relative to the principle involved in the civil rights bill.

The first section of that bill embodies its essential and vital principle. All the other sections provide merely for the enforcement of the principle embraced in the first section, which was simply a declaration that all persons without distinction of race or color should enjoy in all of the States and Territories civil rights and immunities. Now, sir, the gentleman himself introduced early in the session a bill, the second section of which provides as follows:

"That all persons born, or hereafter to be born, within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be deemed and considered, and are hereby declared, to be citizens of the United States, and entitled to all rights and privileges as such."

The first section proposes to amend our naturalization laws by striking out the word "white;" and the bill itself is intended to confer upon negroes and all other persons born within the United States, without distinction of color, the rights of citizens of the United States.

After that bill had been introduced by the gentleman from New York he made a speech, in which I find one of the propositions which he laid down as proper to be enforced by this Congress against the people of the southern States was in this language:

"I think, in the third place, we should provide by law for giving to the freedmen of the South all the rights of citizens, in courts of law and elsewhere."

Now, he did not mean that such provision should be made by a constitutional amendment; for in his fifth proposition he goes on to say:

"Fifth, I would make such amendments to the Constitution as may seem wise to Congress and the States, acting freely and without coercion."

So that his third proposition had no reference to this. And in fact he precludes any such construction by using the term "law." He says:

"We should provide by law for giving to the freedmen of the South all the rights of citizens, in courts of law and elsewhere."

Now, sir, that proposition of the gentleman is broader than the provision of the civil rights bill. It involves the entire principle; and if we give a reasonable construction to the term "elsewhere," we may include in that the jury-box and the ballot-box.

It does seem to me, sir, that the explanation given by the gentleman for his vote against the civil rights bill cannot be supported upon this record. If the gentleman will say that he voted against that bill because of the sections following the first, that may raise a different question—

The SPEAKER. The half hour of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McKee] has expired.

Mr. ELDRIDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. RAYMOND. I will inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] whether he will not allow the gentleman from Iowa to finish what he has to say and allow me to reply. It need not come out of the gentleman's time. Let it be regarded as an independent portion of the debate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I will consent to that if the House will.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Wisconsin does not claim the floor now, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. ROGERS. My information is that this bill is to be brought to a vote to-morrow. There are a number of gentlemen who wish to speak; and I suppose it is desirable to give as many an opportunity as possible.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the bill is to be brought to a vote to-morrow; and there are some thirty gentlemen who desire to speak.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not think it fair that time should be taken in this way. I do not object myself; but I think as many members as possible should be allowed an opportunity to speak.

Mr. RAYMOND. I think that when one gentleman makes a personal point against another an opportunity should be allowed for a reply.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I have no objection to yielding to the gentlemen if I can have the floor as soon as this personal question is disposed of. But I do not wish the time to come out of my thirty minutes.

Mr. HIGBY. I believe that we adopted, a day or two ago, a stringent rule as to the allotment of time in this debate; and I shall object to any departure from that rule.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have said nearly all I intended to say.

Mr. HIGBY. I do not withdraw my objection. Gentlemen will have an opportunity to be heard before this debate is closed. I have no idea of closing this debate to-morrow. I do not believe in it.

Mr. ROGERS. Nor do I.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make an argument on the merits of this joint resolution on the present occasion. On the 25th of January last I gave my views and made such arguments as occurred to me against a similar proposition to one of these then reported from the joint committee of fifteen as an amendment to the Constitution. I have not had occasion to change the views I then expressed. I still believe, as I did then, that we ought not to amend the Constitution so as to provide a fundamental law for a people not represented in the action on that amendment. I believe now as I did then, that all the States formerly composing the Union were then and are now States of the Union. I do not believe the rebellion was successful in any manner to accomplish secession. I do not believe it had the effect to take away any of the rights of the loyal citizens of any of the confederate States, but that our success was the preservation of all their rights under the Constitution in the Union.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the recommitment of this joint resolution, and I believe that is the pending question before the House. I do not wish to express any sentiment of disrespect for the individuals composing that committee. I entertain for them entire respect as individuals, but I do aver that that committee has utterly and entirely failed to perform its duty, and has disappointed the country in the action it has taken. That committee to-day stands, in my judgment, between the representatives of the late so-called confederate States and the resumption of their proper duties and functions in the Union and in this Congress.

That committee, sir, was raised and organized in the spirit of party. The resolution by which it was raised did not originate in the House of Representatives, but in a party caucus outside of this Hall, and for party purposes. And the committee in what it has done has acted in the interest of party. It has done perhaps what that caucus and those composing it expected.

What has it done? It has deliberated for five months. It was by the resolution creating it organized for a special and specific purpose, distinctly and clearly expressed in the resolution, and I allege that after having performed that duty as required by the resolution, it ought to have reported and then been discharged.

The resolution organizing the committee is as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That a joint committee of fifteen members shall be appointed, nine of whom shall be members of the House and six of the Senate, who shall inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America, and report whether they or any of them are entitled to be represented in either House of Congress, with leave to report at any time by bill or otherwise; and until such report shall have been made and finally acted upon by Congress, no member shall be received into either House from any of the said so-called confederate States; and all papers relating to the representatives of the said States shall be referred to the said committee without debate."

Mr. Speaker, it appears that the duties of that committee were simply to inquire "whether the so-called confederate States of America are entitled to be represented in the two Houses of Congress." I ask, how have they discharged that duty? Have they reported to the House upon the subject referred to them, that any one of those States is or is not entitled to representation? Have they inquired, and if they have inquired, what information have they given us on that subject? Nothing, absolutely nothing. Their sessions have been secret; their acts and doings have been kept from the public and from this House. And when they have reported, it has been only a mass of testimony I presume no Representative upon this floor has had time or patience or opportunity to read, if he has had the inclination. It has not yet been printed. It has not been laid before the House yet for any available purpose. There is no opportunity for us to judge what is the nature and character of that testimony. The Public Printer has not been able to print it before we are called upon to act upon measures said to be shown to be a necessity by it.

The committee report no facts whatever and give us no conclusion. They simply report amendments to the Constitution. Was that the purpose for which the committee was organized? Was it to change the fundamental law of the land under which we of the loyal States assembled here? Was that the duty with which the committee was charged? Were they to inquire and report an entire change of the fundamental law of the nation which would destroy the States and create an empire? I say they were charged with no such duty. The resolution cannot fairly be construed as giving to the committee any such power, any such jurisdiction.

What, then, has been accomplished? Do we understand from the committee to-day any better the situation of these States than we did at the beginning of this Congress? Have they enlightened us upon the question whether those States are entitled to representation in Congress? I say, as I said before, the committee have not only stood in the way of the representation of those States in this Congress, but they have stood in the way of proper information to this House. If the members from the southern States applying for admission at the beginning of the session had been admitted to seats on the floor of Congress, we should have gained some information. They would have been able to give us official information of the wants and necessities of those States in their character as Representatives, upon their honor as such. But this committee has not deigned to give us a single fact, not even their conclusion upon the facts, if perchance there are facts, as I suppose there are, in that testimony which they have taken.

I ask, then, and I ask sincerely, has the committee entitled itself to have this matter recommitment to it for further action, and for what purpose, what action, is the recommitment to be made? Is it that the committee may go on ad infinitum to take testimony of such persons as they may see fit to be used in the coming election, without giving us the benefit of their conclusions, of their consultations, and of their examinations? When this committee was at first raised it was professedly for the purpose of aiding in the restoration of the Union, and providing for the representation of the absent States, but it has become only a partisan machine in the interest of the Republican party. Its effort and purpose, if we may judge from the reports which it has made, have been, not to furnish a way of restoration, not to ascertain if they were entitled to representation, but to prevent or delay indefinitely both representation and restoration. Every report that has been made has shown upon its face the evidence of a determination to delay, if not to destroy. And the chairman of the committee, in his speech of yesterday at the opening of this debate, said that the southern representatives must not be permitted to come in until we will it.

The committee stands, therefore, resisting the restoration of this Union, and I hope that no further business will be referred to it. It has rendered itself unworthy of the high duty with which it was charged by the resolution which I have read. It has not sought to give us information. It has not sought to furnish us with the evidence whether these States were fit for or entitled to representation. But it is reporting measure after measure that must cause not only delay during the present session of Congress, but delay even beyond this Congress. To adopt the remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] the committee has been seeking how not to restore rather than to restore the Union. Every obstruction, every obstacle which they could contrive, they have placed in the way of restoration.

Now, is it proposed to restore the Union by adopting this amendment to the Constitution? I do not believe that the proposition looks to any such purpose; it has no such object. But the committee, seeing the hand-writing on the wall, seeing the public sentiment of the country in favor of restoration, seeing the disrepute into which it was falling, seeing the character which it had attained before the country, sought to appease and allay that popular sentiment by a compromise in regard to these questions of difference among themselves.

Why is it that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] gives up universal suffrage? Why is it that he and other gentlemen give up universal confiscation? Why is it that other gentlemen give up universal butchery of that people? It is a compromise of what they call principle for the purpose of saving their party in the next fall election.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] said yesterday that they must strike out the third section or the people would be suspicious that this thing was done in the interest of party. Suspicious! Does not the proposed amendment carry on its face the evidence that it originated in the interest of party? It is reported and speeches are made upon it in the interest of party and for party purposes.

The chairman of the committee [Mr. STEVENS] tells us that these States are not necessary to be counted in the submission of this constitutional amendment. He scorns and scorns the idea that they are entitled to the right of rejecting or approving it. And here is another inconsistency on the face of the resolution itself, which in the preamble reads, "that the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution." These States are recognized in the resolution itself; every section, line, and sentence recognizes them as States in the Union. The word "State" is used in the first section, which says, "nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." That has reference only to the southern States, for there was never any necessity to apply it to the northern States.

So in the second section the word "State" is used in the same sense, and also in the third section, admitted on all hands to apply not to the northern but to the southern States exclusively. And yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] tells us that the southern States are not to be counted in adopting or rejecting this proposed amendment.

The second section of the joint resolution is also inconsistent with the action of the committee. They reported the bill known as the "civil rights bill," which has become a law. What necessity is there, then, for this amendment to the Constitution if that bill was constitutional at the time of its passage? Is it not an admission that it was not? Ay, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania gives us here another party reason. He tells us that the time may come when the Democrats will get possession of Congress, and if you depend upon a mere act of Congress, that it will be repealed; and he seeks to evade the popular will and to thwart the popular desire by placing in the Constitution now, while a portion of the States are unrepresented, an amendment to the Constitution, so that the people cannot have their way about it. This is of itself an admission that the whole scheme is in the interest of party alone, to preserve and perpetuate the party idea of this Republican disunion party.

But there is one thing about this resolution which is most remarkable if those eleven States are out of this Union, and it is this: that notwithstanding the proposition here to amend the Constitution in three particulars there is not yet any plan or proposition whatever reported by this committee for the restoration of this Union, or for those States to be represented in Congress. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania is right, and these eleven States are still out of the Union, adopt this amendment without their voice being heard, if you please, adopt it by the vote of nineteen States, and still these States, according to the gentleman's theory, will be out of the Union. Where, then, is your reconstruction, where your restoration in this joint resolution? Where has the committee shown any disposition, any desire for a restoration of the Union? Have they up till to-day reported any measure whereby a restoration of the Union is to be accomplished, whereby these States are ever to be restored and recognized as in the Union? How, under the theory of the gentleman that they are not to be counted or considered, because out of the Union, are they ever under this measure to become members of this Union? If they are not now members will the adoption of this amendment to the Constitution make them members of this Union? Certainly not. They are no more in the Union then or entitled to representation in Congress than now.

Here, then, is another gross inconsistency, showing the purpose and the object of this measure. The third section is admitted even by the friends of the other two to carry upon its face the purpose of disfranchising the people of these eleven States and preventing them from taking part in the representation of this country. It is said by the gentleman from Ohio that if that section is not stricken out the people will come to the conclusion that this is a party measure. Sir, I have said no one can doubt it in the light of the history of this committee. It was organized in a party caucus. The resolution authorizing it was brought into the House by the man selected to do it by that caucus. It was presented to the House and supported solely by the caucus party; and immediately everything brought into the House having relation to the representation of the southern States in this Congress was consigned without debate to this vortex of ruin, of destruction, and of disunion. We have therefore been able to gain no information from any source on the subject of reconstruction or restoration or representation of those States.

The resolution may have been differently intended; but from its face no one can come to the conclusion that it intended anything more than that the committee should be authorized to inquire into the fact as to whether these States were legally and constitutionally entitled to be represented in either House of Congress; and yet the committee, arrogating to themselves all power upon this subject, have repeatedly reported amendments to the Constitution without giving us one fact or one reason for it, or any information as to when our troubles will be ended and the Union restored.

The people of this country, as I remarked in the beginning, are dissatisfied with that committee. It has disappointed the country. Go to-day, if you dare, and submit to the people of the United States the question whether that committee should longer be intrusted with this subject, and what do you think the vote would be? I tell you that it would be ten to one that the committee had disappointed the expectations of the country; that it should be discharged; that its duties were ended; that it had been a failure; that it had stood in the way of restoration and peace.

I tell you further that the people of this country demand the present, immediate restoration of this Union. And you will find, when the elections come around again, that they will speak in thunder tones to you politicians. You cannot compromise with them by surrendering principle for mere expediency, for mere party purposes. You will have to face the music, for the people will demand it of you. They have struggled long and ardently for the Union; they have sacrificed lives and treasure for the Union; they have been ardently devoted to the Union, and they will not surrender it for party purposes; they will not consent to keep the people of the southern States in bondage, such as Ireland has suffered so long, for the mere purpose of retaining a party in power.

I do not wonder that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] prophesied the time as not being more than three or four years distant when the people will place in power men who will respect the Constitution, who will respect the Union and the sacrifices that have been made for it, and who are willing to restore, preserve, and perpetuate that Union.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] yield to me a moment, for a question?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Certainly, for a question.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to ask the gentleman, as he has spoken of the Democracy of his district, whether his home organ, the Fond-du-Lac Press, represents the Democracy of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It does not. There is no paper on earth which represents the Democracy of this country.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman allow me to send to the Clerk's desk, to have read, an extract from that paper?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. No, sir.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman allow me to read half a dozen lines from his home organ?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. No, sir, because I have already said that we do not recognize it or any other paper as the representative of the Democratic party. We recognize no one person as authorized to speak for the Democracy. We speak by our acts; we are for the Union and always have been, and do not propose to let you prevent a restoration of the Union if we can help it.

Mr. WINDOM. I will ask the gentleman if he himself considers Jeff. Davis a traitor. His home organ says he is not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. You work it in in that way, do you? [Laughter.] Well, I will say that I think he is. So you see the organ, as you call it, and I do not always agree.

Mr. WINDOM. I did not know how that was.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Now will the gentleman tell me whether he thinks that any one who seeks to prevent a restoration of the Union is a traitor?

Mr. WINDOM. In some certain circumstances I think he is.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Well, "in some certain circumstances" I think he is, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman allow me to read something from the papers in his own district?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. No, sir.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, I have said pretty much all I desired to say. Much is said for the purpose of prejudicing the public mind about the readmission of red-handed traitors into the councils of the nation, and the question often suggested as to whether we can become reconciled to them. Sir, the war is ended; peace has been agreed upon; and men who have been in arms have laid them down. There is an agreement that we will forgive them, and if the fraternal union of our fathers is ever restored we must. Do you expect that those people will ever become reconciled to you if you do not become reconciled to them? And can that ever take place if you talk as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McKEE] has talked this afternoon? If you would hang them all; if you would crush them all; if you would hate them forever, do you think they can shake hands with you, and live upon terms of amity and friendship with you? You wonder that they are not instantly reconciled to you; you wonder that they do not at once forgive and forget the past. But who here of the prominent politicians of the Republican party has ever been able to forgive? You are the conquerors; you have triumphed. You can afford to be magnanimous. You can forgive without mortification. But can they do the same? Consider what they must suffer. I expect that it will be long years before these bloody days will be forgotten either in the North or in the South. But we must live together as one nation, as one people, and the sooner we can forget and forgive the better; the happier, the more prosperous and happy shall we be as a nation.

I did hope that a better and a kindlier feeling was growing up in the North; but when I hear men talking about branding traitors and making them wear the brand upon their foreheads until the snows of winter shall lie upon their graves, such hatred, such malignity, it seems to me, will not only keep alive, but perpetuate forever, sentiments of alienation and hostility. The Union of our fathers was a Union of fraternal feeling and mutual interest, and we must restore that Union, or the duty resting upon us will not be performed. If you are unable to forgive and forget the past you cannot expect the people of the South to forget and become reconciled to you. They may have been wrong; they were wrong; but this fact does not change the nature of men. Human nature is the same everywhere. I am prepared to forgive, in the interest of country and Union. Upon no other condition are we promised forgiveness by divine authority.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] has made some remarks in derogation of the joint committee on reconstruction. I do not purpose to reply at length to those remarks. He has said that the action of the committee is a failure. We knew very well from the beginning that so far as he and his friends were concerned the labors of the committee would be a failure. He puts, however, in behalf, I suppose, of himself and his Democratic friends, one question which I feel bound to answer. He says, "The committee have not told us when our troubles"—meaning, I suppose, the troubles of himself and his Democratic friends—"will cease."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Oh, no; the gentleman certainly misunderstood me. I meant the troubles which the Republicans themselves were making.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The troubles of the gentleman and his friends are very likely to increase.

But, Mr. Speaker, the chief object which I have now in view—and I trust that in seeking to attain that object I shall not go beyond the line of parliamentary debate into the domain of partisan controversy—is to show how the proposition now before us from that committee traverses the policy of the Democratic party with reference to the reconstruction of the Government.

I admit that the policy of the Democratic body is a simple policy. It is a policy easily comprehended. It is a policy in which for ten years, within my observation, they have been consistent. It is a policy which they laid down as early as 1856, in the platform made at Cincinnati, wherein they declared substantially—for I cannot recite the precise language of the declaration as it is many years since I read those resolutions—that it was the right of a Territory to be admitted into this Union with such institutions as it chose to establish, not even by implication admitting that the representatives of the existing Government had any right to canvass those institutions, or to consider the right of the Territory to be recognized as a State.

Now, sir, from that doctrine, which probably had its origin in the resolutions of 1798, the whole of their policy to this day has legitimately followed. First, we saw its results in the doctrine of Mr. Buchanan, announced in 1860, that, while the Constitution did not provide for or authorize the secession of a State from this Union, there was no power in the existing Government to compel a State to remain in the Union against its own judgment. Following that doctrine they come legitimately to the conclusion of to-day, in which they are supported, as I understand, by the President of the United States upon the one side, and, as I know, by the testimony of Alexander H. Stephens, late vice president of the so-called confederacy, upon the other. That doctrine is that these eleven States have to-day, each for itself, an existing and unquestionable right of representation in the Government of this country, and that it is a continuous right which has not been interrupted by any of the events of the war.

This is a simple policy. It is a direct policy. It is a policy which can be comprehended. It is the policy of the Democratic party. Now, whether the President of the United States or the humblest citizen of the country accepts or avows it, he has no right whatever to call it his policy. It is the policy of the Democratic party.

I wish to lay before the House a proposition, and I beg the attention of Democratic gentlemen to it. I have written out the proposition with some care, and I think that I state exactly, and I hope not unfavorably, the position of the Democratic party on this question. The proposition is this:

1. The Democratic party maintains that a State of the American Union cannot by its own acts separate itself from its associates.

2. That the events of this war, including the individual, organized, and public acts of the people and governments of the eleven rebellious States, have not in any way changed the constitutional relations which previous to the war subsisted between those people and States on the one hand and the national Government on the other; and, as a consequence,

3. That those States respectively, and the loyal people thereof, have an immediate and unquestionable right of representation; provided, always, that in each case the person elected now is, and heretofore has been, loyal to the Government and a supporter of the Constitution of the country, of which fact each House is the sole judge on the question of the right of a claimant to a seat; and therefore,

4. That no legislation or amendment of the Constitution is necessary, or even proper, as a prerequisite to the full exercise of the right of representation in the Congress of the United States by the people and States lately in insurrection.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will insert the words "the loyal people" I think he will state the position some Democratic gentlemen take.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That is the difference between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and his friend, Mr. Stephens, of Georgia. Possibly there may be no difference. Stephens insists that if a man be loyal to-day there shall be no inquiry into his previous character.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I do not know by what authority the gentleman classifies me with Mr. Stephens.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will not make any classification disagreeable to the gentleman. I wish to ask whether he means by the word "loyal" a man who declares himself to be loyal now, or does he propose to ascertain whether the man has heretofore been loyal?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I mean to say, on the question of representation, that when a man comes from a State, competent to be qualified as you and I have qualified, we should admit him.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That is a proposition, and not an answer to the question.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has urged the great consistency of the Democratic party. If he will allow me, I will send to the Clerk's desk, to be read, a portion of the Chicago platform. I would like to show the inconsistencies of his own party.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no time for the inconsistencies of any party. When I have proved the consistency of the gentleman's own party I think he ought to be satisfied. They have been consistent in wrong-doing so far as the interests of the country are concerned, and upon the point I make an observation which I desire to have considered in connection with the distinction with which I preface it.

I do not say that every man who supports the propositions which I have stated here to-day gave aid and comfort to the rebellion and participated in treason, but the converse of this proposition is true, and the country ought to notice the fact. The instincts of men are higher than the reason of men, for through the instincts God teaches without the intervention of fallible logic and theories of reason. The instincts of men are right on all these matters. The affirmative proposition that I lay down is, that as far as there is any testimony before the country, every traitor of the South and every sympathizer with treason in the North sustains the policy of the Democratic party and the President. That is an alarming fact.

Mr. CHANLER. The gentleman dropped his voice and we have not been able to hear the last words which he uttered.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If I have said something that the gentleman from New York did not hear I commend him to the Globe of tomorrow morning, for I do not propose to make any change in what I said.

Mr. CHANLER. The gentleman's argument was evidently confined to his own party as we did not hear it here.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Now, then, we traverse these propositions, and if there be any gentleman upon this floor not identified with the Democratic party who still sustains what he understands to be the executive policy, I will offer him five minutes of the brief time remaining to me to show to the House and country where the policy of the President differs from the ancient and consistent policy of the Democratic party.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I will show the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman is not called upon.

With all kindness I desire to ask my friend who represents the sixth district of the city of New York [Mr. RAYMOND] whether he does not see that these propositions, which are sustained by the President and the Democrats throughout the country, if carried into effect portend the destruction of the Government.

First, chiefly we traverse the Democratic propositions by a resolution now before this House in this particular. We admit equality of representation based upon the exercise of the elective franchise by the people. The proposition in the matter of suffrage falls short of what I desire, but so far as it goes it tends to the equalization of the inequality at present existing; and while I demand and shall continue to demand the franchise for all loyal male citizens of this country—and I cannot but admit the possibility that ultimately those eleven States may be restored to representative power without the right of franchise being conferred upon the colored people—I should feel myself doubly humiliated and disgraced, and criminal even, if I hesitated to do what I can for a proposition which equalizes representation.

Can any party or any man defend the proposition now before the country to allow the States lately in rebellion to come in with their power undiminished, so that two rebel soldiers, whose hands are dripping with the blood of our fellow-men, whose opinions as to the right of this Government to exist are unchanged, shall exercise the political power of three loyal Union soldiers? Yet the gentlemen who support this proposition ask the country to accept these States here with their representation undiminished. And those echoing the language of Alexander Stephens are unwilling that the Constitution shall be amended in this particular until the return of the eleven States, thereby rendering it absolutely impossible that there shall be any adjustment of these difficulties after the return of those States.

I can do no less than say that I believe that the man of whatsoever party or State who adopts this proposition or uses his influence for its support by the people, is recreant to the cause of justice, of liberty, and of humanity on this continent. And yet, to that doctrine, so full of injustice, and so flagrant in principle, the Democratic party is committed. And in this hour of the nation's peril it is our sad misfortune that we are compelled to admit that he who has received the suffrage of a generous people for the second office in the gift of the country accepts that as his doctrine.

The justification of all this is "once a State always a State;" that there is no power in the General Government to resist this policy; and that we who say that nothing shall be done in the way of restoration to political power to those States until this inequality is adjusted, are ourselves disturbers of the public peace and advocates of disunion.

Well, sir, I am for a Union, and for that Union only in which there is substantial justice among the men and between the States composing it. I accept one fact, and no gentleman can escape the force of that fact, and that is, that these eleven States are not to-day represented in the Congress of this country, and with my consent they never shall be until this inequality is adjusted, or its adjustment provided for. That is the fact. How it has come to pass that they are not represented is not material to the business we have in hand. I accept the statement made by Mr. Lincoln in his last public address, that these States are out of their proper practical relations to the Union, and I assert as a necessary and natural consequence that they cannot get into their proper relation except by our consent who represent the loyal States of this country. This is the material fact, and it is wholly unnecessary at the present time to inquire into the truth or falsity of the various theories which have been presented on the subject.

Some objection has been made by gentlemen on this side of the House, as well as the other, to the third section of the article reported by the committee. I freely confess that the adoption of the third section is not necessary to the subject-matter which we have in hand. My own views of reconstruction lead me in the opposite direction. I should prefer to include those who are our friends rather than exclude even those who are our enemies. But inasmuch as gentlemen on this floor are not prepared, as they say, to include those in the governing force of the country who have sustained the country, I see no safety in the present except in some sort of exclusion of those who are its enemies. We are to consider what sort of enemies these men are. We have defeated them in arms, but in the proposition of the Democratic party, we invite them to the only field in which they have any chance of success in the contest in which they have been engaged.

They have been beaten, and what do you ask, and what do you offer? You ask them to come into the councils of the nation where they have a chance of success, and where the only chance of success remains. Who are these men? They are the men who to-day are radically, honestly, persistently, and religiously opposed to this Government if this Government exercises its functions. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] may not have heard of what Mr. Stephens told the committee; and who is Mr. Stephens? Mr. Stephens was believed to be the most conservative, most Union-loving man in the whole southern country; and if the opinions to which I shall refer be his opinions, with how much stronger reason may we suppose that they are the opinions of those to whom formerly he himself was somewhat opposed. What does he tell us? He tells us that in 1861 he protested against the action of the secessionists, not because he believed that they had not a constitutional basis upon which to stand, but because he thought secession bad policy, and he says that to-day his opinions are unchanged; that is to say, Mr. Stephens believes that this Government has no right to exist if the insignificant State of Florida, for instance, thinks it ought not to exist; and what Mr. Stephens believes, according to his own testimony, is believed by the great majority of the people whom he represents in Georgia, and in various portions of the South, and whose views he understands. These are the men that you are invited to receive into the Government of the country, men who deny the right of this Government to exist.

It is said by gentlemen on the other side of the House that when they present a Representative here he must be a loyal man. I need not say to gentlemen acquainted with the technicalities of the law, that a loyal man, for all purposes of representation, is a man whose disloyalty cannot be proved. When we open the doors of the Senate and of this House to representatives from that section of the country, they will only have to present men who cannot be convicted of having participated actively and willingly in the work of treason; but they may send men here who represent treasonable and disunion opinions, and we shall have no power to protect ourselves against them. When ever was a more insidious idea presented to the people of this country than that there is any security in demanding merely loyal representatives? We are false to our duty if we do not go further and require that in each of these States, before they are allowed representation, the masses of the people shall be loyal, for the representative will reflect the views of the people. You cannot gather figs from thorns, or grapes from thistles. You must wait, if it be necessary to wait, until there is a loyal controlling public sentiment in each one of these States. It is nothing to this country that Tennessee sends Mr. Maynard, a loyal man, here. We want to know what Tennessee is; and the circumstance that Mr. Maynard is himself a loyal man, if his State is not loyal, is a reason why he should neither ask to be received or we submit to his admission. And it is not sufficient that there be loyal districts in the State. A State is represented in the Senate and in the House as a State. There is no constitutional capacity for representation except through State organization. Representatives in this House are apportioned by the Constitution among the several States.

When we find that Tennessee is, as a whole, loyal to the Government, then we may accept Representatives from Tennessee, and trust to the people to send loyal men here. But if we accept Representatives from Tennessee because they, individually, are loyal, while Tennessee herself is disloyal, you will have thrust into this House and into the Government of the country disloyal men; and what does it portend? Mr. Stephens denies the constitutional efficacy of our amendment abolishing slavery. He says that slavery has been abolished by the States. He says that the law taxing the people of this country has no constitutional force, because they are not represented. Do you not see that his insidious and dangerous doctrines, which are responded to by the whole Democratic party of the country, portend the destruction of the public credit, the repudiation of the public debt, and the disorganization of society?

We are the conservative, the order-seeking, the Union-loving, the loyal men of the country. They who oppose measures for the pacification of the country with reference to the rights of the States and the rights of men are the disorganizers, the disloyal and dangerous men of this Republic.

Sir, it will be found that the Union party stands unitedly upon two propositions. The first is equality of representation, about which there is no difference of opinion. The second is, that there shall be a loyal people in each applicant State before any representative from that State is admitted in Congress. And there is a third; a vast majority of the Republican party, soon to be the controlling and entire force of that party, demand suffrage for our friends, for those who have stood by us in our days of tribulation. And for myself, with the right of course to change my opinion, I believe in the constitutional power of the Government to-day to extend the elective franchise to every loyal male citizen of the Republic.

If I have any time left I will yield it to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has two minutes of his half hour left.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is so short a time I will not avail myself of it, as it will not admit of any reply from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND.]

SUFFRAGE IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill concerning the elective franchise in the Territories of the United States and the admission of new States into the Union; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. TAYLOR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to increase the pensions of certain disabled officers of the volunteer service; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ORTH asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. FARQUHAR, for two weeks from last Monday.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to give notice that unless the House shall feel otherwise inclined I will to-morrow, at three o'clock, call the previous question, and ask a vote on this joint resolution. Several of our friends wish to go away to-morrow evening, and I desire that they shall have the pleasure of voting for this measure before they leave the city.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, the report of the committee has elicited in this House a most searching criticism. It is approved and disapproved, either wholly or in part, according to the views entertained by the particular individuals who have obtained the floor.

It does not, in all respects, come up to the standard which my imperfect judgment had erected, but I have lived long enough to know that very few things of a public character can be accomplished without some abnegation of one's own notions of propriety, and a respectful deference to the opinions of others.

The joint committee on reconstruction was made up of able and patriotic men. They have labored assiduously for nearly six months, and have now given to us the result of their deliberations in certain proposed amendments of the Constitution, and sundry propositions for legislative enactment.

Regarding it as more important that some definite projet be presented by Congress to the people of the United States than that the plan itself approach very nearly to perfection, and fearing the effect of amendments upon the successful passage of the measures proposed through Congress, I have brought my mind to the conclusion that I shall best subserve the cause of patriotism and the country's good by voting severally and collectively for the measures reported by the committee.

We are in the process of legislation to bring back into the councils of the nation a class of citizens who during the last five years have avowed the most inveterate hostility to our Government and its free institutions, and who have waged a most cruel war against our people upon the battle-field. Does any sane man believe that the loyal people of the United States who have submitted to these great sacrifices, who have incurred the risk of losing the benefit of the free institutions handed down to them by our fathers, who have, by the bravery of their sons, put down this accursed rebellion upon the battle-field; I say, does any reflecting man suppose that we are so bereft of our senses as to admit these same men, "without a why or a wherefore," into the Halls of Congress to make laws for our government, and the government of our fellow-citizens at home, who are quite as loyal as ourselves? Sir, it is idle to say that any sane man expects it. It seems to me that the only question for our consideration is, what guarantees may Congress exact from this rebellious people—a people who not only fought us, but who declared time and again that they detested our principles of government, and that they would sooner unite with the monarchies of Great Britain and France than live under our free Government with the race they in derision termed "the Yankees?"

It has been said in high places that treason was the greatest of crimes, and that it should be made known for the benefit of all coming generations, and as an example to the civilized world that traitors would surely be punished. We have heard it said by those in authority that the leading traitors should be tried and hung, while the infatuated rank and file might be pardoned. That is very well; but I would inquire, what leading traitors have been hung? What leading traitor has been hung? What leading traitors or what leading traitor will be hung?

Mr. GRINNELL. Mrs. Surratt.

Mr. SPALDING. "Mrs. Surratt!" She was tried and sentenced and hung as an assassin, and not as a traitor.

Now, sir, we propose to amend the Constitution of the United States in several respects.

As to the first measure proposed, a person may read it five hundred years hence without gathering from it any idea that this rebellion ever existed. The same may be said of the second proposition, for it only proposes that, the bondsmen being made free, the apportionment of Representatives in Congress shall be based upon the whole number of persons who exercise the elective franchise, instead of the population.

The third section—and this is the one to which exception is taken by my friends on the right and left—proposes that no person who was actively engaged in rebellion against our Government shall have the right to vote for members of Congress or for electors of the President and Vice President of the United States until the year 1870. Is this exceptionable? Is it objectionable? If it be so, it is, in my judgment, for the reason that the duration of the period of incapacity is not extended more widely. I take my stand here that it is necessary to ingraft into that enduring instrument, called the Constitution of the United States, something which shall admonish this rebellious people and all who shall come after them that treason against the Government is odious; that it carries with it some penalty, some disqualification; and the only one which we seek to attach by this amendment is a disqualification in voting—not for their State and county and town officers, but for members of Congress, who are to be the law-makers, and for the Executive of the United States, this disqualification to operate for the short period of four years. Now, sir, will any patriotic, any loyal man object to putting this memorial upon the Constitution as they would put "memento mori" upon the head of a tombstone?

But, sir, there is another reason why we should ingraft this provision upon the Constitution. All our congressional legislation may be considered as ephemeral. I know that my friends on the other side of the House always take courage when we advance the idea that at some remote period they may gain possession of the controlling power in these Halls and carry measures according to the dictates of their own wisdom and sense of patriotism. Sir, let the effect fall where it may, and give consolation to whom it will, I still declare that all these matters are within the bounds, not only of possibility, but of probability, that at some not very remote period, if we admit Representatives from the rebel States into this Hall without qualification, the prospect is that, in conjunction with their friends who have so strongly sympathized with them during the four years of this recent strife, they will repeal many, if not all, of the measures which we have adopted for the welfare and the salvation of the country. Hence I insist that something of this sort should go into the Constitution, where it shall require not only the action of the Senate and the House of Representatives, but the action of the State Legislatures to erase it. For this reason, and because it is dangerous at this moment to receive these men here to make laws for the loyal people of the country, I go for the adoption of this third section, which disqualifies active and known rebels from participating in the election of Federal officers.

Mr. Speaker, much has said, much has been said—too much, sometimes, has been said—about the difference between Congress and the Executive of the nation. Sir, I look upon this subject in a somewhat different light from some of my friends whose superior wisdom I am proud to acknowledge. I feel that under our Government we owe some deference to the station of the President of the United States; and I feel that, however we may differ in sentiment with the incumbent of that high office, we ought, at all times and under all circumstances, to treat him respectfully. Hence I would have preferred, from the first hour of this Congress to the last, that there should have been no personal abuse of the incumbent of the presidential chair.

I honor my friends for standing up manfully to their own opinions. There is a difference between the President and Congress; and, as I conceive, that difference amounts to this: the majority in Congress believe that it would be prejudicial to the best interests of our Government and nation to receive back, immediately and unconditionally, the men who were lately in rebellion. I believe this, as I believe any other great truth which was ever set before my mind for belief. I have no doubt upon the subject. Hence I cannot but be surprised that a gentleman who has gone through the rugged experience of the President of the United States should be willing and ready to trust those men now without having some of those guarantees which we are insisting upon. It is a difference of policy, as gentlemen say. Let it be a difference of policy. We will admit that our policy is to receive back these rebellious States with suitable guarantees.

It is the policy of the President of the United States, in the faith that they will conduct themselves loyally and properly, to receive them without these guarantees.

I suppose these to be the respective systems of policy of the President and of Congress. While we maintain steadfastly what we believe to be the rights of the legislative branch of this Government, while we adhere firmly to our opinions and go on legislating for such measures as we suppose the public good demands at our hands, and do it firmly, decidedly, independently, may we not, at the same time, do it without casting personal reproach upon or indulging in personal abuse of the incumbent of the presidential chair? Sir, I believe I have the character among my constituents of being sufficiently radical for all useful purposes. I am prepared to vote here with my party friends, side by side with him who goes for the most extreme measures, but at the same time I deny the necessity of using personal invectives toward the Executive of the nation or the heads of the Departments. It cannot be necessary. It is not justifiable. We have all business to transact for our constituents with the President and the Departments. We must necessarily be brought into contact with them, and we expect to be received and treated by them as gentlemen. Why cannot we speak of them without indulging in vilification and abuse?

I have already said that, believing in the wisdom, patriotism, and sagacity of the committee which has reported the measures under consideration, I shall avail myself of their praiseworthy labors and shall vote for one and all of their propositions. I am content to take the whole of them, and hope they will be put through both branches of Congress, so that the people may see that we have a policy as well as the President.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the committee on reconstruction, through their honorable chairman, [Mr. STEVENS,] have reported to this House a proposition for certain amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which, if approved by two thirds of both Houses and then ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, will become a part thereof.

The article of the proposed amendment contains five sections.

The first provides that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The second section provides that Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever in any State the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age.

The third section prohibits, until the 4th of July, 1870, from voting for Representatives in Congress and for electors of President and Vice President of the United States, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort.

The fourth section provides that—

Neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation already incurred in aid of insurrection or war against the United States, or for any claim for compensation for loss of involuntary service or labor.

And the fifth section gives Congress the power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

These proposed amendments now being under consideration, I will give my views briefly in regard to them.

As to the first, it is so just that no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny equal protection of the laws, and so clearly within the spirit of the Declaration of Independence of the 4th of July, 1776, that no member of this House can seriously object to it.

The next, as to representation, I deem the most important amendment, and is in fact the corner-stone of the stability of our Government. In the Constitution of the United States of 17th of September, 1787, in section two, under article one, it is provided that—

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."

The word "slave" was not very palatable to the venerable gentlemen who framed that Constitution, and therefore they used the words "all others," which, of course, meant slaves. Before the rebellion the slave States had a representation in Congress of nineteen for slaves and about five for free blacks, and slavery being now abolished, the other two fifths would add say thirteen more, making about thirty-seven Representatives from the black man's population. Now, conceding to each State the right to regulate the right of suffrage, they ought not to have a representation for male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age, whether white or black, who are deprived of the exercise of suffrage. This amendment will settle the complication in regard to suffrage and representation, leaving each State to regulate that for itself, so that it will be for it to decide whether or not it shall have a representation for all its male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age.

This amendment, Mr. Speaker, if adopted, will give the country a sufficient guarantee against any contingency that might arise in the admission of representatives from the States lately in rebellion—I mean such men as did not voluntarily engage in the rebellion, and can take the oath prescribed by existing laws. I do not regard the amendment of the constitutions of those States of much practical importance, for the same power that makes the amendments may unmake; but to annul an amendment to the Constitution of the United States requires the consent of two thirds of both Houses of Congress and a ratification by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States or by a convention in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by Congress; and if this amendment is adopted it is not likely it will ever be altered so as to endanger the loyal States—I mean by the loyal States those States that aided us in putting down the rebellion.

Mr. Speaker, as we have now a large Union majority in both Houses, it is the time to pass the requisite amendments, so as to have the same submitted to the respective States for ratification, and I trust that the Governors of those States whose Legislatures may have adjourned will, immediately after the approval of these amendments by Congress, convene the Legislatures in order that they may ratify them.

The third section, though it seems just on its face, I doubt the propriety of embodying it with the other amendments, as it may retard, if not endanger, the ratification of the amendment in regard to representation, and we cannot afford to endanger in any manner a matter of such vital importance to the country. I therefore, Mr. Speaker, propose to strike out this third section and submit it as a separate and distinct proposition, which certainly ought to meet the approval of all our friends. I cannot concur with the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWEN,] that every part of a State must be strictly loyal before allowed a representation in Congress. I fear if that doctrine should be carried out some of our northern States would be left without representation in Congress; that rule might, however, suit very well for Massachusetts where they seem to be nearly all of one opinion.

The honorable gentleman, to enforce his views, repeated a portion of what Alexander H. Stephens, late vice president of the so-called southern confederacy, stated before the committee on reconstruction. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that the sentiment expressed by that rebel southerner ought to have any bearing upon the action of this House, except so far as to prevent him from ever having a seat in either branch of Congress or holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. The honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] in his remarks, seemed to think we ought not to irritate the southern people. While I do not wish to inflict any unnecessary hardships upon those States, we certainly have right to demand of them a sure guarantee, and they ought to thank their God that they have been dealt with so leniently after inflicting upon the country a debt of nearly $3,000,000,000, and causing such great affliction throughout the land.

I do not wish to be understood that I would screen the leaders of the rebellion from punishment, for on them rests the sin of misleading the great mass of the southern people. These people may be thankful if they are permitted to live within and under the protection of the United States, and enjoy their property, or a portion of it, without participating in the affairs of the Government whose very life they had attempted to destroy; but Congress does not object to a representation from those States when a sufficient guarantee is given by ratifying the requisite amendments to the Constitution of the United States, provided they send here loyal men.

I feel rejoiced that my worthy colleague [Mr. STEVENS] has consented to forego some of his views in order to meet those of his Republican friends in this House in regard to amendments; and I hope the same frankness will be manifested at the other end of the Capitol.

The fourth section is to prohibit the assumption by the United States, or any of the States, of the rebel debt incurred in aid of the insurrection or war against the United States, or any claim for compensation for loss of involuntary service or labor.

The importance of this amendment, Mr. Speaker, is manifest, as there is no telling what influence may be brought to bear upon Congress at some future day when southern people have seats upon this floor. And as to the States it is necessary, in order to encourage emigration to those States, that there should be some security against inflicting such debts upon those who may choose to settle there. This amendment is also demanded by the loyal people of the country, and is similar to one which passed this House by an almost unanimous vote in the early part of the session.

The fifth section gives to Congress the power to enforce the provisions of this article by appropriate legislation. This of course is requisite to enforce the foregoing sections, or such of them as may be adopted, and is too plain to admit of argument; and in fact is not, as I am aware, contested by any gentleman in this House.

In conclusion, I would repeat, Mr. Speaker, what I had occasion once before to announce on the floor of this House, that the only three amendments I deem important to the Constitution of the United States as a sure guarantee were these, to wit:

1. That the representation in Congress shall be apportioned among the several States according to the qualified voters of each State;

2. That the rebel debt incurred in the late rebellion shall never be assumed by the United States or any State; and

3. To allow a tax or duty on exports, so that foreign countries which purchase cotton shall pay a duty thereon. And it is not probable that it would be imposed on any other staple exported, and besides, the duty thus derived would doubtless amount to a very large sum in aid of replenishing the Treasury. This latter might reach some of those who in the late rebellion were aiding the rebels.

It is true this latter proposition is not now before the House, but it is before the Judiciary Committee, and I trust that committee will soon report favorably, and I certainly cannot doubt its passage by a two-thirds vote.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 352) to incorporate the National Theological Institute; when the Speaker signed the same.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

Mr. CULLOM, by unanimous consent, introduced an act to regulate proceedings before justices of the peace, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

COMPENSATION TO A CLERK.

Mr. CULLOM also, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the compensation of John Bailey, assistant disbursing clerk, be, and the same is hereby, increased and made the same as that of the Journal clerk, beginning with the present Congress.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, at an early day during this session I offered for the consideration of the House the following propositions:

1. That the United States as conquerors in war now have the political power of the States recently in rebellion.

2. That, until action by Congress, the President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, has authority to organize and maintain government within said States.

3. That the said States are not entitled to take part in the government of the United States until Congress shall, on such terms as it may prescribe, confer upon them the power to act.

4. That, disclaiming all desire to impose on them hostile or burdensome conditions, and mindful only of irreversible guarantees against future disunion or secession and of plighted faith to all who have aided in the overthrow of this rebellion, we declare it to be an indispensable condition for the recognition of said States that their constitutions should secure to all the inhabitants thereof equal rights before the law without distinction of color or race.

The resolution embodying these propositions was referred, under the rule of the House, to the committee on reconstruction, and the action of that committee is now before the House in the form of a proposed amendment to the Constitution and of two bills, which will be considered in their order.

The proposed amendment contains five sections, and they are as follows:

SEC. 1. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever, in any State, the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age.

SEC. 3. Until the 4th day of July, 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for Representatives in Congress and for electors for President and Vice President of the United States.

SEC. 4. Neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation already incurred, or which may hereafter be incurred, in aid of insurrection or of war against the United States, or any claim for compensation for loss of involuntary service or labor.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

This amendment is not, as I believe, all that ought to be offered by that committee and passed by this House and made by the loyal Legislatures of the United States a part of our organic law; but it is right as far as it goes, and upon careful examination I find contained in it no compromise of principle. That being settled I am willing to defer to the opinions of other gentlemen, and be content with the best that can be obtained.

In the fourth proposition submitted by me in December last I stated what, in my judgment, we ought to demand. But that cannot be had. The time will come, I do not doubt, when in this Union of ours all men will stand equal before the law in their political and civil rights.

One amendment to the Constitution has been passed by this House and rejected by the Senate. I felt compelled to vote against it here although I regretted to be separated from friends whose judgment I respect. But for the reasons which I briefly gave at the time I could not unite with them upon the proposition then made.

The amendment now offered, while it is not all I could ask, is not open to the objections which then controlled my vote.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I shall very briefly give my reasons for sustaining the report of the committee and voting for the amendment which they offer to the House.

I support the first section because the doctrine it declares is right, and if, under the Constitution as it now stands, Congress has not the power to prohibit State legislation discriminating against classes of citizens or depriving any persons of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or denying to any persons within the State the equal protection of the laws, then, in my judgment, such power should be distinctly conferred. I voted for the civil rights bill, and I did so under a conviction that we have ample power to enact into law the provisions of that bill. But I shall gladly do what I may to incorporate into the Constitution provisions which will settle the doubt which some gentlemen entertain upon that question.

The second section, Mr. Speaker, is, in my judgment, as nearly correct as it can be without being fully, in full measure, right. But one thing is right, and that is secured by the amendment. Manifestly no State should have its basis of national representation enlarged by reason of a portion of citizens within its borders to which the elective franchise is denied. If political power shall be lost because of such denial, not imposed because of participation in rebellion or other crime, it is to be hoped that political interests may work in the line of justice, and that the end will be the impartial enfranchisement of all citizens not disqualified by crime. Whether that end shall be attained or not, this will be secured: that the measure of political power of any State shall be determined by that portion of its citizens which can speak and act at the polls, and shall not be enlarged because of the residence within the State of portions of its citizens denied the right of franchise. So much for the second section of the amendment. It is not all that I wish and would demand; but odious inequalities are removed by it and representation will be equalized, and the political rights of all citizens will under its operation be, as we believe, ultimately recognized and admitted.

The third section, Mr. Speaker, disables until July 4, 1870, those who voluntarily sought to destroy the Government from taking part in the election of President and Representatives in Congress.

Will any gentleman venture upon this side of the House to argue that such men should be restored at once to all their political rights within the Union? It is clear upon adjudged law that the States lately in rebellion, and the inhabitants of those States, by force of the civil war and of the Union triumph in that war, so far have lost their rights to take part in the Government of the Union that some action on the part of Congress is required to restore those rights. Pardon and amnesty given by the President cannot restore them. Those men cannot vote for President or for Representatives in Congress until in some way Congress has so acted as to restore their power. The question, then, is very simple: shall national power be at once conferred on those who have striven by all means open to them to destroy the nation's life? Shall our enemies and the enemies of the Government, as soon as they have been defeated in war, help to direct and to control the public policy of the Government? And that, too, while those men, hostile themselves, keep from all exercise of political power the only true and loyal friends whom we have had during these four years of war within these southern States.

Mr. Speaker, if this war has not been fought in vain; if our young men have not in vain offered up their lives in battle for their country; if the treasure and life of this land have not been sacrificed for naught, this thing must not be done.

But, Mr. Speaker, this section is not vital to this amendment. It may be stricken out, and the affirmative value of the amendment will yet be retained. I do not agree with those gentlemen who have contended that the amendment would be in effect deprived of its great value if the third section is omitted from it. The objection to it, the only objection which I remember to have heard, excepting that made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] which was answered by his colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK,] is based upon the argument that the section would be practically inoperative. If that can be shown it should not be retained. But I have this to say in reply to this suggestion: there are two descriptions of persons who may be affected by this section. There are, first, the masses of men who do not direct affairs, but are themselves guided and controlled by others. There are, as we have reason to believe, multitudes of these men who had no heart for the rebellion, as they could see no profit to themselves even in its success. They were led into it, seduced into it, dragged into it; yet, being engaged, they may have so far voluntarily aided as to be within the letter of this section. From their early life these men had been accustomed to defer to the will of others. Now, there may be difficulty in applying this provision to such as these. Indeed, I am not anxious that it should be too generally applied. And it would probably be found, in the practical operation of this section, that such men were not so "voluntarily" acting as to be embraced by its terms. The will was wanting. They engaged in the rebellion more by force of the will of others than of their own. But this section would reach the solid rebels, the men of weight, of personal force, of high social character and position, the leaders in the various circles; these men would be reached. There might be doubt as to the others, but here there would be no doubt. In every community the leading men are known; because they were leaders they are known. They have controlled affairs, they have formed public opinion, they have swayed and directed and planned. Without these men of leading character, and strong will, and personal individual energy, the rebellion could not have gained its great proportions. These men knew well what they wanted, and they knew well how they might most surely succeed. Whether in field or camp or council, in the army or in civil life, in cabinet or counting-room, in city or in country, these men are known; there can be no doubt as to them.

Now, when the whole efforts of these men were directed against the Government, I want to ask if there is any reason or propriety or decency or sense in permitting them now at once not only to be remitted to all political power, and thus to determine, so far as they can, by whom the legislation of Congress shall be conducted, and who shall be our President, but also to determine themselves the very questions involved in the reconstruction of the Government. We have become conquerors, have we not? Tell me, I pray you, when was the magnanimity of the conquering force ever taxed as the magnanimity of this nation would be by such a proposition? If this third section is stricken from the amendment I shall still support it. But unless I shall be satisfied by the arguments which I may hear that it will be so impracticable to enforce the provisions contained in it that it would be substantially inoperative, I shall vote to retain the provision in the amendment as reported.

Mr. Speaker, the fourth section of the amendment commends itself to all of us without argument. It does not need to be defended.

And for one, I am content to approve the action of the committee, and to commend it to the favor of the people whom we represent.

I can have no doubt that the duty is laid upon us by events which we could not control so to legislate that the restored Union shall be perpetual. Our people demand this now at our hands. The responsibility is fearful, but it is glorious too, if only we do right. Never had any Congress such questions to determine. They enter into the whole future life of the Republic. We have seen the false corner-stone knocked from beneath the temple. It must be replaced by a corner-stone of righteousness, solid and square and true. And that work is in our hands, and it must be done.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe if this amendment shall be adopted here and the bills reported shall be substantially enacted, the great work committed to us will be quickly and well accomplished. If it be possible let us act together. It is not possible that all of us can be fully satisfied. But this amendment is, in my judgment, safe and sure common standing-ground. Let us place ourselves upon it. There is room enough for all.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a single suggestion in connection with the thought that has been uttered by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] in regard to the practicability of executing a provision of the Constitution or law of Congress which should exclude from the elective franchise those who are disloyal. Now, sir, I admit and have always admitted the practical difficulties which are there. As I said before, I say to-day, I would not myself apply to the masses of the common people of the South any exclusion from the elective franchise. I would not extend it to a single person whom I was not compelled to extend it to by my duty to the public.

I make this general remark for the purpose of doing what I now do. I do not fully agree with my colleague who spoke yesterday, that it would require standing armies to execute this law or this provision of the Constitution, but I suggest to him, and to all other right-minded gentlemen in regard to this matter, this really is not surrounded by any practical difficulties after all, and will not require standing armies for its execution if we are to have any Government at all. In vindication of that proposition, let me remind my colleague, and all other gentlemen who make this objection, that there is a plain provision in the Constitution to which we may recur in execution of this amendment or this statute, as I hold we may give it the form of a statute. I will read it:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Now, sir, there is the very law indicated in certain resolutions introduced by my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] on this subject for the execution of this provision. It indicates a method for the execution of any provision that Congress may put into the Constitution. It will not require standing armies. Here there is an act providing a method for holding elections in States for Federal offices. You can have registry laws. Upon this registry list you may place the names of men who are to be disqualified, and you may also have the names of all who are qualified to vote under the law. There they will stand, there they will be, to be referred to by your Government in the execution of its laws. And when it comes to this House or to the Senate to determine whether a man is duly elected you can resort to the ordinary process applicable to a trial in a contested-election case in either body, as to whether he has been elected by the men who were entitled to elect him.

That will not require a standing army, and it will be the application of the ordinary methods of carrying on a Government both of the Union and of the States.

I may add, however, in connection with this, that you can provide that the officers of election shall be Federal officers appointed by the Government of the United States, and the entire machinery that is used in regulating the elections can be provided.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bill of the House No. 352, to incorporate the National Theological Institute.

Also, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 66) relative to the courts and post office of New York city, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Also, Senate bill No. 307, authorizing the restoration of Commander Charles Hunter to the Navy, and Senate bill No. 305, to amend an act entitled "An act concerning notaries public for the District of Columbia," approved April 8, 1864; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill in relation to Round Valley and other Indian reservations in northern California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

POST ROADS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish certain post roads in the State of California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I rise, Mr. Speaker, simply to finish what I desired to say when the hammer fell as I was addressing the House before, and for the purpose, also, of giving the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] an opportunity to submit anything in reply that he may desire.

I undertook, when I was on the floor before, to show that the remark the gentleman made to-day in justification of his vote against the civil rights bill was not in harmony with his action as a member of the House in the introduction of a bill guarantying the rights of citizens without distinction of race or color, and also in submitting to the House a proposition, which I read to the House, for the benefit of the freedmen.

I stated that I could not see that the position taken to-day was consistent with that presented by the bill and the proposition to which I referred, for it seems to me that the second section of the bill, as I have stated before, and the proposition to which I referred, embodied the principle of the first section of the civil rights bill.

I was about to remark, when my time expired, that if the gentleman intended his explanation to apply only to those portions of the civil rights bill which succeeded the first section, it might raise another question, namely, whether, after declaring all persons born in the United States citizens and entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizens, it would be competent for the Government of the United States to enforce and protect the rights thus conferred, or thus declared by the second section of the bill which the gentleman introduced.

Now, as I understand his remark to-day, it was directed to the principle involved in the first section of the civil rights bill which related to the rights to be protected by the provisions of that bill. That being conceded, the power to protect those rights must necessarily follow, as was laid down in the well-known case of Priggs. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, where the Supreme Court declared that the possession of the right carries with it the power to provide a remedy.

Now, sir, it seemed to me that there was an inconsistency between that record and the explanation of to-day, and as I do not wish to do the gentleman any injustice in this regard, I yield part of my time now for explanation.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, I supposed it was a matter of very little consequence to any one but myself what my record might be. I do not wish here to enter into a detailed examination of that record. Those who are more concerned in regard to it than myself will probably do that for me here or elsewhere.

But with regard to my position upon this civil rights bill and the principles involved in it, I think I can explain in a very few words what it is so as to be understood by all. Almost at the very outset of this session, before the civil rights bill, which passed here and which is now the law of the land, had been reported, I introduced a bill proposing, first, to strike out the word "white" in the naturalization laws, and, secondly, declaring that all persons born in this country heretofore, or hereafter to be born, should be, and were thereby declared to be, citizens of the United States.

In some remarks that I submitted upon the subject I stated that my object was either to recognize the citizenship of the men lately freed from slavery, if that citizenship existed already, or to confer upon them citizenship if they were not now citizens, and Congress had power so to confer it.

I also said that I proposed a section in the bill which declared them to be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of other citizens of the United States, whatever those rights may be.

And it followed as a necessary inference that they were to have the same security for the enjoyment of those rights and the same remedy for their violation as any other citizen had; whatever laws Congress might make to protect other citizens in the enjoyment of their rights, they were also entitled to the protection of those laws. But the civil rights bill, when it came before us for our action, contained not only this declaration, in which I fully agreed, but it contained a provision by which the Government of the United States undertook to secure to them and to all other citizens the enjoyment of certain rights, and to provide for their violation certain remedies within State jurisdiction, where it seemed to me Congress under the existing Constitution had not the right so to act. It was this provision which rendered it impossible for me, with these opinions, to vote for the bill.

It was the remedy provided, one feature of which was giving power to the judiciary of the United States to imprison officers of the State courts for enforcing State laws, which I did not think Congress had the right to do; it was this exercise of a power which I did not think that Congress under the Constitution possessed which constituted the reason why I voted against the bill, and I see nothing whatever in that vote inconsistent with my oft-repeated declaration that I was in favor of the principle of the bill, which was also embodied in the bill which I introduced for the purpose of securing to all the rights of citizenship with whatever power we possessed.

But now it comes before us in the form of an amendment to the Constitution, which proposes to give Congress the power to attain this precise result. I shall vote for that amendment cheerfully, because I think Congress should have that power. Now, I do not think there is any inconsistency in these two positions. If there is, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] is welcome to all he can make out of it. I do not feel at all embarrassed by it myself. And I submit to him that it is not of very great consequence to anybody but myself whether I am consistent or not.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I admit that it is not of very great consequence whether the gentleman is consistent or not.

But there is one view of this question which I thought rendered it proper to call the attention of the gentleman and the House to this subject. The gentleman attempted to justify his vote, and in doing so referred to the pending amendment to the Constitution, and attempted to draw the conclusion that all those who might vote in favor of this amendment would be stultifying themselves if they had voted for the civil rights bill in the absence of this amendment. Now, if the gentleman will look to his remarks carefully, he will find that he referred, not to the second section, to which he now refers, nor to any other section but the first section, which declares against any discrimination in the exercise or enjoyment of rights among citizens of the United States in the several States. I quoted the provision of the bill which he introduced, and which, in addition to declaring them citizens, declared that they shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges as such.

Now, I submit to the gentleman that the Government of the United States cannot protect citizens in the enjoyment of these rights without going within the jurisdiction of the State. A citizen of the United States is always a citizen of the State in which he resides; and the rights which he possesses as a citizen of the United States can only be secured to him by laws which operate within the State in which he resides. Now, to show that the same class of rights were referred to by the gentleman, I call attention to the proposition contained in his speech made, I believe, in January last. He said that—

"All the rights of citizens in courts of law and elsewhere" are broader terms than those used in the first section of the civil rights bill; but what I insist upon now is, that the gentleman being in favor of conferring these rights in courts and elsewhere, he must of course admit the power in the Government to enforce and protect those rights "in the courts and elsewhere." Therefore, the subsequent sections of the civil rights bill were but the result of that power, affirmed by the Supreme Court in the decision to which I have referred, to protect the rights which the citizen possessed.

Mr. RAYMOND. I desire to say, in reference to that point, merely that while in that speech and elsewhere I did declare myself to be in favor of extending and securing to all citizens their rights in courts and elsewhere, I did not declare myself in favor of the doctrine that Congress had the power to enforce those rights by such penalties as is prescribed in the civil rights bill.

Then, as to invading the jurisdiction of the States, the gentleman misunderstood me. I did not mean simply that the civil rights bill authorized Congress to enter into the territorial jurisdiction of the State, I meant that it seemed to me that it trenched upon the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the State. I did not say or intimate that every member of the House who voted for this amendment would stultify his vote for the civil rights bill, nor did I mean to impugn the motives of any member. I merely said that it seemed to me that by this vote the belief could fairly be inferred that Congress had not now that power.

The hour of half past four o'clock p. m. having arrived, the House, pursuant to order, took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

TAX BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being a bill of the House (No. 513) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the seventh section, which is as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of every person, firm, or corporation, manufacturing cotton for any purpose whatever in any district where cotton is produced, to return to the assessor or assistant assessor of the district in which such manufacture is carried on, a true statement in writing, signed by him and verified by his oath or affirmation, and a duplicate thereof to the collector of said district on or before the 10th day of each month; and the first statement so rendered shall be on or before the 10th day of July, 1866, and shall state the amount of cotton which such manufacturer had on hand and unmanufactured, or in process of manufacture, on the 1st day of said month; and each subsequent statement shall show the whole amount in pounds, gross weight, of cotton purchased or obtained, and the whole amount consumed by him in any business or process of manufacture during the last preceding calendar month, and the quantity and character of the goods manufactured therefrom; and every such manufacturer or consumer shall keep a book in which he shall enter the quantity, in pounds of cotton, which he has on hand on the 1st day of July, 1866, and each quantity or lot purchased or obtained by him thereafter; the time when and the party or parties from whom the same was obtained; the quantity of said cotton, if any, which is the growth of the collection district where the same is manufactured; the quantity, if any, which has not been weighed and marked by any officer herein authorized to weigh and mark the same; the quantity, if any, upon which the tax had not been paid, so far as can be ascertained, before the manufacture thereof; and also the quantities used or disposed of by him from time to time in any process of manufacture or otherwise, and the quantity and character of the product thereof, which book shall, at all times during business hours, be open to the inspection of the assessor, assistant assessors, collector, or deputy collectors of the district, inspectors, or of revenue agents; and such manufacturer shall pay monthly to the collector within the time prescribed by law the tax herein specified, subject to no deductions, on all cotton so consumed by him in any manufacture, and on which no excise tax has previously been paid; and every such manufacturer, or person whose duty it is so to do, who shall neglect or refuse to make such returns to the assessor or to keep such book, or who shall make false or fraudulent returns, or make false entries in such book, or procure the same to be so done, in addition to the payment of the tax to be assessed thereon shall forfeit to the United States all cotton and all products of cotton in his possession, and shall be liable to a penalty of not less than one thousand nor more than five thousand dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit, or to imprisonment not exceeding two years, in the discretion of the court; and any person or persons who shall make any false oath or affidavit in relation to any matter or thing herein required shall be guilty of perjury, and be liable to imprisonment not less than two years nor more than five years: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed in any manner to apply to or affect the liability of any person to any tax imposed by law on the goods manufactured from such cotton.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by striking out in the eleventh line, on page 7, the word "amount," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "quantity;" also, by inserting, before the word "quantity," in the fourteenth line, the word "whole;" also, by inserting after the word "quantity," in the fifteenth line, the word "consumed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move further to amend by striking out in the fifty-sixth line, on page 9, the words "apply to or;" also, by striking out after the word "person," in the same line, the word "to," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "for."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. In lines fifty-three and fifty-four of this section there is a provision that any person making a false oath or affidavit shall be guilty of perjury, "and be liable to imprisonment not less than two years nor more than five years." I move to strike out the latter clause of that provision and insert these words:

And shall be subject to the punishment prescribed by existing statutes for that offense.

It is a singular fact, of which the committee should be aware, that the statutes of the United States prescribe two kinds of penalty for the offense of false swearing. The courts of the United States, not having any common-law jurisdiction over the offense, are governed by statutes, and by those alone, and if this provision of the bill should take effect in the manner prescribed here it would make a third statute penalty for the offense of false swearing. The existing statutes prescribe a penalty which is sufficient, being in fact more stringent than the one proposed here.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I think there is no objection to that amendment, and I hope that it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by the act of March 3, 1865, relating to the assessment of taxes and enforcing the collection of the same, and all proceedings and remedies relating thereto, shall apply to the assessment and collection of the duty, fines, and penalties herein imposed, so far as the same are applicable, and not inconsistent with the provisions herein contained; and that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall make all necessary rules and regulations for ascertaining the weight of all cotton to be assessed, and appropriately marking the same, and generally for carrying into effect the foregoing provisions of this act. And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to appoint all necessary inspectors, weighers, and markers of cotton, whose compensation shall be determined by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and paid in the same manner as inspectors of distilled spirits are paid.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by striking out, in the seventh line of this section, the word "duty," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "tax."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move further to amend by striking out in the same line the word "herein."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move further to amend by striking out in the seventh and eighth line the words "so far as the same are applicable."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by striking out the words "herein contained," in the eighth and ninth lines, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "of the preceding sections of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by inserting after the word "imposed," in the seventh line, the word "by."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I also move to amend by inserting before the word "appropriately," in the twelfth line, the word "for."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by striking out, in the fourteenth line, the words "of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAINE. I apprehend that the gentleman from Massachusetts has made a mistake in the amendment which has just been adopted on his motion. In the original language of the section, it is the proceedings and remedies which are stated or referred to as not inconsistent with the provisions of the act; but as it has been amended the language is, "tax, fines, and penalties not inconsistent with the provisions herein contained."

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I think, if the gentleman will examine the amendment, he will find that it is correct. As amended the language reads, "shall apply to the assessment and collection of the tax, fines, and penalties imposed by and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act."

Mr. PAINE. The word "inconsistent" before referred to the proceedings and remedies; now it refers to something very different. Perhaps the gentleman intended that; but I supposed he did not.

The Clerk read the first and second paragraphs of the ninth section, as follows:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, as amended by the act of March 3, 1865, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

That section five be amended by adding thereto the following: and any inspector or revenue agent or any special agent appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall demand or receive any compensation, fee, or reward, other than such as are provided by law for, or in regard to, the performance of his official duties, or shall be guilty of any extortion or willful oppression in the discharge of such duties, shall, upon conviction thereof in any circuit or district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be subject to a fine not exceeding $1,000 or to imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the court, and shall be dismissed from office, and shall be forever disqualified from holding any office under the Government of the United States. And one half of the fine so imposed shall be for the use of the United States, and the other half for the use of the person, to be ascertained by the judgment of the court, who shall first give information whereby any such fine may be incurred.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by inserting in the twenty-fourth line of the paragraph just read the word "the" before the word "information."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by striking out the word "incurred," at the end of the paragraph, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "imposed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next paragraph of the ninth section was read, as follows:

That section fourteen be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: that in case any person shall be absent from his or her residence or place of business at the time an assistant assessor shall call for the annual list or return, and no annual list or return has been rendered by such person to the assistant assessor as required by law, it shall be the duty of such assistant assessor to leave at such place of residence or business, with some one of suitable age and discretion, if such be present, otherwise to deposit in the nearest post office, a note or memorandum, addressed to such person, requiring him or her to render to such assistant assessor the list or return required by law within ten days from the date of such note or memorandum, verified by oath or affirmation. And if any person, on being notified or required as aforesaid, shall refuse or neglect to render such list or return within the time required as aforesaid, or if any person without notice, as aforesaid, shall not deliver a monthly or other list or return at the time required by law, or if any person shall deliver or disclose to any assessor or assistant assessor any list, statement, or return which, in the opinion of the assessor, is false or fraudulent, or contains any understatement or undervaluation, it shall be lawful for the assessor to summon such person, his agent, or other person having possession, custody, or care of books or account containing entries relating to the trade or business of such person, or any other persons he may deem proper, to appear before such assessor and produce such book, at a time and place therein named, and to give testimony or answer interrogatories under oath or affirmation respecting any objects liable to duty or tax as aforesaid, or the lists, statements, or returns thereof, or any trade, business, or profession liable to any tax as aforesaid. And the assessor may summon, as aforesaid, any person residing or found within the State in which his district is situated. And when the person intended to be summoned does not reside and cannot be found within such State, the assessor may enter any collection district where such person may be found, and there make the examination hereinbefore authorized. And to this end he shall thereupon and may exercise all the power and authority he has or may lawfully exercise in the district for which he is commissioned. The summons authorized by this section shall in all cases be served by an assistant assessor of the district where the person to whom it is directed may be found, by an attested copy delivered to such person in hand or left at his last and usual place of abode, allowing him at the rate of one day for twenty-five miles he may be required to travel, computed from the place of service to the place of examination; and the certificate of service signed by an assistant assessor shall be evidence of the fact it states on the hearing of an application for an attachment, and when the summons requires the production of books, it shall be sufficient if such books are described with reasonable certainty. In case any person so summoned shall neglect or refuse to obey such summons according to its exigency, or to give testimony, or to answer interrogatories as required, it shall be lawful for the assessor, upon affidavit proving the facts, to apply to the judge of the district court for the district within which the person so summoned resides, or a commissioner of the circuit court of the United States, who is hereby authorized and empowered to perform the duties herein required, for an attachment against such person as for a contempt. It shall be the duty of such judge or commissioner to hear such application, and if satisfactory proof be made, to issue an attachment, directed to some proper officer, for the arrest of such person, and upon his being brought before him to proceed to a hearing of the case; and upon such hearing the judge or commissioner shall have power to make such order as he shall deem proper to enforce obedience to the requirements of the summons and punish such person for his default or disobedience. It shall be the duty of the assessor or assistant assessor of the district within which such person shall have taxable property to enter into and upon the premises, if it be necessary, of such person so refusing or neglecting, or rendering a false or fraudulent list or return, and to make, according to the best information which he can obtain, including that derived from the evidence elicited by the examination of the assessor, and on his own view and information, such list or return, according to the form prescribed, of the property, goods, wares, and merchandise, and all articles or objects liable to duty or tax, owned or possessed or under the care or management of such person, and assess the duty thereon, including the amount, if any, due for special tax or income; and in case of the return of a false or fraudulent list or valuation, he shall add one hundred per cent. to such duty; and in case of a refusal or neglect, except in cases of sickness or absence, to make a list or return, or to verify the same as aforesaid, he shall add fifty per cent. to such duty; and in case of neglect occasioned by sickness or absence as aforesaid, the assessor may allow such further time for making and delivering such list or return as he may judge necessary, not exceeding thirty days; and the amount so added to the duty shall, in all cases, be collected by the collector at the same time and in the same manner with the duties; and the lists or returns so made and subscribed by such assessors or assistant assessors shall be taken and reputed as good and sufficient lists or returns for all legal purposes.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by striking out in the seventieth line, on page 12, the word "him," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "such assistant assessor."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by inserting before the word "twenty" in the same line the word "each;" so that the clause will read:

Allowing such assistant assessor at the rate of one day for each twenty-five miles he may be required to travel.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move further to amend by inserting in the seventy-first line after the words "computed from" the words "his place of residence to."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move also to amend by striking out in the seventy-second line the words "to the place of examination."

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that the design of this provision must have been to give the party time to repair from his place of residence to the place where the examination is to be made; and if we make the language apply to the assistant assessor we give no time to the person summoned.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will examine the provision he will see that the object is to provide for the serving of the summons by the assistant assessor, and for his pay for the service in going from the place of his residence to the place where the summons is to be served. This provision has nothing to do with the examination. It merely relates to the summons for the examination.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend in the seventy-third line by striking out the word "an" and inserting "such," so that it shall read "signed by such assistant assessor."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend in the seventy-eighth and seventy-ninth lines by striking out the words "according to its exigency," so that it shall read, "to obey such summons or to give testimony."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to insert the words "or a commissioner of the circuit court of the United States" before the words that now appear in the next line, "for the district within which the person so summoned resided." The two lines should be transposed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out of the eighty-fourth line the words "who are" and insert in lieu thereof "such judge or commissioner," so that it will read, "such judge or commissioner is hereby authorized and empowered," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to insert after the word "duty" the words "or tax," in the one hundred and sixth line, in the one hundred and tenth line, and in the one hundred and twelfth line. Also, to insert "as" in the place of "with" in the one hundred and eighteenth line. Also, to strike out "duties," in the one hundred and nineteenth line, and insert "duty or tax." Also, the letter "s" in the word "lists" in the same line. Also, the words "lists and returns" in the one hundred and twenty-first line; so that that portion of the section shall read:

It shall be the duty of the assessor or assistant assessor of the district within which such person shall have taxable property to enter into and upon the premises, if it be necessary, of such person so refusing or neglecting, or rendering a false or fraudulent list or return, and to make, according to the best information which he can obtain, including that derived from the evidence elicited by the examination of the assessor, and on his own view and information, such list or return, according to the form prescribed, of the property, goods, wares, and merchandise, and all articles or objects liable to duty or tax, owned or possessed or under the care or management of such person, and assess the duty or tax thereon, including the amount, if any, due for special tax or income; and in case of the return of a false or fraudulent list or valuation, he shall add one hundred per cent. to such duty or tax; and in case of a refusal or neglect, except in cases of sickness or absence, to make a list or return, or to verify the same as aforesaid, he shall add fifty per cent. to such duty or tax; and in case of neglect occasioned by sickness or absence as aforesaid, the assessor may allow such further time for making and delivering such list or return as he may judge necessary, not exceeding thirty days; and the amount so added to the duty shall, in all cases, be collected by the collector at the same time and in the same manner as the duty or tax; and the list or returns so made and subscribed by such assessors or assistant assessors shall be taken and reputed as good and sufficient for all legal purposes.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to call the attention of the committee to what has been suggested to me by an assessor, that although they are authorized to enter into a district and make an examination there is no provision for paying witnesses.

Mr. THAYER. If my colleague will yield I will offer an amendment to cover that suggestion.

Mr. STEVENS. And while I am up I will suggest another thing. The original law—and I do not see that there is any alteration in this—allows the assessor in case of an alleged fraud to enter into an examination, being himself the judge and jury, and after settling the question of fraud, to double the amount assessed.

Mr. MORRILL. I call the attention of the gentleman to page 116, where there is this provision:

The bills for the attendance and mileage of said witnesses shall be taxed by the assessor and paid by the delinquent parties, or otherwise by the collector of the district, on certificate of the assessor, at the rates usually allowed in said districts for witnesses in courts of justice.

Mr. THAYER. That only applies to cases of appeal.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to state further that according to the construction of the law the assessor is the final judge of fraud to any amount, so that a man may be fined $100,000 and his property sold without remedy. I know a case in my county where, although there was a conflict of testimony, and an assessment made of $60,000, not on an annual but on a monthly return, it could not be remedied. In such cases the party who is assessed may have his property sold according to law, and he can do nothing until after it is sold, and all that he can collect then is the amount of the error.

Mr. THAYER. I move to amend this section by adding at the end of line one hundred and twenty-two the following:

When the assessor is required or compelled to travel to make examinations, as provided in this section, he shall be allowed mileage and his necessary and proper traveling expenses; and the bill for the attendance and mileage of witnesses shall be taxed by the assessor and paid by the delinquent party, or otherwise by the collector of the district on the certificate of the assessor, at the rates usually allowed in said district for witnesses in courts of justice.

Mr. UPSON. I would suggest to the gentleman that in order to make his amendment conform to the one read by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, he should strike out the word "bills" and insert "costs."

Mr. THAYER. My impression was that it did conform. I will accept that modification.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me suggest a further modification: that instead of the words toward the close of the amendment, "at the rates usually allowed in said district to witnesses in courts of justice," he insert "at the rates allowed to witnesses in the district court of the United States." That will make it definite.

Mr. THAYER. I accept that modification also.

Mr. Chairman, there are two proceedings provided for by this section. One is a preliminary examination where there has been no return, or a suspected fraudulent return. In that case the assessor is obliged to make a preliminary examination, and he examines witnesses and persons, in effect the same forms of proceeding which he pursues subsequently upon a hearing upon an appeal taken. The effect of this amendment is simply to add this provision which the committee have already incorporated in that part of the section which relates to the hearing of appeals to the other part of the section which relates to the preliminary examinations. It is, of course, quite as necessary that provision be made for the payment of witnesses in the one case as in the other; and I presume the amendment will meet with the approval of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not observe the first part of that amendment, when it was read before, and I now desire to call the attention of the committee to what it seems to me would be a very great abuse that would grow up under it if it became a law. If we give assessors the right to go into other districts to assess delinquent or absent tax-payers, and allow them mileage and their actual expenses, they may make all sorts of trips. A man in Ohio may make a trip into Illinois, or a man in Massachusetts might make a trip into Ohio, and thus great expense might be incurred. I do not think it would be safe to make such a provision as this. It would open the door to much fraud. I hope the amendment will not be adopted in its present form.

Mr. THAYER. I do not think the committee will find in this amendment the terrible results apprehended by my friend from Ohio. I would like to know under what law an assessor can go into any district but his own to make assessments. I will yield to the gentleman to explain what he means by that.

Mr. ALLISON. By this very section an assessor is authorized to go from one district to another.

Mr. THAYER. I am willing to qualify my amendment so as to confine it to his own district. But we all know, who know anything about the operation of the law as it stands, that cases constantly occur in which assessors are required to go into remote parts of their districts for the purpose of making these examinations. There are cases in which it is impossible to make an examination at the place where the office of the assessor is, because the examination, in order to be worth anything, must be made at the place where the business of the party is carried on. That renders it necessary for the assessor to go to the place of business; and oftentimes it is very distant from his place of residence. Now, sir, is it not proper, where an assessor is required to incur expense in traveling to a remote corner of his district to make an examination which is for the benefit of the Government, that he should receive at least his traveling expenses for that service? I do not see any liability to abuse in it, nor do I see any injustice to the Government.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will observe, and I wish him to give me his attention, that this whole section has relation solely to authorizing the assessor to go out of his district into another to find an absent delinquent tax-payer. Now, the gentleman proposes an amendment which will authorize the person thus going out, the person who has been authorized by this section as it now stands to go out of his district, to charge his actual expenses and mileage for thus going. The gentleman, if he will examine the section in connection with the amendment he has proposed, will find that it will accomplish precisely what I have suggested.

I will state in a few words what the object of this section is. For instance, there are in the city of New York a large number of persons who do business there but reside in Jersey City or in some other neighboring district. Now, it is necessary for the assessors to have some means of reaching them. This section was framed for the purpose of enabling them to go into other districts than their own, and through the assessors of those other districts summon delinquent tax-payers and there hold examinations of the cases. But we thought it not wise to allow those assessors mileage and traveling expenses for going into other districts, for the reason that if we did it they might make long journeys to distant districts and charge heavy fees for them.

Now, if the gentleman's amendment is adopted, I think it will be found to open the door very wide indeed. We provide in the section already that the assessor in the district to which the other assessor goes to make the summons, shall be the party to make the summons, for which he is to receive pay at the rate stated in the section for traveling from his own place of residence to the place where the summons is to be served. But we did not think it right to allow the assessor who travels out of his district mileage and traveling expenses. If the amendment of the gentleman can be offered to some section that relates to the assessor's own district, it may be appropriate; but it seems to me it is not appropriate here.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed upon the amendment.

Mr. THAYER. I move pro forma to strike out the last words of the amendment, for the purpose of making an explanation. There would be force in the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] if I could see that this section is to have the effect which he states. But I do not read it in that way; I find this provision in it:

And if any person, on being notified or required as aforesaid, shall refuse or neglect to render such list or return within the time required as aforesaid, or if any person without notice, as aforesaid, shall not deliver a monthly or other list or return at the time required by law, or if any person shall deliver or disclose to any assessor or assistant assessor any list, statement, or return which, in the opinion of the assessor, is false or fraudulent, or contains any understatement or undervaluation, it shall be lawful for the assessor to summon such person, his agent, or other person having possession, custody, or care of books or account containing entries relating to the trade or business of such person, or any other persons he may deem proper, to appear before such assessor and produce such book, at a time and place therein named, and to give testimony or answer interrogatories under oath or affirmation respecting any objects liable to duty or tax as aforesaid, or the lists, statements, or returns thereof, or any trade, business, or profession liable to any tax as aforesaid. And the assessor may summon, as aforesaid, any person residing or found within the State in which his district is situated.

Mr. MORRILL. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] I think has some merit in it. But I think it requires a little more careful consideration than we are likely to give it to-night. Therefore, I would suggest that it be passed over for the present, if the committee will consent that it may be considered at some other time.

Mr. THAYER. I will consent to that, and withdraw the pro forma amendment I submitted.

Mr. HOLMES. I move to amend that portion of the section which gives authority to the assessor to go out of his district to find the party assessed by striking out in the sixty-first line the words "may enter," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "of;" and by striking out in the sixty-second line the words "and there," and inserting "may;" so that the clause shall read:

And when the person intended to be summoned does not reside and cannot be found within such State, the assessor of any collection district where such person may be found may make the examination hereinbefore authorized.

That will obviate the objection made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] in regard to there being no provision for mileage. If that is adopted it will render it necessary to strike out the sentence immediately following, to wit:

And to this end he shall there have and may exercise all the power and authority he has or may lawfully exercise in the district for which he is commissioned.

Mr. MORRILL. I will receive it as a suggestion, but will not accept it now as an amendment.

Mr. HOLMES. I am willing that the committee should consider it and report upon it.

Mr. STEVENS. I now offer an amendment to remedy the evil which I spoke of before, to come in at the end of the paragraph, line one hundred and twenty-two. I do not see any better place. If it should turn out that it is supplied elsewhere, of course it may be stricken out:

In lieu of the remedy now provided whereby fraud is or shall be charged to exist in any annual, monthly, or other list, or in any annual, monthly, or other returns, and the party charged with the said fraud shall deny the same, demand a trial, and shall tender sufficient bail for the amount of the alleged fraud, deficiency, and costs of suit, proceedings shall be suspended and suit be brought in the court of the United States for said district to recover the amount of the alleged deficiency or fraud, and the same shall be prosecuted to judgment as in other cases: Provided, That this section shall not be construed to take away the right to proceed by indictment as now provided by law.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "deficiency" the words "and also for the penalty."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask the gentleman whether it is consistent with the language of the section as it stands. As I understand it it provides for a suspension of proceedings and a commencement of a suit afterward.

Mr. STEVENS. It provides for proceedings by the assessor and then refers him to the court.

Mr. ALLISON. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how he proposes to have this security or bail decided upon, whether by the collector or by the court.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose to the satisfaction of the assessor.

Mr. ALLISON. Then it should be inserted.

Mr. STEVENS. I will modify it by adding the words "to the satisfaction of the assessor."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to pass this over and let the committee consider it. I understand some of the committee are of opinion that it is already provided for in the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I will let it pass with the understanding that I may renew it.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to amend the section by striking out lines eighty-three, eighty-four, eighty-five, and eighty-six, as follows:

Or a commissioner of the circuit court of the United States, for the district within which the person so summoned resides, who is hereby authorized and empowered to perform the duties herein required, for an attachment against such person as for a contempt.

Also to strike out the word "commissioner" wherever it occurs afterward. I do not think a commissioner appointed by the Supreme Court of the United States should have power to issue an attachment for contempt in any case. That is a matter that belongs exclusively to the court, and should never be delegated to any other than a judge.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall not strenuously contend for this provision. It is in the present law. No change is made. It is a matter of very considerable convenience, because all the district courts are overloaded with business, and it is necessary that we should have some tribunals to dispose of these cases promptly.

Mr. JENCKES. That is all very true.

Mr. MORRILL. Let me add that these commissioners are quite as well qualified to discharge such duties as many of the judges themselves.

Mr. JENCKES. That may be, but I do not believe in delegating such powers as these to any others than the judges known to the Constitution and laws of the United States. I move, therefore, that the provision be stricken out.

Mr. THAYER. There seems to me to be one objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Rhode Island, which ought to have some force in the determination of the question on his amendment, and that is, that if the court is substituted for the commissioner, it will necessarily increase the expenses of the working of the law, and also the trouble of it; because the commissioners are scattered over the different districts of the United States, and they can be applied to with much greater facility and at much less expense for this process than the judges of the United States courts.

Mr. JENCKES. That is true, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania will agree with me in the statement of what is an attachment for contempt. It is punishment without trial and without hearing, except upon affidavits, and at the pleasure of the judge or officer ordering it.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. It would very much impair the efficiency of the law.

The question was put on Mr. JENCKES's motion, and there were—ayes 29, noes 38; no quorum voting.

Mr. MORRILL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORRILL and JENCKES were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 44, noes 51.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

That section nineteen be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: that the assessors for each collection district shall, by advertisement in some public newspaper published in each county within said district, if any such there be, if not, then in some newspaper in a collection district adjoining thereto, and by notifications to be posted up in at least four public places within each assessment district, advertise, by not less than ten days' notice, all persons concerned of the time and place within said collection district when and where appeals will be received and determined relative to any erroneous or excessive valuations, assessments, or enumerations by the assessor or assistant assessor returned in the annual list. And it shall be the duty of the assessor for each collection district, at the time fixed for hearing such appeal, as aforesaid, to submit the proceedings of the assessors and assistant assessors, and the annual lists taken and returned as aforesaid, to the inspection of any and all persons who may apply for that purpose. And the said assessor for each collection district is hereby authorized at any time to hear and determine in a summary way, according to law and right, upon any and all appeals which may be exhibited against the proceedings of the said assessors or assistant assessors, and the office or principal place of business of the said assessor shall be always open when he is not necessarily absent therefrom during the business hours of each day, for the hearing of appeals by parties who shall appear voluntarily before him: Provided, That no appeal shall be allowed to any party after he shall have been duly assessed, and the annual list containing the assessment has been transmitted to the collector of the district. And all appeals to the assessor, as aforesaid, shall be made in writing, and shall specify the particular cause, matter, or thing respecting which a decision is requested, and shall, moreover, state the ground or principle of error complained of. And the assessor shall have power to reexamine and determine upon the assessments and valuations and rectify the same as shall appear just and equitable; but such valuation, assessment, or enumeration shall not be increased without a previous notice of at least five days to the party interested to appear and object to the same if he judge proper, which notice shall be given by a note in writing to be left at the dwelling-house, office, or place of business of the party by such assessor, assistant assessor, or other person, or sent by mail to the nearest or usual post office address of said party: Provided, further, That on the hearing of appeals it shall be lawful for the assessor to require by summons the attendance of witnesses and the production of books of account in the same manner and under the same penalties as are provided in cases of refusal or neglect to furnish lists or returns. The bills for the attendance and mileage of said witnesses shall be taxed by the assessor and paid by the delinquent parties, or otherwise by the collector of the district, on certificate of the assessor, at the rates usually allowed in said district for witnesses in courts of justice.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend that paragraph in line one hundred and forty-one by striking out after the word "and" the words "the said," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "such."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In line one hundred and forty-two, after the word "assessor," I move to strike out the words "for each collection district."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In line one hundred and forty-seven I move to strike out the word "always" where it occurs before the word "open," and also to strike out all after the word "open," to and including the word "therefrom," so that it will read:

And the office or principal place of business of the said assessor shall be open during the business hours of each day, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. On page 16, line one hundred and sixty-four, I move to strike out the words "given by a note."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In line one hundred and sixty-five, after the word "writing," I move to strike out the words "to be," and to insert "and" in lieu thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In line one hundred and seventy-three I move to strike out the word "bills," and insert "costs" in lieu thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to further amend the last sentence of this paragraph by striking out the word "otherwise," also by striking out the words "collector of," and inserting the words "disbursing agent for;" also by striking out the word "usually;" also by striking out the words "in said district for," and inserting the word "to" before the word "witnesses;" and also by striking out the words "courts of justice," and inserting the words "district courts of the United States." The sentence will then read:

The costs for the attendance and mileage of said witnesses shall be taxed by the assessor and paid by the delinquent parties, or by the disbursing agent for the district, on certificate of the assessor, at the rates allowed to witnesses in district courts of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend the first sentence of this paragraph by inserting after the words "four public places" the words "and of each post office;" so that it will then read:

That the assessors for each collection district shall, by advertisement in some public newspaper published in each county within said district, if any such there be, if not, then in some newspaper in a collection district adjoining thereto, and by notifications to be posted up in at least four public places, and at each post office within each assessment district, advertise, by not less than ten days' notice, all persons concerned of the time and place within said collection district when and where appeals will be received and determined relative to any erroneous or excessive valuations, assessments, or enumerations by the assessor or assistant assessor returned in the annual list.

It is very important that the tax-payers shall have a fair opportunity of obtaining notice when they are assessed. This bill, as well as the old law, only provides that the assessor shall publish a notice in one paper in each county in his district, or, if there are no papers published there, then in one paper in the adjoining district, and to post up notices in four public places. The law makes no provision for paying the cost of these advertisements; and it is so, too, with regard to the collector. He must himself pay the cost of advertising. The consequence is that there is no inducement for him to take any extraordinary pains to give notice to the public, but, rather, some little inducement for him to withhold the notice, because by so doing he makes the cost for himself.

Now, it will not be requiring of the assessor much of a job if we require him to have a notice posted up at each post office in his district. It will be very easy for him to mail a notice to each postmaster with the request that he will post it up in the office. And the post office where all the people go for their letters and papers is of all places the one where they will be most apt to see the notice if it is posted up.

Mr. KELLEY. I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] as far as it goes. But I would suggest to him that however adequate it might be for the rural districts it would be very inadequate for large cities.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I propose this in addition to the notice required by the paragraph as it now stands.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] and to the committee, that the provision he proposes would impose a very onerous duty upon these officers. In some towns there are no less than five or six post offices, and a notice posted up at each of them would not become so generally known as an advertisement in a single newspaper. People who go to the post office do not go there for the purpose of looking at the walls to see what is posted on them. And in some districts it would impose upon these officers the duty of posting up not less than from one hundred and fifty to two hundred of these notices, without any adequate benefit resulting therefrom.

Mr. STEVENS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] that he alter it so as to require the notice to be posted up at each grog-shop and tavern.

Mr. MORRILL. I beg to inform the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that in Vermont we have reformed all that since he left the State. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. In my district we have more post offices than we have taverns; the people receive more letters than they take glasses of grog. It may be different in Pennsylvania.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] says that the posting up these notices at the post offices will not be likely to bring the notice so much to the attention of the people as the advertising it in one single newspaper. In that I think he is mistaken.

In a great many districts in the West a large portion of the population is composed of Germans who read only a German paper. In many districts there are Democratic papers and Republican papers. If the notice is published in a single Republican paper, the Democrats of the district, who do not take that paper, fail to see the notice; and vice versa.

Then again there are in some counties local weekly papers which are taken by the people in the vicinity of the place where they are published; but those people do not take the paper published in a remote portion of the county. Hence the publishing of the notice in a single paper in the district fails to reach thousands of people who go to the post offices to get their letters and who would see a notice posted up there. As to those who do not go to the post office their neighbors go there and would inform them of any notice affecting them if it were posted there. The post office in the local district is the place where people go to get the news, and that is the place to publish these notices.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Chairman, this provision for the publication of the notice has reference only to the hearing of appeals. Gentlemen will observe that by this section the assessor is required to keep his office constantly open, where persons aggrieved may go voluntarily and have their cases heard. Now, in some rural localities, as for instance in my own district, the district comprises twelve counties, and the sub-districts, in some instances, two counties. If we should require the assessor to post a notice at every post office in each sub-district, it would be necessary for him to have the aid of a very large number of assistants. Hence it appears to me this proposition ought not to be entertained for a moment. Persons aggrieved always have a remedy by going to the assessor's office and having their appeals heard there. I trust the amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to amend by striking out lines one hundred and twenty-six and one hundred and twenty-seven and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Shall publish by advertisement in one newspaper in each county within said district in which a newspaper is published.

I desire to call attention to the language employed in those two lines as they stand. They provide that notice shall be published by advertisement in some public newspaper published in each county within the district. I presume that there is not a newspaper published in each county of every district. I suppose the intention was, of course, that the notice should be published in one newspaper in each county, if there should be a newspaper published within the county. The same objection will not apply to my amendment, because I suppose there is no district in the United States in which there is no newspaper published.

Mr. MORRILL. I would say to the gentleman that there are such districts. It is not many years since a Representative in this House from the Accomac district of Virginia boasted that there was no newspaper published in his district. There are many districts in the southwestern States where no newspaper is published. This word "adjoining" was inserted to meet such cases.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Why should the notice be published in an adjoining district, when it can be published much nearer in another portion of the same district? In one particular county of a district there may be no newspaper published, while one may be published in an adjoining county. But in such a case, under the provision of the bill, as I understand it, the notice must be published in an adjoining district although, perhaps, one hundred miles distant.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have prepared an amendment which I think will accomplish what the gentleman from Missouri desires. I move to amend by striking out the one hundred and twenty-sixth, one hundred and twenty-seventh, and one hundred and twenty-eighth lines, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Shall by advertisement in the newspaper of largest circulation published in each county within said district, and, if there be none published in any county, then the newspaper of largest circulation in the collection district adjoining.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that his amendment will not reach the difficulty. There may be a newspaper published in every county in the assessment district except one, and according to the latter clause of the amendment it would require it to be published in a newspaper outside of the district. It is to be published in a newspaper outside of the district if there should be one county in the district in which a newspaper is not published.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is mistaken. It says if no paper be published in the district, then in a newspaper of the largest circulation in the adjoining district.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I may have been mistaken in reference to the gentleman's amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 37; no quorum voting.

Mr. MORRILL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ALLISON and THAYER were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes fifty-six, noes not counted.

So the amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This now provides for the publication in any newspaper in the district.

Mr. GARFIELD. It provides for the publication in the paper of the largest circulation in the district, and if there be no paper in the district, then in the paper of the largest circulation in the adjoining district.

Mr. COOK. I move in the one hundred and thirtieth line after the word "places" to insert as follows:

Shall mail a copy of said notice to each postmaster in his district to be posted up in his office.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I send up to the Clerk's desk a letter I have received from a collector in reference to this subject of posting notices. It is from an intelligent man, and I desire to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

COLLECTOR'S OFFICE,
UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE, SECOND DISTRICT OF ILLINOIS,
ROCKFORD, April 30, 1866.

DEAR SIR: The present revenue law, section twenty-eight, provides "that each of the collectors shall, within twenty days after receiving his annual collection list of the assessors, give notice by advertisement published in each county in his collection district, in one newspaper printed in such county, if any such there be, and by notifications to be posted up in at least four public places in each county in his collection district, that the said duties have become due and payable, and state the time and place within said county at which he or his deputy will attend to receive the same, which time shall not be less than ten days after such notification." Collectors had all supposed that this bill of advertising would be paid by the revenue department, as it is required by law, but the practice is to charge it against the collectors as a part of their expenses of administering the office, to come out of their salary and commissions. I want to call your attention to this for the purpose of saying that the effect of such practice of the department is necessarily to leave the tax-payers with such small opportunities of knowing anything about the time and place of payment that very many of them become liable to the ten per cent. addition and the twenty cents for notice, of which they complain more than they do at paying the whole assessed tax. My own habit has heretofore been to publish the notice two weeks in the paper instead of one as the law requires, and instead of putting up four notices in a county, I have had an average of fifty handbills struck off for each county, and mailed one to each post office in letter, asking the postmaster to stick it up in a conspicuous place, and keep it up till after the time of receiving taxes. I then send one with like request to each railroad station agent, and whatever there are left use to the best advantage to give the information a wide circulation. I do this, because it is fair to the people who pay the taxes that they shall have reasonable opportunity to become posted and save all costs and additions, and they complain bitterly if after all this they happen to overlook it. Suppose instead of doing this I should cut out four notices from the county paper, as I know is done by some collectors and put them up fairly, what chance have the masses of the tax-payers to get any information? The fact is, this is all that the law requires. No one could be blamed after meeting its provisions literally and also in spirit.

Now, the fact is, every provision should be made in the laws to make the matter easy and satisfactory as any reasonable man could ask. This advertising costs, as I do it, about twenty-five dollars for the handbills, and say thirty-five to forty dollars for the advertising in the papers. I have given you the details so that you could see the propriety of providing in the law for what is needed. The tax-payers will be grateful to any one who protects them. Really the advertising should be done at the expense of the Government, as the whole theory of the compensation is that the tax-payer goes to the collector and pays him his money. There is no fairness in Chicago in advertising in one paper. What chance have the Germans of seeing such a notice in the Tribune or the Republican, or a Democrat either? There should be a discretion in the collector, and of course the cost should be provided for as are those of postage, stationery, &c. In my district all these notices ought to be in the paper at least two weeks, and nothing by way of notice less than I do is of much account. At any rate the four notices required by the law are merely a mockery, for while admitting the obligation to notify, what chance would the tax-payers of Kane county have of seeing any one of four notices. My hope is that you will get the next law to provide for reasonable notice at the expense of the Government. I do say that as a rule our people carry this tax cheerfully, and I want to see every reasonable provision to make it as easy as possible. If anything else occurs to me, I will write you again. I am sorry to see how long my letter is, but could not well make it shorter.

Yours, truly,
General J. F. FARNSWORTH, M. C.

Mr. JENCKES. I think that that assessor should have a word of commendation. He should be recommended to all assessors for faithfulness and diligence.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 37; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered that the roll should be called.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Boyer, Brudagee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farquhar, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Latham, Loan, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, Morris, Moulton, Newell, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Pike, Pomeroy, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Rousseau, Schenck, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stillwell, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Wentworth, and Wright.

The committee then rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being bill of the House No. 513, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof, and finding itself without a quorum had directed the roll to be called, and the names of the absentees to be reported to the House.

The SPEAKER stated that a quorum having answered to their names, the committee would resume its session.

The committee then resumed its session, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair.)

The question recurred on the amendment moved by Mr. Cook, and it was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That no appeal shall be allowed to any party after he shall have been duly assessed, and the annual list containing the assessment has been transmitted to the collector of the district.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] in the preceding line seems to cover this whole question enlarging the powers of assessor, giving him the full control of this assessment, leaving him to make rules in each particular case as to when the assessment shall be completed. These appeals may not be made according to the terms of this act, which are rather blind, and should be made, it seems to me, according to the rules the assessor may prescribe. A person may be absent in Europe or may be outside of his district at the time when by the ordinary rules the assessment should be considered as completed. When he returns, it seems to me, he should have the privilege of going before the assessor and having his case considered; not leaving it open indefinitely, but giving it, as the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont provides, to the assessor to provide a mode in which the case shall be considered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section twenty be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following: that the said assessors of each collection district, respectively, shall, immediately after the expiration of the time for hearing appeals concerning taxes returned in the annual list, and from time to time, as duties or taxes become liable to be assessed, make out lists containing the sums payable according to law upon every object of duty or taxation for each collection district: which list shall contain the name of each person residing within the said district, or owning or having the care or superintendence of property lying within the said district, or engaged in any business or pursuit which is liable to any tax or duty, when such person or persons are known, together with the sums payable by each; and where there is any property within any collection district liable to the payment of the said duty or tax, not owned or occupied by or under the superintendence of any person resident therein, there shall be a separate list of such property, specifying the sum payable, and the names of the respective proprietors when known. And the assessor making out any such separate list shall transmit to the assessor of the district where the persons liable to pay such tax reside, or shall have their principal place of business, copies of the list of property held by persons so liable to pay such tax, to the end that the taxes assessed under the provisions of this act may be paid within the collection district where the persons liable to pay the same reside, or may have their principal place of business. And in all other cases the said assessor shall furnish to the collectors of the several collection districts, respectively, within ten days after the time of hearing appeals concerning taxes returned in the annual list, and from time to time thereafter as required, a certified copy of such list or lists for their proper collection districts. And in case it shall be ascertained that the annual list, or any other list, which may have been, or which shall hereafter be delivered to any collector, is imperfect or incomplete in consequence of the omission of the names of any persons or parties liable to tax or duty, or in consequence of any omission, or understatement, or undervaluation, or false or fraudulent statement contained in any return or returns made by any persons or parties liable to tax or duty, the said assessor may, from time to time, or at any time within one year, enter on any monthly or special list the names of such persons or parties so omitted, together with the amount of tax for which they may have been or shall become liable, and also the names of the persons or parties in respect to whose returns, as aforesaid, there has been or shall be any omission, undervaluation, understatement, or false or fraudulent statement, together with the amounts for which such persons or parties may be liable, over and above the amount for which they may have been, or shall be, assessed upon any return or returns made as aforesaid. And all or any proceedings authorized by law for the ascertainment, assessment, or collection of any tax or duty, shall be held to apply, as far as may be deemed necessary, to the proceedings herein authorized and directed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am authorized by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer a few amendments to this paragraph, some being mere verbal amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the amendments will be considered en masse.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend in the one hundred and eighty-sixth line by striking out the words "every object of duty and" and insert "subject of;" so it will read, "subject of taxation."

In line one hundred and ninety-four strike out the words "payment of the said duty or;" so it will read, "liable to the tax."

After the word "year," in line two hundred and twenty-one, insert the following, in order to render the meaning more definite:

Commencing from the time of the passage of this act or from the time of the delivery of the list to the collector as aforesaid.

In line two hundred and thirty-one, after the word "aforesaid," insert the following:

And shall certify and return said list to the collector as required by law.

Strike out the last sentence of the paragraph, beginning with the word "and" in line two hundred and thirty-one, and insert the following; it is a mere recasting of the sentence to make it more clear:

And all or any proceedings authorized by law for the ascertainment of the liability to any tax or duty, the assessment or collection thereof shall be held to apply as far as may be necessary to the proceedings herein authorized and directed.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. I move the following amendment:

Add as follows:

But no reassessment shall be made, as aforesaid, in cases where assessments have been made bona fide upon manufactured goods, and when such goods have been sold upon the faith of the same.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee have a section prepared on that very point, to which the gentleman can offer his amendment.

Mr. WARNER. I withdraw it for the present.

The Clerk read the next clause, as follows:

That section twenty-two be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: that there shall be allowed and paid to the several assessors a salary of $1,500 per annum, payable quarterly; and, in addition thereto, where the receipts of the collection district shall exceed the sum of $100,000 and shall not exceed the sum of $400,000 annually, one half of one per cent. upon the excess of receipts over $100,000. Where the receipts of a collection district shall exceed $400,000, and shall not exceed $600,000, one fifth of one per cent. upon the excess of receipts over $400,000. Where the receipts shall exceed $600,000, one tenth of one per cent. upon such excess; but the salary of no assessor shall in any case exceed the sum of $4,000. And the several assessors shall be allowed and paid the sums actually and necessarily expended, with the approval of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for office rent; but no account for such rent shall be allowed or paid until it shall have been verified in such manner as the Commissioner shall require, and shall have been audited and approved by the proper officer of the Treasury Department. And the several assessors shall be paid, after the account thereof shall have been rendered to and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury, their necessary and reasonable charges for clerk hire; but no such account shall be approved unless it shall state the name or names of the clerk or clerks employed and the precise periods of time for which they were respectively employed, and the rate of compensation agreed upon, and shall be accompanied by an affidavit of the assessor stating that such service was actually required by the necessities of his office, and was actually rendered, and also by the affidavit of each clerk, stating that he has rendered the service charged in such account on his behalf, the compensation agreed upon, and that he has not paid, deposited, or assigned, or contracted to pay, deposit, or assign any part of such compensation to the use of any other person, or in any way, directly or indirectly, paid or given, or contracted to pay or give, any reward or compensation for his office or employment, or the emoluments thereof; and the chief clerk of any such assessor is hereby authorized to administer, in the absence of the assessor, such oaths or affirmations as are required by this act. And there shall be allowed and paid to each assistant assessor four dollars for every day actually employed in collecting lists and making valuations, the number of days necessary for that purpose to be certified by the assessor, and three dollars for every hundred persons assessed contained in the tax list, as completed and delivered by him to the assessor, and twenty-five cents for each permit granted to any tobacco, snuff, or cigar manufacturer; and the several assistant assessors in cities of more than ten thousand inhabitants shall be allowed, in the settlement of their accounts, a sum not exceeding $300 per annum for office rent; but no account for such rent shall be allowed or paid until it shall have been verified in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall require, and shall have been audited and approved by the proper officer of the Treasury Department; and other assistant assessors, when employed outside of the town in which they reside, in addition to the compensation now allowed by law, shall, during such time so employed, receive one dollar per day; and the said assessors and assistant assessors, respectively, shall be paid, after the account thereof shall have been rendered to and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury, their necessary and reasonable charges for stationery and blank books used in the discharge of their duties, and for postage actually paid on letters and documents received or sent, and relating exclusively to official business: Provided, That no such account shall be approved unless it shall state the date and the particular item of every such expenditure, and shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of such assessor or assistant assessor; and the compensation herein specified shall be in full for all expenses not otherwise particularly authorized: Provided, further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to fix such additional rates of compensation to be made to assessors and assistant assessors in cases where a collection district embraces more than a single congressional district, and to assessors and assistant assessors, revenue agents, and inspectors in Louisiana, Georgia, South Carolina, Alabama, Florida, Texas, Arkansas, North Carolina, Mississippi, Tennessee, Missouri, California, and Oregon, and the Territories, as may appear to him to be just and equitable, in consequence of the greater cost of living and traveling in those States and Territories, and as may, in his judgment, be necessary to secure the services of competent officers; but the rates of compensation thus allowed shall not exceed the rates paid to similar officers in such States and Territories respectively.

Mr. THAYER. I move to amend on page 19, lines two hundred and forty and two hundred and forty-one, by striking out the words "shall exceed the sum of $100,000 and," and by striking out in the two hundred and forty-third line the words "excess of;" and the words "over $100,000."

Mr. Chairman, the effect of the amendment is to allow the assessor the commission of a half per cent. on the first $100,000 received, which, by the terms of the existing act, is not allowed. I always thought it a niggardly provision which deprived those officers of that small commission on the first $100,000. I am satisfied from the great reduction in this bill and the great number of articles put upon the free list, that in a great many districts where this small allowance on the first $100,000 is received, the compensation of these officers, upon whom devolves the practical labor of the revenue department of the Government will be inadequate. I have made a calculation which shows what will be the result on the compensation to be received by these officers, which is only one half of one per cent. They receive now for collecting $200,000, $2,000. That includes the $1,500 salary they receive. They receive, where the receipts are $300,000, $2,500, and where the receipts are $400,000, $3,000. The effect of the proposed modification, which allows one half of one per cent. on the first $100,000 as well as on the excess up to $400,000, is simply to alter that, and where the receipts are $200,000, to make it $2,500 per annum, including the salary of $1,500 allotted to them by law; where the receipts are $300,000, they will receive a salary of $3,000; and where the receipts are $400,000, they will receive $3,500. It seems to me these are not inadequate rates of compensation for a proper class of men to discharge these important duties.

Mr. MORRILL. I believe we have hardly tolerated the raising of any salaries. I live in a rural district, and there is no complaint of the salaries there.

Mr. THAYER. It is easy to kill any proposition of this kind by saying you propose the raising of salaries. The gentleman knows perfectly well the effect of that cry in this House, and therefore it is he makes that answer to my proposition. Now, sir, that is not the object of the proposition. It is to prevent this compensation from being reduced by reduction of receipts which your bill will occasion, and to make the compensation adequate to the men who have to discharge these duties.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL. In line three hundred and twenty-five, after the word "respectively," I move to insert the following:

The collectors of internal revenue acting as disbursing officers shall be allowed all bills of assistant assessors heretofore paid by them in pursuance of directions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, notwithstanding the assistant assessor did not certify to hours therein, or that two dollars per diem was deducted from the salary or compensation before the computation of tax thereon.

Mr. JENCKES. I rise to oppose the amendment. I oppose it because it is a rider on the proviso. My intention was to move that the proviso be stricken out. I see no reason why the Secretary of the Treasury should have power to make or provide for these exceptional cases. If we are to pass a law, it should be uniform throughout the United States, and we should not leave it to any executive officer to suspend the operation of it so as to provide a different compensation than that provided by law. The irregularity suggested in the amendment is one of that character. It would leave it to the executive officer to do away with a penalty. I hope it will not be adopted, and then I will follow it by a motion to strike out the whole proviso.

The amendment proposed by Mr. MORRILL was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to strike out the following proviso:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to fix such additional rates of compensation to be made to assessors and assistant assessors in cases where a collection district embraces more than a single congressional district, and to assessors and assistant assessors, revenue agents, and inspectors in Louisiana, Georgia, South Carolina, Alabama, Florida, Texas, Arkansas, North Carolina, Mississippi, Tennessee, Missouri, California, and Oregon, and the Territories, as may appear to him to be just and equitable, in consequence of the greater cost of living and traveling in those States and Territories, and as may, in his judgment, be necessary to secure the services of competent officers; but the rates of compensation thus allowed shall not exceed the rates paid to similar officers in such States and Territories respectively.

This act affects the compensation of assessors, assistant assessors, revenue agents, and inspectors throughout the United States. This proviso enables the Secretary of the Treasury to increase the compensation within the districts named. Unless that power is given to him throughout the United States, so that it may be uniform, I object to the exception. I ask members of the House to look at it and see the effect it will have.

Mr. HIGBY. I do not know whether collections could be made in other States or not under a uniform law, but I do know that they cannot be made in the State of California. It has been tried and proved disastrous. I give members notice that the amount that will pay assessors in the eastern States will not pay them in California.

Mr. JENCKES. I have no objection to having a provision applicable to California.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to say that the provisions here are precisely what they are in the existing law with the exception of some half a dozen other States in which the Commissioner informed us it was impossible to obtain a revenue unless we provided for the payment of the officers in this way.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I find the States of Louisiana, Georgia, South Carolina, Alabama, Florida, Texas, Arkansas, North Carolina, Mississippi, and Tennessee, are provided for here.

Mr. MORRILL. There are many districts where there is no difficulty, but in others there is difficulty.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The difficulty is, the proviso applies to all the districts in all those States. Now, I have no objection to applying it to some where it is impossible to get officers unless you give them additional compensation. I know some officers have been appointed there who are not now receiving the compensation because they cannot qualify. But I have a statement of one of these officers from South Carolina, made before the Committee on the Judiciary, that any number can be found, residents of South Carolina, who can discharge the duties and who can qualify according to law.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I give notice to the chairman of the committee that it is now five minutes to ten o'clock.

Mr. MORRILL. We shall adjourn at ten. The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. JENCKES, there were—ayes 37, noes 25; no quorum voting.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being bill of the House No. 613, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. DEFREES, (at five minutes before ten o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BEAMAN: The petition of A. J. Sutherland, and others, of Washtenaw county, Michigan, praying that Congress will pass laws regulating interstate insurances of all kinds.

By Mr. DAWSON: The petition of 80 citizens of Fayette county, Pennsylvania, asking increased protection for American wool.

By Mr. KERR: The memorial of Leonard Smith, late lieutenant, &c., for compensation for ten months and twenty-six days' service as lieutenant and regimental quartermaster of the twenty-second regiment Indiana volunteers.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania: A petition, numerously signed by citizens of Fayette county, Pennsylvania, for increase of duties on foreign wool.

By Mr. MOORHEAD: The petition of John Woods, and others, citizens of the county of Montgomery, Pennsylvania, praying for an increase of duty on foreign imports to protect American labor.

Also, the petition of Hon. H. W. Williams, Hon. Thomas M. Howe, Alexander Gordon, and others, of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a Bureau of Education, and that provision be made for the education of all.

By Mr. WOODBRIDGE: The petition of Erastus Kelley, and 39 others, citizens of Clarendon Springs, Vermont, praying for an increased duty on foreign wools.

Also, the petition of Dr. W. C. Fox, and others, of Wallingford, Vermont, praying that medicines used by physicians may be placed on the free list.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 10, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM BROCK, D. D., of London, England.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of the Commercial Navigation Company, a corporation formed under the laws of the State of New York, praying for the passage of a law regulating the apprenticing of boys to be trained as seamen upon merchant vessels, uniform in its operation within the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of James S. Hendrickson, and one hundred and thirty-four other soldiers, residents of Cleveland, Ohio, praying to be relieved from the tax on their pensions and urging the appointment of disabled soldiers in the civil service of the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POLAND presented the petition of Simon Farnsworth, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DIXON presented the memorial of Marshall O. Roberts, and others, trustees of A. G. Sloo, who was a contractor for carrying the mails between New York, New Orleans, Havana, and Chagres, praying for the passage of an act authorizing the Postmaster General to settle for compensation due them for mail transportation which has not been paid for; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HARRIS presented a memorial of a convention of iron founders and manufacturers held at Syracuse, New York, in favor of exempting detached portions of their manufactures from taxation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of Harriet B. Crocker, of Bath, Maine, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of C. F. Johnson, praying for compensation for the alleged seizure of tobacco belonging to him by the United States forces at Lakeport, Louisiana, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF INDIANS.

Mr. WADE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas it is understood that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is now engaged in removing to and locating in one of the settled counties of Nebraska and contiguous to the settled portions of Dakota, the Indians who were engaged in the Minnesota massacre in the year 1862, by which nearly a thousand defenseless men, women, and children were murdered in cold blood; and whereas said Indians were driven from the State of Minnesota by the outraged people of that State in order to secure the future safety of the lives and property of its citizens; and whereas the removal and location of said Indians within our white settlements has been made without the consent and in direct opposition to the will of the citizens of northwestern Nebraska and Dakota, many of whom have purchased their lands from the Government and improved the same; and whereas it is apprehended that this act of the Government will destroy the value of private property and retard the settlement of the Territory of Dakota and northwestern Nebraska:

Therefore,
Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the facts, and report to this House whether and to what extent the interests and safety of the people who have purchased the public lands and migrated with their families to those Territories on the assurance of the protection of the Government, as well as the interest of the Government itself in the settlement and growth of the said Territories, are likely to be compromised by this act, and if so whether the same is necessitated by any considerations connected with the public interests; with leave to report such measures of relief as the circumstances of the case may in their judgment require.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 317) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," approved July 2, 1864; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

APPROVAL OF A BILL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. COOPER, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed on the 9th instant an act (S. No. 90) enlarging the powers of the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 352) to incorporate the National Theological Institute; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 568) to repeal section twenty-three of chapter seventy-nine of the acts of the third session of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, relating to passports, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SECRETARY TO THE VICE ADMIRAL.

The bill (H. R. No. 567) to amend an act to establish the grade of vice admiral in the United States Navy, was read twice by its title.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the Senate proceeds with the consideration of that bill, I desire to say that I have some notes on that subject which are at my room. I did not expect it to come up to-day.

Mr. GRIMES. What bill is it?

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that it is a bill in regard to the Vice Admiral.

Mr. GRIMES. It simply authorizes the appointment of a secretary to the Vice Admiral.

Mr. SUMNER. Then it is a different bill from what I apprehended it was from the reading of the title. I have no objection to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, which proposes to amend the second section of the act to establish the grade of vice admiral in the United States Navy, approved December 21, 1864, by adding to it these words: "and he shall be allowed a secretary, with the rank and sea pay and allowances of a lieutenant in the Navy."

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, by unanimous consent, reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAIL CONTRACTORS.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate a copy of a letter addressed to his Department by D. L. Yulee, formerly chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, dated in January, 1860, inquiring as to the effect of legislative action in increasing the pay of mail contractors, &c., also the answer of the Postmaster General thereto.

PUBLIC WORKS AT HARPER'S FERRY.

Mr. WILLEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform the Senate what is the present condition of the public works belonging to the United States at Harper's Ferry, in West Virginia; whether the Department is now using the same for any purpose, and, if so, for what purpose and to what extent; whether it is the purpose of the Department to have said works repaired and to resume the manufacture of arms there, and if not, whether in the opinion of the Secretary of War the property of the United States at Harper's Ferry is any longer necessary or advantageous to the public interest, and might not be sold or otherwise disposed of without detriment to the public good.

COINAGE OF FIVE-CENT PIECES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up the bill (H. R. No. 397) to authorize the coinage of five-cent pieces. It will take only the time occupied in reading it, I think. I do not suppose there will be any objection to it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that so soon as practicable after its passage there shall be coined at the Mint of the United States a five-cent piece, composed of copper and nickel, in such proportions, not exceeding twenty-five per cent. of nickel, as shall be determined by the Director of the Mint, the standard weight of which is to be sixty grains, with no greater deviation than four grains to each piece; and the shape, mottoes, and devices are to be determined by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the law now in force relating to the coinage of cents, and providing for the purchase of material, and prescribing the appropriate duties of the officers of the Mint and the Secretary of the Treasury is extended to the coinage herein provided for.

This coin is to be a legal tender in any payment to the amount of one dollar. It may be paid out in exchange for the lawful currency of the United States, (except cents, or half cents, or two-cent pieces, issued under former acts of Congress,) in suitable sums, by the treasurer of the Mint, and by such other depositaries as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and under general regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

From and after the passage of this act no issue of fractional notes of the United States is to be of a less denomination than ten cents; and all such issues at that time outstanding shall, when paid into the Treasury or any designated depository of the United States, or redeemed or exchanged as now provided by law, be retained and canceled.

If any person or persons not lawfully authorized shall knowingly make, issue, or pass, or cause to be made, issued, or passed, or aid in the making, issuing, or passing of any coin, card, token, or device whatsoever, in metal or its compound, intended to pass or be passed as money for the coin authorized by this act, or for coin of equal value, such person or persons are to be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof to be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, at the discretion of the court.

It is to be lawful for the Treasurer and the several Assistant Treasurers of the United States to redeem in national currency, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the coin herein authorized to be issued, when presented in sums of not less than $100.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the bill in section one, line eight, by striking out the word "sixty" and inserting "77.16," and in line nine to strike out "four" and insert "two;" so that the clause will read:

The standard weight of which shall be 77.16 grains, with no greater deviation than two grains to each piece.

This amendment is moved after conference between the Secretary of the Treasury, the head of the Mint at Philadelphia, and the special committee having charge of this subject in the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

DUTY ON LIVE ANIMALS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to take up House joint resolution No. 116.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish my friend from Michigan would give me a chance to pass a little bill which they say will save us a thousand dollars a day, and to which there can be no objection. It is a bill reported from the Committee on Finance, and it will cause no debate whatever. It is House bill No. 511, imposing a duty on live animals.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let my bill come up and then I will give away. I move to take up House joint resolution No. 116, to prevent the introduction of the cholera into the ports of the United States, and then it can be laid aside informally.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now I give way.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now, if the Senator gives way, I should like to take up House bill No. 511, imposing a duty on live animals.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that on and after its passage there shall be levied, collected, and paid, on all horses, mules, cattle, sheep, hogs, and other live animals imported from foreign countries, a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Since this bill was reported I have received information, which I believe to be true, that a good many persons, cattle dealers and others in the northern States along the frontier, have purchased cattle in Canada during the winter with the provision with the seller that they should remain in Canada until the spring, and that there are now in Canada a considerable number of cattle which are actually owned by citizens of the United States, and have been paid for under the law as it now stands admitting their importation free of duty. In order, as an act of justice, to authorize those people within a very limited period of time to withdraw their cattle upon the same terms they might have withdrawn them before, I offer the following amendment as a proviso:

Provided, That any such animals now bona fide owned by resident citizens of the United States, and now in any of the Provinces of British America, may be imported into the United States free of duty until the expiration of ten days next after the passage of this act.

That, I think, will do justice to that class of persons without doing any injustice to the revenue.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

ASIATIC CHOLERA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution (H. R. No. 116) to prevent the introduction of the cholera into the ports of the United States, is now before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, the question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GRIMES. When this measure was under consideration yesterday and the day before, the Senate was assured that its passage was asked for by the medical profession, and especially by the Medical Association that recently assembled in the city of Baltimore. I believe we were told that the doctors for once failed to disagree, and that they appeared before the Committee on Commerce unitedly in favor of this proposition. I apprehend that there is some mistake about this. I hold in my hand a letter written by Dr. M. L. Linton, of St. Louis, and addressed to the Baltimore American, in reply to an article which appeared in that paper containing substantially the same statement which was made here yesterday and the day before. I need not tell any person who is acquainted in the valley of the Mississippi river who Dr. Linton is, for he has a reputation coextensive with the limits of that valley as a gentleman of high professional attainments and great excellence of personal character. In this letter he says, addressing himself to the editor:

Mr. Editor: I notice in your report of the proceedings of the American Medical Association on the fourth and last day of its sessions some glaring mistakes.

It is well known to all who have attended to the proceedings of the association that it refused not only to memorialize Congress in favor of the system of quarantine, but that it refused even to ask Congress to test the utility of quarantine regulations. The majority of the association thought that quarantines had already been tested and found wanting often enough. At any rate, the vote was as I have stated; nevertheless, there was a minority in favor of petitioning Congress in favor of quarantine. This minority met at No. 47 Calvert street on the night of the 4th, and passed a resolution in favor of rigid quarantine measures; and appointed a committee of five to present and urge the petition.

The account in your journal goes on to say that "the meeting consisted of some seventy-five members of the association," and mentions Dr. Davis, of Illinois, as among them. Now, Dr. Davis was not there at all, nor can I find, after some hours of inquiry, any member of the association who was there. There were evidently not seventy-five present; nor did the few who may have met at No. 47 Calvert street meet at eight o'clock, for they did not arrive from Annapolis until about nine o'clock.

The main error, however, which I wish to correct is this: speaking of the Calvert-street meeting, your report concludes in these words:

"The meeting then adjourned, thus terminating the nineteenth annual meeting of the American Medical Association." Now, all the members of the association know that the final adjournment took place on the morning of the 4th, and that the little meeting at 47 Calvert street consisted only of one portion of the discontented minority that had been defeated in full convention. I hope you will make this correction, so that when the committee of five shall appear before the authorities with their petition, said authorities may know that said committee has been delegated and empowered and sent by a little outside meeting held at eight o'clock at No. 47 Calvert street, and not by the American Medical Association, which held its meeting in Concordia Hall, and adjourned on the morning of the 4th, to meet again at Cincinnati, May, 1867.

M. L. LINTON, M. D.,
Delegate from St. Louis, Missouri.

To the same effect I have a letter from one of my own constituents, Dr. M. K. Taylor, professor in the Iowa Medical College, also a physician of most excellent attainments, who attended the medical convention last week in Baltimore as a delegate from the Medical Association of the State of Iowa, which I will read:

NATIONAL HOTEL,
WASHINGTON, D. C., May 9, 1866.

Hon. J. W. GRIMES:

I see by the reports of the proceedings of the Senate yesterday that you opposed the establishment of a uniform system of quarantine for the United States, as asked for by certain medical gentlemen claiming to represent the American Medical Association, recently in session at Baltimore.

I am very glad that you have taken ground against such an impractical measure. We may just as well attempt to establish a cordon around the wind that blows. It will go over the country as it has done before, despite any and all quarantine regulations. The memorial which has been presented to the Senate did not emanate from the American Medical Association, but only from a few disaffected persons who were not satisfied with its action and got up a supplemental meeting after the association had adjourned. The principal leader in the affair was Dr. Sayre, of New York, and from the pertinacity manifested by him and a few of his friends I suspect there is an ax to grind.

The communication presented to the Senate does not represent the sentiment of the American Medical Association as a body in any sense.

I make this statement this morning as I shall leave for Keokuk this evening, and may not see you before I go, and I feel it necessary to apprise you of the facts before leaving the city. Dr. Hughes and family are here also. He leaves for New York this evening. He goes to Europe on Saturday.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
M. K. TAYLOR.

Mr. JOHNSON. Who is the writer of that letter?

Mr. GRIMES. Dr. Taylor, of Keokuk, Iowa, one of the delegates from that State to the late medical convention in Baltimore, and a professor in the Iowa Medical College. So much, sir, in regard to the sentiment of the medical convention recently assembled in Baltimore.

Both of these gentlemen have had great experience in the treatment of cholera cases, and their opinions are entitled to great consideration.

As to the imputation that might perhaps be considered as being conveyed in this letter, that some of these parties at Baltimore may have an ax to grind, I of course do not adopt any such statements as that; still it is quite possible that it may be so. I am aware that in the State of New York there has recently been a very exciting controversy over the question of appointing health officers. I believe the Governor of that State has appointed certain officers who are not agreeable to the parties who are opposed to them; and if I am not misinformed this Dr. Sayre was one of those proposed for the position now held by Dr. William Parker. I will not undertake to say that Dr. Sayre could be influenced by any such consideration, but it is possible that men might be found who would be influenced by a consideration like this; that they would desire that Congress should pass a measure similar to the one which now lies on your table, and which we are asked to pass, for the purpose of dispensing with the whole quarantine organization established by the State of New York, and installing another set of officers under Federal authority in the places which they occupy; for, sir, that is the effect of this resolution, if it shall be adopted.

When this resolution was under consideration before, I misconstrued the first section of the substitute. I supposed that it provided for a commission, to be composed of the Secretaries of War, of the Navy, and of the Treasury. From a more careful examination of the wording of this section, I do not understand that it does that. I understand that it puts the whole control of this quarantine measure in the hands of the Secretary of War, and then directs that the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury shall coöperate with the Secretary of War, under the direction of the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy; that is, under the command of the President. The phraseology is very singular. I have never seen a bill or resolution submitted to the Senate before in such phrase as this:

"That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, with the coöperation of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury, whose concurrent action shall be directed by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy."

Whose concurrent action? The concurrent action of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury. The President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, is required to direct the concurrent action of the Secretaries of the Navy and of the Treasury to coöperate with the Secretary of War, the Secretary of War being, in effect, virtually and legally, as I understand it, placed in command of this whole organization. It would be sufficiently objectionable to me even if the resolution were drawn as I supposed it was drawn when it was under consideration before; but it is still more objectionable under the construction which I am compelled to place upon this phraseology. What does it mean if it does not mean that? If they wanted to create a board of the three Cabinet officers having control of the Army, the Navy, and the Treasury, it would have been very easy to have said so. I apprehend from the fact that they have not said so, but have directed that the Secretary of War, "with the coöperation of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury, whose concurrent action shall be directed by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy," to "adopt an efficient and uniform system of quarantine against the introduction into this country of the Asiatic cholera, through its ports of entry whenever the same may be threatened by the prevalence of said disease in countries having direct commercial intercourse with the United States."

Now, Mr. President, could these doctors believe that it was possible for any central government at Washington to adopt such steps as might be necessary, even if quarantines are of benefit, to establish a quarantine at Galveston, at New Orleans, at Key West, at Mobile, at Eastport in Maine, at the mouth of the Sacramento river or at the mouth of the Columbia, at Rouse's Point in Vermont, or at Pembina in the State of Minnesota? Would it not be safer for the country, as well as for the Treasury of the country, to allow these various quarantines, if we are going to have such a system, to be established by the local and police governments of the respective States? Is it possible for the Secretary of War, even with all the power that is conferred upon him by this measure, to properly direct when a quarantine shall be established at Galveston, and when it shall be removed, and to designate the officers who shall have charge of it?

I confess, Mr. President, that this is about the greatest machine that I have ever seen proposed to be created or that I have ever known attempted to be run by any Government on the face of the earth.

Another great objection to this system is that it is going to break up all your present quarantines. The Secretary of War—mind you, this joint resolution is all in the singular number; the second clause reads, "he shall also"—the Secretary of War—"enforce the establishment of sanitary cordons, to prevent the spread of said disease from infected districts adjacent to or within the limits of the United States." He can go within the territorial jurisdiction of any State, he can dispense with all of the quarantine and police regulations that he may find already established there, and establish such as he chooses to establish instead of them. You thus accustom the people to rely on the central Government to protect their lives and their health, instead of relying, as they hitherto have done, upon the local authorities to protect them; and in the future, when a disease shall be anticipated, when it shall be reported that we are to be visited by the yellow fever or the plague, we shall have importunities after importunities from the different sections of the country upon the Federal Government to interpose to protect the lives and the health of the citizens at the various points. The people at these distant points will cease to be self-reliant. It will establish a precedent which in the end will in every respect be disastrous.

This bill is not satisfied with accepting the agents of quarantine that have been deputed by the various States. If it did that I should have less objection to it; but it authorizes all of them to be abolished and a new organization to be created, new officers to be appointed, the salaries to be fixed, as I understand it, by the Secretary of War. It virtually places the whole Army and Navy and Treasury of the United States in the keeping of one man, and that is the Secretary of War. If you have any doubt as to what was the intention of this bill you have only to read it though. You will see that it everywhere says this power shall be conferred upon the Secretary of War. He is the sole one, and he can command the obedience and is put into the control both of the Navy Department and the Treasury Department; and the President is required—"shall direct" them—to act with him. "Whose concurrent action shall be directed by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy" is the language.

Mr. HOWE. The Secretary of War is not Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. The President.

Mr. GRIMES. Certainly. Perhaps the Senator from Wisconsin has not understood me. I say that this bill confers all this authority upon the Secretary of War. It says "that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, with the coöperation of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury, whose concurrent action"—to whom does that refer? The Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury, "whose concurrent action shall be directed by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy." The President of the United States is required, it is imperative on him, to direct the coöperation of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out any of the views which the Secretary of War may entertain.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, this bill contains very extraordinary provisions—

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from New York will allow me a moment, I desire to state that I was about to propose an amendment which would meet the objections of my friend the Senator from Iowa as he has stated them, or some of them at least, and which may possibly meet the objections of the Senator from New York. If the Senator from New York will give way for that purpose, I move to amend the amendment reported by the committee by striking out lines three, four, and five, and inserting in lieu of them the words, "That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall constitute a board whose duty it shall be to cause," &c., and by striking out in line twelve the words "he shall" and inserting "they may."

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have sought to find the authority under which the framer of the proposition reported by the Committee on Commerce proceeded. It certainly is very extraordinary in its provisions. Coming as it does from the Committee on Commerce, I imagined that it might possibly be justified under the provision of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce, but I could not see that it had much to do with commerce. Then I went to that other elastic provision in the Constitution under which much of the doubtful legislation of the present day is sought to be sustained, that provision which requires Congress to guaranty to every State a republican form of government. I did not know but that it might be justified under that. [Laughter.] But finally, looking a little further, examining the bill a little closer, I came to the conclusion, inasmuch as this bill puts in requisition the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury, and over all these the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and the Navy, that it must be under the war power; and I believe that if this bill can be sustained at all it must be sustained under the war power.

Mr. CLARK. War on the cholera!

Mr. HARRIS. War on the cholera, as the Senator from New Hampshire says. I think that is it. I think that is the idea; I think that is the principle, if there is any principle about it, on which this bill is framed. Now, sir, it will not do at all. This bill is unconstitutional obviously. There is no power in Congress to pass a law like this.

Look at it, Mr. President. What are we attempting to do? Take my own State. We have in New York, I think, a very efficient, if it is not a uniform, system of quarantine regulation. We have within the last year established there a Board of Health, and upon that board there are some of the most eminent physicians in the State, able and efficient men, who are doing their duty with great fidelity. It happens that this board does not provide for all the doctors that are in New York. There are some who do not happen to be employed in carrying on this great work of quarantine, and of course they can suggest a better mode of doing the thing, and we have it in this resolution. We have there also a board of officers called commissioners of quarantine, who are actively engaged in the performance of their duty, for whose service a very large appropriation was made by our Legislature, with which we were able, in November last, to grapple with the cholera. A ship came from Havre freighted with cholera, with a large number of cases on board; but they were able to take care of it, and to keep it out of the city. We had a pretty rigid quarantine there, we thought. Then we have an efficient health officer with a sufficient number of assistants. On the whole, we have got a pretty fair system of quarantine.

Now, what does this resolution propose to do? To set aside the whole of that system, and take the whole power into the hands of the General Government, and to set the Secretary of War, with the cooperation of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, guarding the harbor of New York, and all the other harbors of the country. If it was not so serious a matter, I should regard it as very ridiculous. It is a thing utterly impracticable; it cannot be done.

It is said by those medical gentlemen who are endeavoring to frame this thing that it is very important to have it uniform. I apprehend that that is in itself entirely impracticable. You cannot adopt a uniform system of quarantine. Each harbor must take care of its own quarantine. I am entirely opposed to the measure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The objections which the Senator from Iowa has made, mainly, are answered, I think, by the amendment which I have had the honor to submit. I have no knowledge of the origin of this resolution, and therefore I cannot explain the motives under which the precise phraseology was originally adopted. But all that the resolution now proposes to do, if my amendment be adopted, is simply to create a board composed of the Secretaries of War, of the Navy, and of the Treasury, who shall have authority over this subject; and the only question to which I propose to address myself now is that of the power of Congress to pass this resolution. It was objected yesterday by the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] and is again objected to-day by the learned Senator from New York, [Mr. HARRIS,] that this exceeds our constitutional power. If it does, then we certainly ought not to pass it. If it does not, then in my judgment we ought to pass it. Now, what is quarantine? What is the precise thing which this resolution has in contemplation to be done? Is it not the regulation of the admission from foreign countries into the United States of persons and property? It is nothing more; it is nothing less. We are not undertaking to prescribe specifics for a pestilence or disease. The threatened existence of pestilence and disease is that which furnishes the motive for us to regulate the introduction of persons who may be infected with it within our borders.

Then, if I have correctly stated the proposition, the question is, have we authority to prescribe the terms and limitations under which persons and property may be received into the United States? And that is the whole question.

Upon this subject, rather than express my own feeble opinions, I beg leave to call the attention of the learned Senator from New York and the honorable Senator from Maine to the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking in the passenger cases, decided in the January term, 1849, where the precise point in judgment was the constitutional question whether it was lawful or not for a State to impose regulations and limitations upon the introduction of persons into the United States; and it was held, without dissension, by an able and unanimous court that the right to regulate the introduction of persons and property into the United States was clearly a regulation of commerce. Mr. Justice McLean, in pronouncing the leading opinion in that case, said:

"Commerce is defined to be 'an exchange of commodities.' But this definition does not convey the full meaning of the term. It includes 'navigation and intercourse.' That the transportation of passengers is a part of commerce is not now an open question. In Gibbons vs. Ogden, this court says, 'No clear distinction is perceived between the powers to regulate vessels in transporting men for hire and property for hire.' The provision of the Constitution, that 'the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year 1808,' is a restriction on the general power of Congress to regulate commerce. In reference to this clause, this court says, in the above case, 'This section proves that the power to regulate commerce applies equally to the regulation of vessels employed in transporting men who pass from place to place voluntarily, and to those who pass involuntarily.'

"To encourage foreign emigration was a cherished policy of this country at the time the Constitution was adopted. As a branch of commerce the transportation of passengers has always given a profitable employment to our ships, and within a few years past has required an amount of tonnage nearly equal to that of imported merchandise."

And then they proceed to pronounce the judgment of the court that these State regulations imposing a tax upon the introduction of passengers, which implies the power of course, and with it the exercise of it, to regulate the terms of their admission into the country, are unconstitutional and void. Therefore, of the subject upon which this resolution is to operate is the regulation of the introduction of persons and property, although the motive to it may be the prevention of the spread of pestilence and disease, is it not clearly within the very letter of the definition which I have read, the regulation of commerce? I do not appeal, as was intimated by the Senator from Maine yesterday, to the "general welfare" clause, although I think if we all in legislation looked a little to the general welfare in the exercise of our duties we should not be the worse for it. I do not appeal, as is supposed by my honorable friend from New York, to the war-making power merely because the power of the Secretary of War is invoked to execute this law. I appeal to that clear grant of constitutional power which is given to Congress to regulate the terms upon which persons and property may be imported into the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is House bill No. 280.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will ask unanimous consent that that order may be temporarily laid aside until we finish this resolution. I have but a word more to say upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the bill being laid aside until the Senator conclude his remarks, but there are other Senators who want to speak on this resolution, and I presume it would be debated all day. I have no objection to the Senator completing his remarks.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I shall not insist upon disposing of the resolution now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to lay aside the unfinished business of yesterday until he concludes his remarks. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have only to add a word to what I have said, and I shall have done. It has been objected that this is an extraordinary grant of power to the Secretaries who have been named, to employ the resources of the United States, as they have been described, its armies, its navies, and its Treasury, to repel this pestilence. It may be extraordinary, but that is no objection to its exercise if the exigency of the occasion requires it. Now, in the case of ordinary legislation, as for customs, for instance, the law is executed by providing penalties for its infraction and forfeiture of the goods which may be introduced into the country in violation of law; but in the case of a pestilence, which is the object to be excluded, he who undertakes to legislate by way of punishment against persons who violate the law and bring in the pestilence, fails to do his duty to the country, because the pestilence once introduced, punishment to the person who introduces it is a very inadequate remedy indeed. Therefore, in a case of this description, as in the case of the bill which has already been passed excluding cattle on account of the cattle plague, it is absolutely indispensable that the executive force of the law should go along with the enactment, and that so much of the power of the country as is necessary should be exercised at the time of the prohibition by way of prevention and exclusion, instead of by way of punishment and penalty afterward. Therefore this is one of those classes of cases where, if it is right to act at all, it is indispensable that the executive force of the Government should be brought to bear at the very moment of its execution by way of prevention rather than by punishment afterward.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, is now before the Senate, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] upon which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned last evening I was paying a passing respect to a remark made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] in a speech on this question some days ago. But, sir, I propose now to return to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] for the purpose of determining whether they or others stand upon this Baltimore platform. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin says that no power on earth shall drive him from it; whether besieged by Radicals on the one side or by Democrats on the other, there he is to stand, and stand forever; and I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania to occupy the same attitude upon that platform. If that platform is large enough, if there is any room for others, I propose to stand there with them for awhile, until they push me off or they leave it. This Baltimore platform was the political direction, the scriptural direction—if such a term is applicable to politics—upon which the last battle was fought and won, and I propose to hang to it. It was said by a distinguished member of the Cabinet not long ago that in these flurries and gales some few would be washed overboard and some left. I propose to weather this gale by standing upon the deck of the Baltimore platform. In examining this platform, sir, you will find that it contains only two very important provisions, and the first is the most important:

"Resolved, That it is the highest duty of every American citizen to maintain, against all their enemies, the integrity of the Union and the permanent authority of the Constitution and the laws of the United States;"

I understood the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania to say that the Democrats had got on to that portion of the platform. I trust that no power on this side will be exercised to drive one of them off. If they have been converted by the distinguished Senators from Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, so that they are content to stand upon that, it is a new era in their political history, one that will be noted with great favor as an instance of the wonderful power of the two Senators who have wrought the change—

"and that, laying aside all differences and political opinions, we pledge ourselves as Union-men, animated by a common sentiment and aiming at a common object, to do everything in our power to aid the Government in quelling, by force of arms, the rebellion now raging against its authority, and in bringing to the punishment due to their crimes the rebels and traitors arrayed against it."

That, sir, is the great cardinal principle of the Baltimore platform, and to every line and word of it I most heartily assent. It declared it to be our duty to maintain the Union, the Constitution, and the laws against all their enemies; but our Democratic friends did not see it in that light; they did not agree—and I refer to that portion of them who are now acting with the two distinguished Senators with whom I am holding this controversy—they did not agree then to that sentiment. If they did, that other convention which they now, with me, wish had never been held; at Chicago, would never have taken place. This platform, by the cogency of its reasoning and the potency of its argument, commanded the support of a large majority of the Union-loving men of this country. They had ascertained—and I congratulate the members of that convention, for I understand my friend claims to have taken a distinguished part in it—that the rebellion had reached that point where nothing but the force of arms could put it down; and the Baltimore convention pledged themselves to the country that no other weapons should be used, and when it was put down it followed as a sequence, in the just judgment of the members of that convention, that "the punishment due to their crimes" should be "awarded to the rebels and traitors arrayed against it."

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin three times thanked God during his speech that Andrew Johnson existed and held the office that he does. I shall three times three times thank God if he carries out the provisions of the Baltimore platform as expounded by himself. I suppose one reason for thanking God was the clear vision with which he saw his duty; and I am going to read now his own understanding, when that platform was fresh before him, of its meaning; and either President Johnson entirely misunderstood its meaning then or the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin does not interpret it truly now. In accepting the nomination for Vice President of the United States, Mr. Johnson said:

"The question is whether man is capable of self-government. I hold, with Jefferson, that Government was made for the convenience of man, and not man for Government. The laws and Constitution were designed as instruments to promote his welfare. And hence from this principle I conclude that Governments can and ought to be changed and amended to conform to the wants, to the requirements, and progress of the people and the enlightened spirit of the age."

Sir, I hold that as the announcement of a great and living truth. I do not suppose that it ever entered into the heads or hearts of the framers of that glorious instrument, our Constitution, that it was never to be altered, amended, or changed to meet the wants and exigencies of a progressive and advancing people. If it has so entered into the heart of my distinguished friend from Wisconsin, why does he boast now of being the foremost and first advocate of amending that instrument so as to keep pace with the progress of the times? So far, then, I indorse most cordially that sentiment which seems to be in union with the music of the times. But to proceed:

"And let me say that now is the time to secure these fundamental principles, while the land is rent with anarchy and upheaves with the throes of a mighty revolution."

What greater truth could be announced than that? And the Senate will remember that this is all under the authority of the Baltimore platform, as understood by its expounders.

"While society is in this disordered state, and we are seeking security, let us fix the foundations of the Government on principles of eternal justice which will endure for all time."

Most heartily do I, ranking among the radicals of this body—and I venture to speak for all who are thus designated—indorse the sentiment of the President of the United States.

"But in calling a convention to restore the State, who shall restore and reestablish it?"

A pregnant inquiry; and he answered it:

"Shall the man who gave his influence and his means to destroy the Government? Is he to participate in the great work of reorganization? Shall he who brought this misery upon the State be permitted to control its destinies? If this be so, then all this precious blood of our brave soldiers and officers so freely poured out will have been wantonly spilled; all the glorious victories won by our noble armies will go for naught, and all the battle-fields which have been sown with dead heroes during the rebellion will have been made memorable in vain."

Again let me pause to give in my most cordial and hearty adherence to that doctrine.

"Why all this carnage and devastation? It was that treason might be put down and traitors punished: Therefore I say that traitors should take a back seat in the work of restoration."

Again let me say that I most cordially concur in that; and that is the question that is now really under discussion. Let the traitors take a back seat, said the President. Sir, that sentiment was echoed from every hill-top and through every valley of this nation. So said Congress then, and so says Congress now. "Traitors to the rear," according to the order of the Commander-in-Chief. The Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy orders you to the rear; and why does the Senator from Wisconsin beckon them forward? "Traitors to the rear; back seats;" is the order of the Commander-in-Chief of this great nation.

"If there be but five thousand men in Tennessee loyal to the Constitution, loyal to freedom, loyal to justice, these true and faithful men should control the work of reorganization and reformation absolutely."

Will the distinguished Senator from either of the States I am now addressing tell me why these men should be allowed to partake in the great work of reconstructing all these States when Mr. Johnson at that day said they should not be allowed to aid in the work of reconstruction in a single State? This was carrying out the spirit of the Baltimore platform. He went upon the doctrine that "while the letter killeth, the spirit maketh alive." He had drank what the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, from his remarks made upon it, seems never to have tasted, the spirit of the Baltimore platform; and speaking in that spirit he declared, "Traitors to the rear; back seats; you shall not be allowed even to aid in reconstructing Tennessee, though there be not five thousand loyal men in the State." Exactly right was the President then. Around that little nucleus, charged with the spirit and living fire and zeal of the glory of our institution, would have gathered and clustered an army of Union men as resistless in its march as the army of the Potomac when led by Grant. But, sir, in an evil hour—and I propose to turn the Senator from Wisconsin exactly to the point—that doctrine was departed from, and I shall examine now with entire fairness what I think led to the departure from that doctrine.

Sir, I am not through with this oracle. To what I shall now read I call the attention of his distinguished champions here:

"I say that the traitor has ceased to be a citizen, and in joining the rebellion has become a public enemy."

So say I; so says every fair-minded man, that the traitor ceased to be a citizen; and in addition, so says the voice of the intelligent world; so says the law, before whose majesty the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania bows with such respectful deference always. Sir, that enunciation was from the very fountain of truth. It welled up; it was the gushing of an honest-spoken sentiment, and it received an echo everywhere on this continent. What, sir, has it come to pass in fact that a man can be red-dyed with treason one day and washed as white in the waters of loyalty as the lamb the next? Away with reading your miraculous conversion of Paul! Sir, that miracle would cease to be quoted if this theory were adopted here—a miracle in view of Almighty power, a miracle in view of the just understanding of mankind, a miracle in the eyes of justice, and an overthrow of every principle of law. What did he mean by this? He said to traitors, "Your garments are red with the blood of treason," and he gave the same direction that was given by Elijah to the proud prince of old, "Go wash seven times in the waters of Jordan, and be healed." So I say to these traitors, go wash seven times seven in the waters of loyalty, and be cleansed.

But, Mr. President, I am not quite done with this speech:

"I say that the traitor has ceased to be a citizen, and in joining the rebellion has become a public enemy. He forfeited his right to vote with loyal men when he renounced his citizenship and sought to destroy our Government."

Sir, human lips never uttered a more striking truth than that. That again awoke an echo in every heart, and raised and elevated the world's hope. Was it true then? If so, it is true now, and will remain true through all coming time. But I am not quite through:

"We say to the most honest and industrious foreigner who comes from England or Germany to dwell among us and to add to the wealth of the country. Before you can be a citizen you must stay here for five years." If we are so cautious about foreigners who voluntarily renounce their homes to live with us, what should we say to the traitor who, although born and reared among us, has raised a parricidal hand against the Government which always protected him?"

If language is to be understood at all in its usual signification, that means this, and no more, that no man who had been engaged in this treason should have a less probation than the foreigner. So say I, and so says Congress.

"My judgment is, that he should be subjected to a severe ordeal before he is restored to citizenship."

So said an afflicted continent; and to what ordeal has he been subjected? I speak what is patent to the world, and what is recorded history to-day, when I say that the only ordeal to which he has been subjected is to have been under the special charge and kind care of a most indulgent and magnanimous Administration. Who would have believed from these utterances that Lewis E. Parsons would have been made provisional governor of Alabama—a man who partook, in the darkest hour of our trials, in the legislation of the State of Alabama, introducing resolutions which I had here the other day in my hand denouncing in the most unmeasured terms the loyal citizens of this country? And yet the ordeal to which he was subjected was to receive a commission to go down and be doctor-in-chief of a disease which he had diagnosed most thoroughly, rebellion, treason. He knew every bone, artery, fiber, vein, that pervaded it, for he had treated every one of them. Oh, what an ordeal that was to pass! And a severer ordeal still was to receive his salary for it, out of money that you and I are taxed to pay, and that, too, without taking the prescribed oath by Congress! Oh, how Parsons must have suffered! What a change in "my policy" from before till after election! I have no doubt, however, that the distinguished Senators to whom I am addressing the most of these remarks will be able to explain it. [Laughter.]

"A fellow who takes the oath"—

I beg the Senator's attention to this—

"A fellow who takes the oath merely to save his property, and denies the validity of the oath, is a perjured man, and not to be trusted."

He knew of what manner of men he spoke. So said the President of the United States; and, remember, all this time he was accepting the Baltimore platform as his guide. Now, there is a change, whether for the better or the worse we shall see by and by.

"Before these repenting rebels can be trusted let them bring forth the fruits of repentance."

Amen. That is precisely what Congress has said all the time: bring forth fruits meet for repentance; come here in a spirit of repentant submission; come here as the sinner should come; come as the felon should come; acknowledge your crime, and though your sins be as scarlet we will make them white as snow. Is that the way they come? No, sir. The distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Davis] told us the other day what he would do if he were President; he would call up pro forma the rebels who have been elected to Congress, and if he were President he would regard them as such. We who echo every sentiment which I have read are to be driven from these Halls to make room for these anything else than repentant rebels. Their second state is worse than their first. I know not whom that distinguished Senator echoes, but I have seen in nearly every print of the South, I have read in prints in this city recommendations that this high priest should dispose of this "irregular" Congress, that have no better indorsement than a loyal people, to make room for those whose skirts smoke now with the blood of this rebellion. I know not what may come. I entertain no particular fears for myself. If that issue come, let it come, and an outraged people will settle the question very quickly. Sir, if the votaries of treason have not had victims enough, let them invade these Halls and victimize the representatives of a great people. They are, it seems to me, more voracious than the grave, more unsatisfied than the horse leech's daughter that cried "Give," "Give," till there was no more to give. They are not satisfied with passing by the countless new-made graves; they demand additional victims here; that this Hall, so sacred in the recollections and in the history of the country, shall be made to run with loyal blood to make room for those who but yesterday were trying to tear down its pillars.

Can an American Senate long discuss such a question? Has it come to this, that members sitting here with the high commission of a loyal people are to be threatened, and upon this floor, with an exercise of that power which would have made Nero blush to utter its name? Let it never be uttered here again; but I repeat, if liberty and freedom demand that further sacrifice, your victims are ready.

Sir, the sentences and utterances which I have read were the expressions of the now President of the United States just before the election. These utterances, these expressions, were like an electric touch to the wire; they electrified the whole community, and he was borne upon the shoulders of as loyal a people as ever breathed to the highest place of power on earth, borne there by the exertions of many of the members of this circle. But I am not quite done with this speech:

"He who helped to make all these widows and orphans, who draped the streets of Nashville in mourning, should suffer for his great crime. The work is in our own hands."

What work? To make them suffer. The work of making the rebels suffer, said the President, is in our hands. That portion of the work, if done at all, has been done so as not to excite the observation of the world. Who suffers? I will tell you, Mr. President who suffers; it is those who are fleeing from the presence of the unwashed rebels. This work is in our hands, said the President; he falters in it; Congress proposes to take up the work and do it without him. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether any of the rebels have suffered since the war.

"Ah! these rebel leaders have a strong personal reason for holding out."

What reason?

"To save their necks from the halter."

Why, sir, the hemp is not grown yet, nor sown, that will hang a rebel in this country. They held out and they are not hung. They held out longer than they ought to have done, and they have gone longer without hanging than they ought. So says an intelligent world, and so said, above all, the President himself. He said further—

"Treason must be made odious, and traitors must be punished."

I have often heard that quoted; but he did not stop there.

"Treason must be made odious, and traitors must be punished and impoverished."

That is a thing that hurts the traitor worse than anything else, to impoverish him. Where is the traitor that has been impoverished? What does impoverishing mean? It means confiscation. There has been none of that of any consequence that there was not a respectful obedience by the authorities of this country in returning the property to its much abused rebel owner! What, sir, return their property to the rebels when the great high priest of this Union party declared that they must not only be punished but impoverished! Why is not that promise kept? Sir, I do not ask that question alone; it is the voice of millions; why has not that promise been kept? Let him who made it answer, or his friends for him.

"Their great plantations must be seized, and divided into small farms, and sold to honest, industrious men."

Where is the great plantation that has been sold and divided among honest men as contradistinguished from its former owners? The Senator from Wisconsin when he replies will probably tell us where these confiscated estates are, and where these honest men have found homes on these cut up plantations.

"The day for protecting the lands and negroes of these authors of rebellion is past."

So said President Johnson. If he spoke prophetically, it has not turned out as he prophesied. Then he is no prophet. If he spoke by virtue of the power that was about to be conferred upon him, I think he has not exercised it.

Now, to every one of these living, breathing announcements, Congress says, amen. Then what is the occasion of any difference between the President and Congress? I venture to assert that I have not read in this whole speech a declaration that every member of this body who pretends to be loyal will not respond to as true. Remember, too, that all this was said under and by virtue of the Baltimore platform; said by this intelligent man when he accepted the nomination under that platform.

"The day for protecting the lands and negroes of these authors of the rebellion is past. It is high time it was."

I shall be pardoned for saying I think so too. It was high time that protection to rebels should cease. What have they done since to entitle them to the confidence of an outraged people? Let the history of the times answer. He next proceeded to give some Union officers what I have no doubt was a truthful reprimand:

"I have been most deeply pained at some things which have come under my observation. We get men in command who, under the influence of flattery, fawning, and caressing, grant protection to the rich traitor, while the poor Union man stands out in the cold, often unable to get a receipt or a voucher for his losses. The traitor can get lucrative contracts, while the loyal man is pushed aside, unable to obtain a recognition."

Then the President had on a holy glow of indignation at such outrages as these, and most properly; he spoke as became a man of feeling. It was an outrage; it is an outrage. Has it been changed? Go to the mountain gorges of Tennessee, and see the fresh-made tracks of the fleeing fugitives, the Union men, from the fury of their pursuers, the traitors. Who hunts the pursuers? No one. I therefore reiterate this same complaint on behalf of the fleeing fugitives who loved their flag better than their State, who are now finding homes at the sources of the rivers and in the gorges of the mountains. Far distant are they; but I stand here on their behalf to maintain the fulfillment of this promise. It is due to the dignity of this nation; our dignity demands it, and the people will have it.

I am now through with the particular speech from which I have been reading, but a little later, on the 24th of October, 1864, the present President's gushing heart gave forth other utterances. He was called upon by a few returning braves who represented a regiment which had been thrice recruited, because it had been thrice decimated in battle; a regiment of colored soldiers, and he addressed them thus:

"Negro equality, indeed," cried he; "why, pass any day along the sidewalk of High street, where these aristocrats more particularly dwell—these aristocrats whose sons are now in the bands of guerrillas and cut-throats who prowl and rob and murder around our city—pass by these dwellings, I say, and you will see as many mulatto as negro children, the former bearing an unmistakable resemblance to their aristocratic owners. Colored men of Tennessee, this, too, shall cease."

He changed the entire color of the African race in Tennessee from that day, by order. [Laughter.]

"Your wives and daughters shall no longer be dragged into a concubinage, compared to which polygamy is a virtue, to satisfy the brutal lust of slaveholders and overseers. Thenceforth the sanctity of God's holy law of marriage shall be respected in your persons, and the great State of Tennessee shall no more give her sanction to your degradation and your shame."

And having, in language which you all remember, promised to be their Moses, he added:

"I speak now as one who feels the world his country and all who love equal rights his friends."

What a pinnacle of exaltation that must be! I almost envy him who stands on it. Standing on it he would be expected to speak words of encouragement to these men:

"I speak, too, as a citizen of Tennessee. I am here on my own soil; and here I mean to stay and fight this battle of truth and justice to a triumphant end. Rebellion and slavery shall, by God's good help, no longer pollute our State. Loyal men, whether white or black, shall alone control her destinies; and when this strife in which we are all engaged is past, I trust, I know, we shall have a better state of things, and shall all rejoice that honest labor reaps the fruit of its own industry, and that every man has a fair chance in the race of life."

Sir, I often envy men when they seem to speak from this high exaltation. I have sometimes tried to reach it; but my wings are too feeble. The sentiments, however, that drop from such an exalted position make a deep lodgment in my heart. These utterances gave to a nation, white and black, needed words of encouragement; and the downtrodden slave breathed freer and deeper as these utterances were echoed to him. Congress, full of this inspiration—my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] first catching it—passed a bill to establish a Freedmen's Bureau to give power to carry out and perfect the essence of this exalted sentiment. The President, I need not say, refused to sign it. My distinguished friend from Wisconsin came panting in here one day in a hurry to say that if he had been present on the question of the passage of that bill he would have voted for it. I mourned over his disappointment that he could not have recorded his vote for so holy and righteous a measure. The distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DIXON] shared in the early glory of having voted for it. That little parchment came back; and where then were the regrets of my distinguished friend from Wisconsin? His disappointment had fled. Where then was the gushing sympathy with this immortal sentiment uttered by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut? When that dread question came, Shall this bill become a law notwithstanding the objection of the President? up went Wisconsin, or half of it, half of Connecticut, half of Pennsylvania—

Several SENATORS. The whole of it.

Mr. NYE. Well, one is always one way anyhow. My friend BUCKALEW is always wrong, or right, as may be the case. From that fearful flight, I am sorry to say, these gentlemen have never returned as they appeared when they left; they are changed men; they do not fraternize with those whom they used to fraternize with, but have made their beds constantly with new companions. How dare the Senator from Wisconsin and the conscientious Senator from Connecticut go back to these holy sayings of their President? What excuse can they give? The principal excuse was, I believe, the cost of the measure. Who ever expected that four million people who for centuries had bowed their necks to degradation could be lifted up to the platform of human equality and not have it cost something? Sir, whenever the time comes when I weigh a benefit to my fellow-man against dollars and cents I shall probably vote as they did. It will not do. The Freedmen's Bureau bill was killed, and it was killed in the house of its friends. I shall have no ghosts haunting me; I voted for it first and last, and my vote was prompted by the best feelings of my heart. Cost something! Sir, the unrequited toil of the slaves, the sweat from their brows had made rich the men that now bear their pardons in their pockets for their infamy, and rejoice that the Freedmen's Bureau bill was killed.

That awoke the first shouts of the dormant Democracy. "Hurrah for Johnson!" said the Democrats. It even evoked a gushing speech from my friend from Delaware, who had lived through Buchanan's administration. Both the Senators from Kentucky, the Senator from Delaware, the Senator from Connecticut, and the Senator from Wisconsin were holding sweet communion over the defeat of this bill, which was founded, I repeat, on the best impulses of the human heart.

But, sir, that is not all. This bill originated upon the hypothesis that the old law of last year establishing the bureau originally was dead. Here, however, the President exhibited a very unusual power. I am glad to see that he possesses it. He convinced the world that if he could destroy, he could create. While one bill was crucified and killed, he resurrected another; so that the opinion and judgment of Congress was indorsed, that measure having originated here. If it had been my case, I should have said to Congress, as the old bill is in operation I return this to you as not being necessary.

There came the first line of marked deviation. Then came the civil rights bill, crowding upon the heels of the other. Indeed they were born together, twins in birth, mutual in operation, one being the aid and helper of the other. The civil rights bill did what the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] declared it was almost unnecessary to do, because it followed as a sequence when slavery was abolished; but that bill clothed this downtrodden people with the superb and indescribable garment of American citizen. Sir, who has not felt proud that his vesture was the citizenship of the United States of America? To us who inherit it how rich and how precious! To those who have it by the power and force of our arms how inestimable! If I had an angel's tongue I could not describe the ecstasy with which they receive it. If I had the wisdom of my friend on my left [Mr. SUMNER] and the tongue of Cicero I should be unable to describe the indescribable emotions of the transition from slavery to citizenship.

That bill, too, did not find favor at the other end of the avenue. That was misfortune number two. If it were proper for me, I would stop right here and do what would be irregular, pay a passing compliment to the firmness with which that occasion was met. Were I not a member of this body I should do so. As it is, I will simply say that over and above the President's objection the civil rights bill was carried, and there never had been such rejoicings in this nation since the morning stars shouted for joy. It was the resurrection and the life to four million people. It was a noble, manly vindication of the integrity and fixed purpose of this nation. It spoke freedom, not only to the millions here, but to the downtrodden and oppressed abroad. That bill is a law, and, thanks to Almighty God, there is no power now to recall it. It will stand an everlasting monument to the integrity of Congress. When the historian shall write the proudest victory of this war, the manly bearing and perseverance and determination of Congress in passing the civil rights bill will share the most prominent page. I hailed it then as an announcement to the world of the fixed purpose of the American Congress.

For that act the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] made those utterances which were suppressed in the Globe, in which he said that if he were President he would have this Congress out and another in. Sir, this Congress will not go out until it goes out by the limitation of the term of its existence, and then in every case probably, save my own, those who have been true and faithful will receive from a grateful constituency the indorsement, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Now, sir, I have examined the Baltimore platform in view of the exposition made of it by the President himself; I have examined the passage of these two bills to see whether he was keeping on that track. I remarked yesterday, and I repeat, that I have said nothing harsh of the President of the United States, but there is something wrong, and I am looking for it. I think I find it in his Washington's birthday speech. It is proper for me to say that during these struggles, when the earth was heaving under our feet, and when nothing but the roar of cannon, the rattle of the drum, and the flash of steel was seen and heard all around us, Congress in its wisdom saw fit to pass a law prescribing an oath to guard against the return of red-handed rebels. It is known as the test oath. My friend from Wisconsin labored hard to show that the policy of the present President was the policy of his predecessor. Sir, Mr. Lincoln heartily approved of that oath; he signed the bill prescribing it; and I take it my friend from Wisconsin voted for it, as he does for most of the measures passed here, or as he did at that time. Now, in this birthday speech I see a birth of something strange. Let me quote a little from it. (Sutton & Murphy's Reporter, No. 15, page 16.)

"I repeat, I am for the Union."

That is good.

"I am for preserving all the States."

So am I.

"I am for admitting into the councils of the nation all the representatives who are unmistakably and unquestionably loyal."

So am I.

"A man who acknowledges allegiance to the Government and swears to support the Constitution must necessarily be loyal."

There is the mistake. As a proposition, I deny it. Breckinridge took that oath while perjury black as hell was smoldering in his heart. The president of your late confederacy had taken the same oath over and over again. Wigfall had taken it. Were they loyal? Sir, I deny the proposition that swearing makes a man loyal. If I could reconstruct the South to-day upon an oath, I would call them up and marshal them altogether and tell them to hold up their right hand and swear. Why, sir, these rascals have not only sworn to support this Government, but another, and they have broken both oaths. Will you tell me now that swearing makes a man loyal? No. My friend from Pennsylvania yields that point, and when he yields it, everybody else ought. [Laughter.]

But that is not all. There is a little more cat under the meal here. I will read that again, for it is not true:

"The man who acknowledges allegiance to the Government, and who swears to support the Constitution, must necessarily be loyal."

That would have done years ago; but experience, that stern and unflinching teacher, has taught us a great deal lately. Why, sir, they have sworn four times, and yet oath piled upon oath will never make a traitor loyal. Treason to the moral man is what consumption is to the physical man; he never gets well of it. [Laughter.] It taints the whole moral man; it is a disease incurable; nothing but death can stop it.

But let me quote a little further:

"A mere amplification of the oath makes no difference as to the principle."

That is, that an oath to support the Constitution is sufficient; and to require him to swear that he has not given aid or comfort to the rebellion is a mere amplification, which is of no use, and will not help the strength of the oath.

"Whatever test is thought proper as evidence and as proof of loyalty is a mere matter of detail, about which I care nothing."

I do.

"But let a man be unmistakably and unquestionably loyal, let him acknowledge allegiance to the Constitution of the United States, and be willing to support the Government in its hour of peril and its hour of need, and I am willing to trust him. [Applause.]

"Applause." But who by? By that horde of anything but loyal men that surrounded him on that occasion. I will not call names, but I chanced to be here in the early days of this rebellion, and I saw men shouting on the 22d of February who were not suspected of loyalty at that time. "Applause." What for? The test oath was to go. This mere amplification amounted to nothing! Let me inform the distinguished Senators from Wisconsin and Pennsylvania that right there the gulf becomes as wide, as deep, and as impassable as that between the rich man and Abraham's bosom. Right there I stop. I never will vote to let one of these rebels back here, on a simple oath to support the Constitution, to seize the reins of power. Others may do as they please; but on the day of judgment, when I stand in judgment for the deeds done here, that sin shall not be placed to my account.

I want to know if the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin desires this test oath repealed. [Mr. DOOLITTLE shook his head.] Then I congratulate him that he and I agree on that point. But, sir, this thing does not stop here. A recommendation has been sent here from the Executive Mansion requesting the repeal or modification of this oath, upon the plea that the men whom they want to place in power are covered all over with the stench of infamy, and we are asked to let them up a little; some of them are not quite as bad as others. Sir, ever since the world began there have been two kinds of devils abroad, little devils and big ones, and the little devils have always been the most troublesome. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, we have had the Baltimore platform and the birthday speech. We have had the utterances of the President upon that platform; and I am going to assume, without any disparagement to my friend from Wisconsin, that the President knew as well what the Baltimore platform was as he did. Now, I want my friend from Wisconsin to tell this Senate and the country wherein the policy of the present Administration—if you call the President alone the Administration—agrees with Lincoln's. Lincoln was a firm adherent of this test oath. He saw in it the anchor of our safety. While that existed the ship, however much tossed at her moorings, would be safely anchored in the haven of quiet and repose and safety. Sir, take away that anchor, and you will see these vacant seats filled by the men who vacated them with the avowed purpose of tearing this Government and rending it in pieces.

Mr. President, I remarked yesterday that I thought there was no blame to be attributed to Congress for not having acted more speedily. The work of restoring this country is a great work. The labor imposed upon the shoulders of this Congress is Herculean. They are to build up where treason has torn down. They are to heal these wounds as best they can. The man who had in his employ a person who had enveloped his house and his children in flames by the torch, and would take him back into his employ the next day, would be considered a fit subject for a lunatic asylum. The same rule of prudence, caution, and care should prevail here. The wounds upon our institutions are everywhere seen. The blood yet oozes freely from wounds that never can be healed. And yet my distinguished friend from Wisconsin says we must take them in! Sir, there is a little example before us on this subject. In olden time a copperhead was found stiffened with frost. A humane husbandman, like my distinguished friend from Wisconsin, put him in his bosom to warm him and thaw him out. What did the copperhead do? He stung him to death. After that example I do not propose that any of that breed shall find warming here. [Laughter.] My friend from Wisconsin, with his great gushing heart, wants to take such things in his bosom. Look out for your armpits. [Laughter.]

One thing more, sir, and I have done. I hope the Senate will pardon me for detaining them so long. I am alarmed at another doctrine that is broached by the distinguished Senators from Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, and they are not alone in it. It has got so here that we cannot discuss even a sanitary bill but the doctrine of State rights is brought up. The cholera is obliged to pay its respects to State lines. My friend from Wisconsin said the other day he was the advocate of State rights. So was Davis; so was Breckinridge; so was all this host of rebels that fled. It was that infernal heresy, as illustrated and demonstrated by them, that lighted the torch of rebellion. State rights! Mr. Stephens believes in that doctrine yet, for he swears that he believes now that the States have the right of peaceful secession. State rights with proper limitations undoubtedly exist; but I protest against the latitudinarian construction given to that term by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and the Senator from Wisconsin, which would again light this country with the torch of rebellion.

Mr. COWAN. What other can you give that you are against, besides that of secession? Everybody is against that. What other one do you oppose?

Mr. NYE. I am against all of these pretended State rights that mar the harmony of the action of the Federal Government. What State right are you in favor of?

Mr. COWAN. All of them.

Mr. NYE. Certainly; that is what I supposed, including secession and all others.

Mr. COWAN. No, sir. That is the fallacy of the gentleman's argument: that because secession is not a State right, and was not intended to be one, therefore all other State rights are to be ignored and forgotten.

Mr. NYE. I am not going to stop now to discuss in detail this doctrine of State rights, because I do not think it would be profitable. I do not know that I can exactly describe, and I do not know that the Senator can exactly, what he means by State rights. I speak of the interpretation that has torn this Government in fragments. They called it what we called it, State rights. They not only held the right of these States to secede, but they denied the right of the General Government to force them to remain in the Union. So held your great Pennsylvania leader, the then President, with whose friends you seem to be acting pretty much now. I hope my friend from Wisconsin will not get the nightmare, State rights, firmly seated on him. Why do you not talk about State wrongs? But a State can do no wrong; it is only the barrier that is seen in this General Government! I hope the Senator will not persist in this doctrine of State rights again. If he does, he will have to settle it with his own conscience and with an enlightened constituency.

But, Mr. President, "hurry" seems now to be the word. "My policy" is immediate. Three weeks ago I went over to Arlington heights. I counted there a great many graves, and they told me there were fourteen thousand dead soldiers reposing upon the heights of Arlington. Early in May, 1861, I stood upon those heights, and there was not a grave there. The inquiry naturally arose in my mind, why are so many here now? I found a quick and ready answer in a recurrence to the terrible revolution of the last four years. There lie mingled the remains of rebels and the remains of Union men. I noticed not unfrequently, as I passed along, the inscription "unknown" on the head-board of the Union soldier. Sir, in behalf of that unknown soldier, I require prudence at the hands of this Congress. There I got the inspiration, if I may use the expression, of extreme caution. I stand here the advocate of that unknown soldier; and in his name and by his memory I demand of the Congress of the United States that they shall tread cautiously in this great work of binding up the wounds of the country. In the name of all the dead, I demand it. In the name of mourning millions, I require at the hands of everybody who is engaged in this work to see to it that it is done in such a way as to render a recurrence of this terrible rebellion impossible. Stain not again the fair fields of this country with loyal blood; rear no more hecatombs of loyal bones; but stand here in this breach made by them, as the Romans stood, firm and determined that what you do shall be well done, and that it shall not require doing again. If all these recollections are not enough, in the name of the martyred Lincoln I demand prudence at the hands of the American Government. If that is not enough, I demand it in the name of the mangled living.

My friend from Wisconsin will pardon me, having great faith, as he says, in the final result, if I call his attention to another view. Sir, beyond the grave we shall meet an army of three hundred thousand dead, who will never again answer to roll-call on earth, but in the day of judgment they will be there. In their name and by their memory, by the immortal death they died and lives they lived, I demand that Congress and every department of this Government shall tread cautiously in this great work of reconstruction. Sir, my mind is made up. Encounter whatever opposition it may, from whatever source, I will be prudent. By all the sacred recollections of the past, I demand caution. By all that is garnered up in the rich treasure-house of the future, I demand caution. In the name of liberty and freedom itself and its perpetuation, I demand caution in every step you take. Rush not madly on to any policy. See where your strength lies and follow that. See where the right lies, no matter whose policy it may be, and follow it, though the heavens fall.

Sir, I entertain no fears for the future of this country. It is written by the finger of Omnipotence Himself that this nation is to be the freest, noblest, happiest nation of the earth. Through whatever tribulations we may have to go I see through the mists and the fogs of the present its coming glory in the future. This continent is destined and dedicated as the abode of a happy and free people. If our sufferings have not yet been sufficient to bring us to the true consideration of what is demanded at our hands, it may be that we shall be called upon to wade through still deeper afflictions; but, sir, the spirit of this people will rise with the demand. It will carry on to perfection the great work commenced by our fathers here of making this the abode of the free and the home of the oppressed of every race and clime. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There must be order in the galleries, or they will be cleared.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I, too, like the honorable gentleman who has preceded me, have stood by the graves of the martyred thousands. I, too, have had pressed upon me all the solemn considerations which he so eloquently portrays. I have stood where the Senator has not stood; I have stood over the grave of my first-born son, who fell a sacrifice in this rebellion. I have been tried, not only by all the great considerations that can move the statesman, but I have been tried by the deepest emotions of the human heart. And standing over the grave of my best beloved, the pride of my life, I have raised my hand in the presence of Him who liveth and reigneth forever, and have sworn that I would never give over the struggle till the rebellion should be suppressed, the Union restored, and peace and prosperity returned once more to our country.

Sir, I made hundreds of speeches, not so able as that of the honorable Senator who has preceded me, but in the same vein, while we were in a state of war. I made them to nerve my countrymen to the conflict. I made them to fire their indignation. I made them to fill up the ranks of our Army, and rush our sons to the shock of battle. God Almighty! Does not the Senator know the difference between war and peace? We are not now in the midst of war. Peace has come upon this country, and the duties and responsibilities that rest upon us are those of peace, not of war. When we had the responsibilities of war upon us, and we were bound to nerve every arm and strain all our power to overcome a gigantic rebellion, there was no argument, no appeal, nothing that could be said to arouse the indignation and fire the heart of the country, that we did not say. But now when peace has come upon the country, shall we still go on with speeches to wage war? That is the question. I say that no principle of magnanimity demands or tolerates it; no principle of wise statesmanship will justify it; no spirit of Christianity can tolerate it for a moment.

Sir, I, too, like the honorable Senator, expect to meet that train of martyred dead when we all go to our final account; and the question I expect to be called upon to answer at that dread reckoning, will be, "In what manner have you treated a fallen and vanquished foe when he had surrendered?" Shall I treat him still as a foeman? Shall I treat him still with a spirit of vengeance; or shall I treat him as a Christian, as a man? Sir, there is nothing in history, nothing in statesmanship, nothing in Christianity, which tolerates or justifies a spirit of unrelenting vengeance which would still undertake to slaughter by wholesale those who have been engaged in rebellion.

But, sir, that the rebels should be punished is true. As a mass they have been punished. Take the States and the people of the States that have been engaged in this rebellion—I speak of them as a mass—and they have already been punished sufficiently to satisfy a sense of justice when considered by any wise statesman or by any just-thinking man. That there may be individuals who have been most deeply engaged in this rebellion who still ought to be prosecuted and brought to trial and punished for their great crime, I do not doubt. For more than six months there has been pending in this body a bill to enable the courts, which alone can try these offenders, to obtain jurors which are necessary in order to have a jury at all.

I am sorry that the honorable Senator from Nevada has left the Chamber, for after putting to me so many pointed questions I desired to put some to him. I put this question to the Senator, and those who sympathize with him: how many do you wish to hang? Answer the question. Sir, the men who are continually denouncing the Executive for not prosecuting and hanging the leaders of this rebellion have never yet ventured to say, and they will not undertake to say, that this Government could or should or ought to go into a wholesale prosecution against those who have been engaged in the rebellion. A very few prosecutions would satisfy even those who are the most determined and bent upon the prosecution of those who have been engaged in the rebellion.

Is the Executive at fault for not entering upon the punishment of those men? How should he punish them? Should he order their execution without any trial? I am sorry the Senator has left his seat, but I wish to deal with him frankly. I wish him to answer that question. I ask those gentlemen who sympathize with what the Senator from Nevada has said, and denounce the President for not bringing these men to punishment, do you propose that he shall execute them, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, without trial? Is there a man in this body who would undertake to say that? Is there one single man on the floor of this Senate who will say that the President of the United States ought to take Jefferson Davis, or any other person engaged in this rebellion, and order him to be shot or hanged without trial? There is not a man, with all this denunciation of the President, that dare stand up and say it.

Then the question arises, how are they to be tried? Some, perhaps, will say by a court-martial or a military commission. The Supreme Court have decided that civilians not engaged in the Army cannot be tried by a military commission or court-martial. What, then, are you going to do about it? If the President, under these circumstances, should order a court-martial to try men who are not civilians, men who are not in the Army, and condemn them, and sentence them, and shoot or hang them, the President would be guilty of a high misdemeanor in the violation of the Constitution of the United States. How, then, are they to be tried? They must be tried in the tribunals of justice. They must be indicted; they must be brought before a court; they must be arraigned and tried as other men are tried for the commission of offenses. I see that my honorable friend from Nevada is now present, and I desire to put the question to him, how many would you try, and in what manner would you try them? By military commission or in court?

Mr. NYE. Do you want me to answer now?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do.

Mr. NYE. If the Senator will give me a day or two to make up a list of the number that I would have hung, I will do it with pleasure. I cannot name them now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not ask the gentleman to specify the names; how many, in round numbers?

Mr. NYE. I would hang enough to fulfill the assertion of the President that treason should be made odious.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. How many, in the opinion of the Senator, would be necessary?

Mr. NYE. Five or six.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Very well; that answers one question. Now, I ask the honorable Senator, in what way would you try them; by a military commission, or court-martial, or would you try them in court?

Mr. NYE. I want to answer that question in two ways.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to have a direct answer.

Mr. NYE. I should not have kept them until this issue had arisen as to how we should try them. I would have hung them then. If I had had my way I would have hung Jeff. Davis, no matter how I tried him. When the two great armies, that of General Sherman and the army of the Potomac, were mustered out in this city, I would have had them formed in a hollow square and hung him there, and the world would have said amen. I suppose now we shall have to try him by law.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is the answer of the Senator. I simply desired to get his opinion. His answer is, that he would have ordered Jeff. Davis to be executed without trial in the presence of the discharged soldiers of the grand Army of the United States. Mr. President, I undertake to say that such a proceeding as that on the part of the President of the United States would be held to be murder by all the enlightened judgment of the world.

But the Senator now goes further and says that inasmuch as he was not executed without trial, executed first and tried afterward, it has gone on so far now that he thinks the proper mode of trial is to try him in a court of justice according to law. We have advanced to that point in the argument. His opinion is, and we may understand, notwithstanding all this denunciation by the Senator of the President for not punishing these traitors, that he would now have five or six of the leading rebels of the country tried, and tried in court according to law. Sir, how will you do it? Can you try them in a court if the judge will not sit and hold it? Has not the President for months been urging upon one of the justices of the Supreme Court, within whose jurisdiction Jeff. Davis is, that he hold a court so that he can be tried; and has not the judge refused to hold the court upon the pretext that he desires the question to come before Congress, for its action in some shape, before he assumes to do it?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If my honorable friend will allow me, as I am dealing with another very strong man, I do not wish to deal with two strong men at once.

Mr. HOWARD. I merely wish to correct the Senator on that point.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I must decline to yield to the Senator. I am in the midst of an argument, and do not like to be drawn off.

Mr. HOWARD. I will reply hereafter.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Without a judge to hold a court, you cannot try one of these offenders. Not only a judge is necessary, but a jury is necessary; and here arises a practical difficulty, how can you obtain a jury? Sir, you know, everybody knows, that when you impanel a jury, by the decisions of very many of the courts, by the decisions of Chief Justice Marshall in the Burr trial, when you call a juror upon the stand, and the question is whether he can sit upon the jury or not, the question is raised whether he has formed any opinion based upon newspaper reports or information or history or rumor. If he has formed any opinion in the case he cannot sit on the jury. That is the ruling of several of the northern States, New York, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, and others. Chief Justice Marshall, in the Burr trial, ruled in that same way. I believe those rulings are wrong; but at the same time they are the rulings of the courts upon that important question. How, then, can it be corrected? There is no way to correct it except by a law which shall declare that when jurors are called, the fact that a juror has formed an opinion based upon public rumor, based upon newspaper reports, based upon the history of the times, shall not exclude him from the jury-box provided the judge is satisfied that notwithstanding that bias of opinion he can still try the case and find a true verdict according to the evidence. For six months that bill, introduced by myself, has been in this body with a view to try to avoid a very practical difficulty, so that some of these men could be brought to trial.

Why, sir, let us take a practical case. Suppose this, instead of being the Senate of the United States, was a court, and your honor was the justice presiding, and we who are here present were all jurors summoned, and Jeff. Davis were here, and put upon his trial, and the men here were summoned one after another to the jury-box, and the counsel of Jeff. Davis should put the question to them, "Have you formed or expressed any opinion upon the guilt or innocence of the accused?" what would they answer? Is there an honest man who would not be obliged to say that from the history of the times, from newspaper reports, from his own information, he had formed an opinion? Suppose the Senator from Nevada were asked whether he had formed an opinion. He would be compelled to say he had. I see he is not now in his seat. Suppose the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] was called. He would be compelled, as an honest man, to say that from what he had heard about it he had formed an opinion that Jeff. Davis was guilty. What would the judge say under this ruling? "Stand aside, sir." You would go on from one Senator or juror to another until the whole panel was exhausted, and you could not get a jury at all. There is no loyal man to be found that you could get upon a jury who had not formed or expressed an opinion. Sir, you could not get a jury at all.

Now, I ask the honorable Senator and those who stand with him, is it advisable for the President of the United States to put Jeff. Davis on his trial, when you are sure you cannot get a jury; when, if you put him to his trial he will be acquitted? Which is the best policy? I wish to have done with this eternal clamor and denunciation against the Executive for not bringing these men to trial. There is not, and there never was, and never can be conceived a charge so utterly groundless and without the shadow of a foundation as this charge brought against the Administration for not bringing these men to judgment.

That is one point in the honorable Senator's discourse of to-day to which I call attention. There is another point. He is denouncing the President for the exercise of the pardoning power. There are thousands and thousands of these men unpardoned. All the great leaders of the rebellion are still unpardoned—not merely the five or six whom the Senator would bring to judgment, but thousands upon thousands. They are to be found everywhere throughout the South. If he can conceive a mode in which to bring them to trial, if he can aid in bringing them to trial, he will perform a better service, perhaps, than in denouncing the Executive for not endeavoring to do what is both impossible and absurd for him to undertake to do in the present state of the case. The responsibility rests not upon the Executive; nor do I rest under the responsibility of this charge. I have done all that I could do to secure the enactment of a statute which alone will authorize any of these men to be put upon trial.

It is sometimes charged that the men who were engaged in the military service, the officers of the rebel army, General Lee and others, might have been tried by a court-martial and executed. Who does not know that the very terms of surrender on which the rebel soldiers laid down their arms provided expressly that if they went to their homes and kept the peace and obeyed the laws and the Constitution of the country, they should not be disturbed by the military authorities? Who does not know that when an attempt was made to indict General Lee, and the question was referred to General Grant for decision, who made the negotiation with him, that General Grant spurned the idea that under the stipulations of that treaty General Lee was to be disturbed as long as he obeyed the conditions of the stipulation? I say again, banish from this Senate, banish from every assemblage of honorable men this clamor against the Administration for not trying and executing the men who have been engaged in this rebellion.

But the honorable Senator—I wish he were here—says and repeats it, "Where is Clement C. Clay? Paroled; permitted to go to his home in Alabama." I could turn him to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to answer where is Clement C. Clay, and why he was paroled. I have here the recently published letter of that Senator. I bring no charge against the Senator from Massachusetts for writing this letter which I am about to read, for he has become a convert to the new theory of reconstruction invented by the other Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] to wit, that of universal amnesty.

"UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER."

Yes, sir, from this very Chamber, within a few feet of where stood the Senator who at the top of his voice asked "Where is Clement C. Clay," went forth the letter of appeal from the Senator from Massachusetts for his release:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
WASHINGTON, March 3, 1866.

SIR: Mrs. Clay, the wife of Clement C. Clay, is now in the city, and has requested me to obtain permission for her husband to go to his home on parole. His father is said to be at the point of death, his mother recently deceased, and, if there be no objections or reasons unknown to me why the request of Mrs. Clay should be denied, I have no hesitation in recommending its favorable consideration, if only from motives of humanity, as I have no doubt Mr. Clay will be forthcoming when his presence is again required by the Government.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

H. WILSON.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

There is an answer to the question. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of this body, in the humanity of his nature, for which I do not reproach him, made this powerful appeal to the President of the United States that Clay should be released upon parole, and pledged, so far as he could pledge himself for the honor of Mr. Clay, that he would return whenever the exigencies or the demands of the Government required it. I say, then, away with this denunciation against the Executive because he has permitted this man, from humanity's sake, to go upon his parole to the State of Alabama.

Mr. President, there seems to be a strange division in the opposition to the Republican Administration arising here in Congress; and I presume gentlemen will take no offense if I should classify this division that seems to spring up. First and foremost in Congress is that distinguished and veteran old leader, a Representative from Pennsylvania, who leads one branch of this distracted opposition now making war upon the Republican party. I refer to Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS. He is the leader and chieftain of what I will denominate the universal confiscation party. In this body stands the acknowledged leader of another wing of the opposition to the Republican party in the person of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] which may be denominated the universal negro suffrage party. Then there is still another branch of this distracted opposition, of which I may say the honorable Senator from Nevada who has just taken his seat is the leader and chieftain—the hanging party. And last, but not least, comes that new party which, so far as I know, has yet obtained in this body but one recruit—the party which is led by the other Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART]—the universal amnesty and universal suffrage party.

We see these parties distracted, arrayed against each other in opposition to the policy of the Republican party which Mr. Johnson inherited from the Administration that went before him.

"Black spirits and white,
Red spirits and gray;
Mingle, mingle, mingle,
You that mingle may."

Now, Mr. President, I will turn to another point. The Senator from Nevada denounces me, as well as the honorable gentleman who sits beside me, [Mr. COWAN,] because we sustain here what are denominated State rights. Sir, I do stand here to defend State rights—not State wrongs, but the rights which do belong to the States under the Constitution; not a right to secede from the Union, not a right to break up the Government, not a right to overthrow the authority of the Government and form a new Government; but the rights which the Constitution does secure are just as sacred to me as any other right for which my heart ever aspired or my voice has ever pleaded. I tell you, sir—and that, in my judgment, is the great mistake of the men who are continually straining every nerve to centralize all power here in the Federal Government—I tell you, if it were the last word I ever uttered, that unless we can defend the rights of the States, it is in vain to hope that we can defend the rights of any individual citizen who resides within the States. For the great mass of human rights, the rights which I have in my family, in my wife, in my children, in my home, in all my surroundings, in my reputation, in my person, in all the great rights which I hold dear, I find my protection in the power and independence of the State in which I live. It is Wisconsin which defends my wife, my children, my homestead, all those near and dear liberties that cluster around and make life on earth desirable. The Federal Government defends Wisconsin from aggressions from abroad. The Federal Government defends Wisconsin in the enjoyment of free and unrestricted commerce and liberty with the other States of the Union. But, sir, when it comes home to the liberties of the individual citizen, I tell you that State rights, and State rights alone, are their protection; and the man who overlooks it does not understand the very foundation on which our liberties rest.

Sir, while I would give to this Government every power which the Constitution gives, while I am willing to sacrifice all that I have and all that I am to maintain its supremacy, I tell you with just as much earnestness that I am for defending the rights of the States under the Constitution from being aggressed and encroached upon by the insidious legislation of Congress. Let no man, therefore, stand up to charge me with believing in the doctrine of secession. The right to secede is not one of the rights of the States; but it is one of the rights of the States to defend and control their own domestic institutions. I say to gentlemen here who are pressing every nerve to concentrate all power in this Government that they are sleeping on a political volcano of which they form no conception—a volcano that will sweep them and the party that they sustain out of power, if they continue to trespass upon the rights of the States, with as much certainty, and consign them to as much condemnation as the old Federal party of 1800 ever received at the hands of the American people.

Sir, to defend the rights of the States is our great duty now. We have fought the battle for the Union. We have crushed all opposition to its supremacy. We have compelled every armed rebel to ground his arms and submit to its authority. All the war forces and war machinery of this great Government are waked up and are in full play. The train is made up, the engines are in motion, and all the danger is that now that the war which waked up these forces to engage in it have ceased, now that peace has come, we must still keep the war engines on the track, and the war powers in full operation.

In my judgment, that is the great mistake which the honorable Senator from Nevada makes. He does not realize that the war has ceased. He is still making war on the South. He is still denouncing them as rebels. He is still firing the northern heart and treating them as if they were still in arms against the Government. Sir, that is not the duty of this hour. I know very well that when we were in the midst of this great war that with whatever force of language or of sentiment or of thought I have been endowed I have urged upon the people when the war was pending to wake up all these tremendous powers. I remember on one occasion to have used this language, on the 9th of February, 1864:

"War and not peace is our real situation. Whatever may have produced this state of things, war is upon us with all its necessities, with all its realities, with all its stern duties, and we must fight it through. At this hour, whatever will give strength to our armies in the field and bring revenue to support them, demands the first consideration of Congress and of every department of this Government. If left to me I would speak but one word, 'Fill up the ranks, press on the columns.' To spare the unnecessary shedding of blood; to save the resources of the country; to solve all financial questions, and put our credit upon a basis so strong as to command the money of the world, I would speak no other word but 'Fill up the ranks, press on the columns.' To secure liberty and Union; to secure peace with all the other nations by inspiring them with respect, and to put a final end to that conspiracy, founded on slavery, which makes war against us, I would still say, as the most radical and at the same time the most certain of all measures, 'Fill up the ranks, press on the columns.'"

That, sir, was the language of myself as a humble member of this body when we were in the midst of the war, when blows were to be struck and victories to be won or all to be lost. That was the language when I could feel in my soul that the very life of this country depended upon the many arms of her sons; whether the country was to live or die depended on whether we could crush the military force of the rebellion. Sir, we have crushed it, in the blessing of God, we have broken it down, it has surrendered; and now what is our condition? Peace. What are our victories now to be won? Moral victories. Then it was military victories, the war of forces; now it is a war of mind with mind, heart with heart, judgment with judgment, sentiment with sentiment, prejudices to be overcome, hearts to be warmed into affection to the Government; and the man who does not know that in a moral warfare magnanimity is more powerful than denunciation, that love is more attractive and powerful than hatred, knows nothing of the human heart. He has not read history, he has not studied statesmanship, he knows nothing of Christianity or of its divine teachings, who does not know that a fallen, stricken foe, surrendering to your power, is better governed by magnanimity than by vengeance, by love than by hate.

But, say these gentlemen, the President is abusing the power to pardon. I have in my hand one of the forms of this instrument which is executed as the pardon. It is executed upon conditions, and the conditions which are imposed have commanded the judgment and the admiration of the world. Sir Morton Peto—if my honorable friend from Massachusetts will allow me to quote a titled authority—Sir Morton Peto, when he returned from this country to Europe, spoke of the conditions which were contained in this instrument of pardon upon which the rebels renewed or declared their renewal of allegiance to the Government as a thing which would challenge the admiration of mankind. One would think, standing here and listening to the arguments of gentlemen like the Senator from Nevada, that we were in the court of St. Petersburg dealing with Poland, or that we were in the court of some of the tyrannical kings of England dealing with Ireland. "Confiscation!" "Hanging!" "Infernal rebels—give them no terms and no quarter!" "They are no longer to be regarded as worthy of the name of an American citizen," though they have surrendered, taken the oath of allegiance, laid down their arms, and for months and months, and for a whole year or more have shown by their acts and by their conduct that they are determined to live at peace and in subjection to the laws of the United States; and so well have they behaved that even the Senator himself, with all the vengeance to which he could give utterance, declares here, when I put the question to him and brought him to the point, that he himself would not try but five or six.

I will just refer to one or two of the conditions which are contained in the pardon. The President grants to an individual—

"Full pardon and amnesty for all offenses by him committed, arising from participation, direct or implied, in the said rebellion, conditioned as follows: '1. This pardon to be of no effect until the said A B shall take the oath prescribed in the proclamation of the President, dated May 29, 1865.'"

And, sir, what is that oath? It is an oath by which the party solemnly swears—

"In presence of Almighty God that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and the union of the States thereunder, and that I will in like manner abide by and faithfully support all laws and proclamations which have been made during the existing rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves. So help me God."

Every man who accepts this pardon takes it upon condition that he will support the emancipation proclamation of the President of the United States and all the laws of Congress passed in relation to the emancipation of the slaves. This binds them by the express condition of the pardon itself. If they violate it, if they refuse to obey those laws, if for any reason they shall violate this oath, not only the crime of moral perjury rests upon them, but the pardon itself becomes absolutely void. What further, Mr. President? This pardon contains another condition, that it is "to be void and of no effect if the said A B shall hereafter at any time acquire any property whatever in slaves or make use of slave labor."

The great majority of these pardons were issued before the constitutional amendment had been adopted by a number of States sufficient to ratify it. Bear in mind that the great object, one of the very greatest objects in view in the closing up of this rebellion was the utter extirpation of slavery; and every man who took a pardon bound himself to favor the proclamation of emancipation and bound himself never to own any slave labor or to buy or sell a slave. This was binding them in advance of the passage of the constitutional amendment. I undertake to say that no wiser, more politic, or more efficient instrumentality could be used in the southern States than to bind the men who sought pardon to favor emancipation and the emancipation proclamations and the extinction of slavery. Sir, to whom were these pardons given? Generally to those men who have property. If a man living in a State where slavery existed is not permitted himself to own slaves, does he desire that the institution of slavery should exist around him? Not at all. It makes it his interest, his policy, as well as his sworn duty, to do all in his power to extirpate slavery, what we were trying to do. Men are denouncing the President of the United States for doing the very thing for which we had been struggling in this contest, denouncing the pardons given by the President when they were the greatest instrumentality to influence that people and operate upon the minds of that people to bring them to favor the emancipation of the slaves and the adoption of this very constitutional amendment.

I say, then, let us hear no more of this denunciation here because the Executive in the exercise of that high power with which the Constitution has clothed him, has used his power in the most potent way possible to destroy the institution of slavery, at the same moment that he was binding them by oath, by interest, and by duty to support the Government of the United States.

Every pardon was accepted by the person receiving it upon these express conditions. I have before me the form of acceptance addressed to the Secretary of State:

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the President's warrant of pardon bearing date —, 186—, and hereby signify my acceptance of the same, with all the conditions therein specified.

There is one other point in the Senator's speech to which I wish to call attention. He has repeated here time and time again during his discourse that the purpose on our part who sustain the policy of the Administration is to bring immediately into the Halls of Congress unwashed, bloody-handed rebels, with their skirts yet smoking with the blood of our sons. Mr. President, I hurl back the charge as utterly unfounded. There is no man here sustaining the policy of the Administration that has ever avowed any such doctrine as that. The immediate admission of unwashed rebels! No, sir, no!

It has been charged again and again, the newspaper press has been loaded down with these infamous falsehoods, for infamous they are, in charging upon the President or his supporters that it was their purpose to bring into Congress rebels to rule the Government. It is utterly false. But what have they contended for? They have contended that Congress should judge, the Senate for itself, the House of Representatives for itself, upon the admission of its members. My friend upon the right [Mr. SUMNER] smiles as I refer to this argument. It is an argument which he never has met and never can meet. I say that the Senate of the United States under the Constitution is made the sole judge when a person coming to its doors shall enter or shall not. I say that the President of the United States has no more to do with that question than the judges of the Supreme Court, and I would spurn any attempt by either President or court to overrule the Senate in its judgment on that question. Sir, I put a case not long ago in reference to the State of Maine; I will call it again to the attention of the Senate. It is necessary some times that things be repeated and repeated again and again. What was the case I put? A State may be interrupted by civil war or foreign war. If we were engaged with a war with England, her forces might come down the river St. John, perhaps, advance into the State of Maine, and capture a portion of the State, as she once did in the war of 1812. Suppose she should capture one of the congressional districts, could that district elect a member to the House of Representatives? No, sir. Suppose she should capture two, could those districts elect members to the House of Representatives? Not at all. Maine has five congressional districts. If Great Britain should capture all but one, could that one elect a member to the House of Representatives? Although foreign war had overrun four fifths of the State, four of the five congressional districts, still that one district would be entitled to its representation in the Congress of the United States. How would it be with the Senate? If the enemy should capture one district or two districts, Maine could still elect a Legislature; but suppose she was to capture four of the five districts of Maine, could Maine elect a Legislature? No, sir, Maine could not elect a Legislature. If she could not elect a Legislature, she could not elect a Senator. Could not the Senate judge of the fact whether Maine was in a condition to elect a Legislature, whether there was a Legislature to elect a Senator, as well as judge whether the Senator had been elected according to the forms of law? So, in such a case as that Maine might be entitled to a Representative in the House of Representatives when she would not be entitled to a Senator in this body.

It is just so with a civil commotion or civil war. A civil war may disturb one district in a State so that it cannot elect a Representative, and yet the other districts may. When they had a rebellion in Massachusetts long ago, and one of their congressional districts was overrun, perhaps it was so disturbed that they could not elect a member of Congress at that election, while all the other districts might. So if a whole State should be overrun by a civil commotion, it might not be in a condition to elect a Legislature at all. Could not the Senate judge of that? The Senate has the right to judge whether there is a Legislature to elect a Senator, and the supreme judgment is given to this body, and it does not belong to the other

House and it does not belong to the President and it does not belong to the Supreme Court; and I would no more regard the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House than I would regard the marshal of the Supreme Court or than I would regard the private secretary of the President if they should come here to tell us whom we should admit or whom we should exclude. No, sir, we by the Constitution are made the supreme judges of the fact whether Senators are elected, whether there is a Legislature to elect them.

Mr. President, gentlemen have supposed that on one occasion here they found the Senate voting that Congress must join in some act before members could be elected. True, sir; and when was it? We were in the midst of the war, and the question came up whether we should allow them to elect presidential electors to take part in the decision of the question of the Presidency. There was a bill pending here to organize all the southern States as Territories; the bill had passed the other House under the lead of Mr. Davis, and in this body was urged by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE.] Mr. BROWN, of Missouri, moved as a substitute for that bill a proposition which declared that during the insurrection those States should not elect electors for President and Vice President; that those States should not elect members of Congress until there was a proclamation made by the President in pursuance of an act of Congress to that effect; and it passed without any discussion on that question.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator yields so seldom that—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On this point I am willing to yield. I am not in any particular argument just here, and I am willing to be interrupted.

Mr. CONNESS. I propose to ask the Senator if he does not know that upon the question of the admission of Louisiana, under the recommendation of President Lincoln, it was never proposed, either by the President or anybody else, that the Senators from Louisiana should enter this body until both Houses, by the form of a joint resolution, had first settled the question; and I now ask in more concentrated form of the honorable Senator whether the then President of the United States, Mr. Lincoln, or himself, the honorable Senator, ever proposed to admit the Senators chosen in Louisiana, under that so-called State government, in any other manner than under the form of a joint resolution first.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will answer the Senator. I voted for the resolution, or struggled for the resolution, in that form, a resolution that was reported by the Senator from Illinois from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CONNESS. And in no other form.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There was no other form presented; but the Senator from Illinois knows very well what my opinion was on that subject, and what his was, that it was not essential to the power of the body that there should be a joint resolution; but a joint resolution would receive the sanction of some members which the measure could not receive if it was put in the other form.

Mr. CONNESS. Now I will thank the Senator for one instant more of time and will not trouble him again. Did the Senator ever hear the then President of the United States, Mr. Lincoln, object to the passage of a joint resolution declaring Louisiana under that organization fit for union with the other States?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. Nor anybody.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Nor did I ever object to it; and if you will introduce a resolution tomorrow declaring Tennessee entitled to representation I shall not object to it; but at the same time I do not surrender the power of this body to judge whether Senators shall come in, whether the other House agree to it or not.

That is the point with me. Whether we allow the House of Representatives to say we shall have Senators in this body from Tennessee or not is a mere matter of courtesy toward the House, not a question of power. I do not admit their power to control us on the question of the admission of members. We have the right to admit them if we choose to do it, whether the House join or not; but if a joint resolution is brought forward now I am perfectly free to vote for it. I never stand upon mere forms. It is only when the doctrine is avowed and urged that this body has not the power and the jurisdiction over the question, and when it is sought to gag this body and bind it hand and foot so that it cannot act upon the question until it shall receive the assent of a majority of the House, which may be controlled by some outside party caucus arrangement under the lead of the member from Pennsylvania, that I protest. I am not willing that the Senate of the United States should surrender that jurisdiction which the Constitution has vested in it absolutely without appeal and alone in the Senate. That is the point I make.

Mr. President, I have not referred to what the honorable Senator from Nevada brought forward and made so prominent in his speech to-day, to wit, my action upon the Freedmen's Bureau bill or the civil rights bill. I have purposely refrained from that for the reason that when those resolutions, to which I have already referred, of the Legislature of Wisconsin shall be taken up, and I be permitted to speak for myself and of my own action upon that subject, I intend to cover the whole subject at once and not trespass more than once upon the attention of the Senate, and therefore I have put these two questions aside for to-day.

I conclude, sir, by saying, as I said in conclusion yesterday, that the amendment now pending before the Senate is meant for and intended for nothing else than to declare a want of confidence in the Administration, to attack the Administration in that particular thing in which never in the whole history of the Government has Congress ever sought or attempted to attack an Administration before.

I object to the amendment, also, for the other reasons which have been stated, and they have been stated by others so clearly that I shall not occupy the time of the Senate in pursuing them further. I have risen simply to reply to one or two of the charges made to-day by the Senator from Nevada, namely, that the Administration had been derelict in not bringing traitors to trial, that the Administration had been derelict in the pardoning power; and to reply, also, to a charge which he made against me, though I do not think that he intended to charge me with it in an offensive sense, that I was an advocate of the doctrine of State rights. I have explained on this occasion to some extent the views which I entertain on that subject.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, it was my intention to make some remarks in reply to the kind allusions of the honorable Senator from Nevada to myself; but I see that he is not in the Chamber. I am no sportsman. I am told, however, by sportsmen that while it is the best mode of shooting a bird to fire when he is on the wing, I never heard one say that it was wise to shoot when the bird was out of sight; and therefore I shall not trouble the Senate now, but shall take occasion when I shall see the Senator present, provided the occasion is a proper one, to return the compliment which he paid me yesterday.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President—

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator from Michigan will give way I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I appeal to my friend from Michigan. I suppose he desires to address the Senate upon political questions.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to address a few words to the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator, as the debate has become somewhat personal, whether we had better not dispose of this matter and get this bill out of the way. I would like it as a personal favor. This bill is under my charge, placed there in consequence of the sickness of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and I should like to have it out of the way.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Ohio is not more anxious to dispose of the present bill than I am, still I cannot very well suffer the occasion to pass without making a few remarks upon some of the numerous subjects which have been drawn into the discussion. If it is the desire of the Senate to go into executive session I will yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator desire to speak upon the particular subject pending—on the question of removals?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I propose to address the Senate on the bill and the various other subjects which have been regarded as cognate and relevant thereto by certain other Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, two thirds of the members of the House having agreed thereto. At the suggestion of Mr. FESSENDEN, the joint resolution was read twice by its title, and placed upon the Calendar.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 10, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. T. R. HOWLETT.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the joint resolution reported by the committee on reconstruction, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has the floor.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in discussing this question briefly, as I am compelled to do by reason of the limited time allowed me, I shall advert to the proposition now before the House as a whole, not undertaking a lengthy discussion of the various amendments which have been proposed, and I trust the chairman of the committee [Mr. STEVENS] will, when the proper time arrives, call the previous question, and in that manner induce a vote upon the main proposition as embraced in the whole five sections of the proposed amendment to the Constitution.

And for that purpose I desire to analyze the various sections of the proposed amendment. The first section proposes to make an equality in every respect between the two races, notwithstanding the policy of discrimination which has heretofore been exclusively exercised by the States, which in my judgment should remain and continue. They relate to matters appertaining to State citizenship, and there is no occasion whatever for the Federal power to be exercised between the two races at variance with the wishes of the people of the States. For myself, I would wish that the colored race should be placed in the same political condition as it occupies in Pennsylvania; but I would leave all this to the States themselves, just in the same manner as the elective franchise is permitted. If you have the right to interfere in behalf of one character of rights—I may say of every character of rights, save the suffrage—how soon will you be ready to tear down every barrier? It is only because you fear the people that you do not now do it. I consider the Federal restraints upon the States in reference to rights of citizens as now in the Constitution safe and sufficient. I feel it, in consequence, my imperative duty to oppose this section. Grant this power, insert it in the Constitution, and how soon will the privilege of determining who must vote within the States be assumed by the Federal power? Gentlemen here admit that they desire this, but that the weak kneed of their party are not equal to the issue. Your purpose is the same, and but for that timidity you would now ingraft negro suffrage upon our Constitution and force it on the entire people of this Union.

The second section, to my mind, is ambiguous, and is liable to a doubtful construction. What does this amendment mean? Does it mean that those males over twenty-one years not allowed to vote shall not be counted in the basis of representation? If so, why not say so in terms; but if it means, as it may, that the diminution of representation is to be in proportion they bear to the voters, it may deny all or greatly abridge representation. Suppose, for instance, a State with one hundred thousand voters, and a similar number excluded, if proportions are considered this State would seem to have no Representative. I desire that my colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] the gentleman having charge of this legislation, shall answer what they claim it to mean, so that the issue when before the country may be rightly understood.

In addition, this section makes an entire change in the basis of representation, which should in every country rest upon inhabitants. This is the safest and has been found to work the best. I do not consider there is any need to change, more especially when a large portion of our people with whom we hope for all time to live on terms of peace and equity are not now here to present their views and consider the effect this legislation will have upon their interest.

The injustice and the animus of the third section have been so fully stated by gentlemen on the other side that I will not consume my limited time in reproducing, but dismiss it with the remark that it is intended to secure what you most wish, an entire disagreement to the whole scheme by the eleven southern States, and a continued omission of representation on this floor. This brings me to another point in the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania who introduced this report.

The fourth section I need not discuss, because I believe if that proposition was presented to this House as a simple proposition it would be almost unanimously adopted. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] tells us—

"Upon a careful survey of the whole ground, we did not believe that nineteen of the loyal States could be induced to ratify any proposition more stringent than this. I say nineteen, for I utterly repudiate and scorn the idea that any State not acting in the Union is to be counted on the question of ratification."

In this respect let me say that the gentleman must fly directly in the face of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States; he has to put at naught the precedent established in reference to the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery; he has to overcome what is clearly the common-sense judgment of the people of this country upon this point. And moreover, I believe his opinion, as there expressed, is in contravention of the judgment of a majority of this House, with whom he is politically associated.

Such is the plan of the committee of fifteen, or what may perhaps be described as the congressional view of this vexed question. It is a plan of disunion, and it is a deception to call it otherwise; and the friends of the Union, by whatever name, must coöperate to defeat this measure, or the Union will sooner or later be destroyed by those who have arrogated to themselves to be its special defenders.

This proposition is worthy of having emanated from the tower of Babel. It carries with it a confusion of tongues and a confusion of purposes. One design, however, is clearly apparent, and that is to secure the success of the Republican party, even in the event of the overthrow of the Union.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what have we in the opposition to this plan of procrastination and delay? The President, immediately upon his accession to the Presidency, took up the plan which Mr. Stanton informs us was the mode which Mr. Lincoln had marked out for himself; and he has steadily pursued it, regardless of threats and clamor, exhibiting a moral courage of the equal of which we have but rare instances in history. Thus guided by wisdom and prudence, he has brought us along until now the admission of loyal representatives in Congress from the late rebel States is all that is required to complete and make perfect our Union.

His plan is simple and effective, just and equitable; and acceptable, as I believe, to a vast majority of the people both North and South. What is this policy?

1. That the southern States are in the Union. Their ordinances of secession being null and void, they have never been out, and are legally entitled to representation in Congress.

2. That whenever the people in any of those States elect Union men, of whose loyalty there can be no question or doubt, it is the duty of Congress to admit them.

3. That all those claiming seats in Congress from the southern States who were prominently identified with the rebel government or rebel army should be immediately rejected and their constituents requested to elect loyal Union men in their places.

The issue is now made up, and to the people we must appeal. It rests with them whether we shall at once permit the people in the eleven States to do as Generals Grant and Sherman told the soldiers of their disbanding armies to do—go home, resume their occupations, be good citizens, and then promised them that they should not be disturbed.

No real and hearty peace can for years come from the course the majority in this House are pursuing. You are continuing to do with the loyal people of the South what the rebels did during the war, persecute and condemn them. All this is unjust, and is not the way to approach restoration. Let us leave the war-path, and return to the ways of friendship and peace.

Complaint is made, Mr. Speaker, of the support which the Democratic party, as a party, throughout the country is giving to the President in his plan of restoration. That should not surprise any one. The Democratic party, during the period of the war, have closely adhered to the Constitution and the laws of the country. They find in President Johnson that same disposition to adhere to the Constitution and the laws. The course of the Democracy, in their support of the President, is actuated by a devotion to principle. It does not emanate from any seeking for office or from any other sordid motive.

There is another matter to which I wish to direct the attention of the House, and through the House the attention of the country. I would suggest that in the view of just and reasonable men the time has arrived when this system of virulent abuse of the President of the United States should cease. It is time that there should be an end of these appeals to the morbid feelings and prejudices of the people of the North, appeals calculated to array the northern people against the people of the South, who have laid down their arms, and who, I believe, are now seeking in good faith to conduct themselves in allegiance to the Constitution. They have been punished severely, not more severely, perhaps, than they deserve. But why should we not accept their words as expressing their real sentiments? Why should we treat them as aliens and outlaws, a policy which must for a long time prevent us from securing the full benefits of our victory?

Gentlemen seem to fear that unless something is done by legislation to prevent it the great conservative men of the country, under the leadership of Andrew Johnson, will come into possession of the legislative branch of the Government. Nothing can avert this. Your reckless extravagance, your unnumbered violations of law, your constant effort to change the organic law for party purposes; your persecutions of the President, who has planted himself upon the plan of restoration which Mr. Lincoln determined upon; and your careless mode of taxation, relieving affluent men and heaping the expenses of our debt upon those least able to bear it—all these point to your certain overthrow.

All these points are certain to have their effect. The Democracy, so far as I know, stand ready to operate with any party or set of men to crush out the party which started with a disposition to let the "South go," and now at the close of the war seek the same practical result—a continued separation of the States of the Union.

I now yield the floor to my colleague.

Mr. STROUSE. Mr. Speaker, any proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States would, a few years ago, have excited and aroused the greatest interest on the part of the people as well as of Congress. The good old charter produced by the inspired wisdom of the great and patriotic men who founded the Republic is ignored by the modern reformers. Amendments are offered and passed with as much haste and facility as a bill to admit a wilderness with a few hundred adventurers roving in it as a State in the Union. There is danger in this, danger to the country at large, danger to our institutions and liberties. The Constitution was never intended to be plastered and patched as latterly it is proposed to do, no more than the Union of States formed by the thirteen old colonies was ever designed to be broken or severed by secession or rebellion of any one or more States. We are prone to speak lightly of an amendment to the Constitution, as if it were no more than the passage of an ordinary act. I regret this exceedingly. Members of Congress, who are here to represent the great body of the people, should be extremely cautious how they tamper and tinker with the fundamental law. History should be our guide and counsel. The gradual undermining, changing, altering, and amending of the foundation so strongly built, so massively erected, so skillfully constructed by the master minds of the revolutionary patriarchs, may destroy the temple of the Republic which so majestically rested on it for eighty years.

What necessity is there now, Mr. Speaker, that demands the change which this bill calls for? I am answered that the necessity grows out of the war, that the South is vanquished, the negroes are liberated, and that therefore the organic law must be so amended that the emancipated slave shall in all respects be the equal of the white man. Well, I have listened patiently during this week to the many heavy and light speeches made here on the subject in hand by the friends and advocates of amendment and negro equality, from the chief engineer down to my dramatically tragic colleague who reads anonymous rebel letters for the instruction of this House, and yet I am not enlightened on the subject under discussion. Instead of debating this grave and serious question as becomes statesmen and jurists, we hear some six or eight stump speeches every day, and in truth, not very courteous or good at that. Gentlemen on the loyal side, as it is called, in place of arguing the point of difference among themselves, that is, whether the southern States are in or out of the Union, or whether they are conquered provinces and the people aliens, or States and the people citizens, indulge in political slang, abusing and vilifying the Democratic party by charges and accusations as groundless as they are discourteous. I honestly believed that the time had gone by for the utterance of such foul and false attacks and aspersions, and especially in this place. The Democratic party of the country and the Democratic members of this Congress require no defender here or elsewhere. The history of the United States is the history of the Democratic party; its creed is the Constitution, and its principles have been for seventy-five years the operative cause of our country's rise, progress, strength, and greatness.

When I see members here so intensely loyal, who owe their present bombastic greatness to the kindness and generosity of the Democratic party, and who now traduce and malign their Democratic colleagues, I cannot help thinking that ingratitude is a crime and ought to be made odious. I am inclined to think that there are some furiously loyal gentlemen here, who, when they shall give an account of their stewardship to their constituents, may be politely informed, by virtue of the power vested in the people, that the private station is henceforth their post of honor, and sic transit gloria mundi for hypocritical loyalty, niggers, universal suffrage, bureaus, southern plantations, office, power, glory, bag, and baggage.

Mr. Speaker, my first inquiry is, are the southern States still States and integral parts of the Union, or have they, by the act of secession and war, brought themselves to a territorial condition, or the condition of a conquered foreign country, now reduced to provinces? The chairman of the reconstruction committee [Mr. STEVENS] answers affirmatively, and doubtless many others here hold the same opinion. If this be so, if that is the status of the southern States, then all your constitutional amendments, acts, conditions, prohibitions, and directions are in order and must be submitted to by the conquered and vanquished foreigners inhabiting Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, Louisiana, &c.

It cannot be that this monstrous doctrine is seriously entertained by a majority of this House. This point has been so thoroughly discussed that it were a waste of time to enlarge upon it. A short time ago, when I had the honor to address the House on a subject akin to this, I stated that our case, the late rebellion, is sui generis, which cannot be classed under any ordinary description of war, civil or foreign. The law of nations, as construed by these old and eminent authors in monarchical Governments in a past age, ought not and cannot be fairly applied at this day in our dealing with a portion of our own people, inhabiting a part and parcel of our own territory. A war with a foreign Power, or with a sovereign nation, would place the legal question involved in a very different light. We quelled the rebellion among our own citizens and in our own country. We conquered nothing. We have not more territory, people, or property than we had before. This, in my judgment, is the rational and natural deduction from the premises, in law and in fact.

And this is my opinion now, that the States are and never ceased to be, in law and in fact, constituent parts of our Union. If I am correct in this opinion, and it is the view taken by the most eminent lawyers and publicists of the country, then what necessity exists for these amendments of the Constitution? Let the States be represented in the Senate and House by men who can conscientiously qualify as members, and after that, when we have a full Congress, with the whole country represented, let any amendment that may be required be proposed, and let those most interested have an opportunity to participate in the debates and deliberations of matters of so much moment to every citizen. If it were not for the malignant party spirit, the overweening desire to perpetrate radicalism, proscription, and the centralization of power instead of enlightened statesmanship acting in a spirit of justice and equity, the States would now be in their proper positions quo ante bellum, contributing and adding to the general welfare and prosperity of the country, North and South.

While discussing the report of the committee with a learned friend of mine, he informed me that the subject was most ably treated in an editorial in the New York Times. The Times is acknowledged to be one of the ablest and most leading Republican papers in the United States. Fully concurring in the views therein expressed, I beg to read the article for the benefit of this House. It is sound, patriotic, statesmanlike, and just, and well deserves the serious consideration of every truly patriotic man who loves his country, its history, and glory:

"As a plan of pacification and reconstruction, the whole thing is worse than a burlesque. It might be styled a farce, were the country not in the midst of a very serious drama. Its proper designation would be 'A plan to prolong indefinitely the exclusion of the South from Congress by imposing conditions to which the southern people will never submit.' This being the obvious scope and tendency of the proposition, we are bound to assume that it clearly reflects the settled purpose of the committee. So that the joint committee, appointed nearly five months ago to take exclusive charge of the question of reconstruction, now offer as the result of all their labors what would in fact render reconstruction forever impossible.

"There is an anomalous feature in the affair as it stands, which of itself reveals the monstrous nature of the pretensions set up by the committee. All the provisions of the proposed amendment imply the adoption of the extreme view in regard to the relation of the South to the Union. We must begin by assuming that what were States before the war are more Territories now; or this attempt to dictate terms as the condition of recognition becomes undisguised usurpation. We must assume, in fact, that the South is at this moment neither more nor less than an aggregate of Territories, waiting for admission as States, and from whose people Congress may therefore require compliance with certain proposals. And yet the amendment, on its face, declares the existence, as States, of all the States recently in rebellion, and presupposes the exercise by their several Legislatures of the highest constitutional attribute of State sovereignty. They have no right to representation in Congress, forsooth. They may not say yea or nay on the most trivial questions that come before Congress. They are not permitted to enjoy a particle of influence in matters affecting the finance, the trade, the industry, the foreign relations of the country, or any of its concerns, great or small. These privileges they are denied on the pretense that they are not within the Union, and therefore have no right to recognition as parts of the Union. Nevertheless, under the contemplated amendment, they are treated as sovereign States, whose ratification of the amendment is essential to its constitutional validity. They are to vote for or against a change in the Constitution of the Union of which, on the radical hypothesis, they are not present members! Could absurdity go further? Could the folly of this fanaticism be made more manifest?

"From the dilemma into which the committee have thus plunged there is no logical escape. If the southern States are in a condition by their Legislatures to ratify or reject a constitutional amendment, they must of necessity be qualified to send Senators and Representatives to Congress, subject only to the judgment of either House as to the eligibility of the persons sent. A State which may assist in the sovereign task of molding the Constitution under which Congress acts may surely demand a voice in what the Constitution creates. The greater right covers the lesser right in this or in other cases. On the other hand, if the southern States are not entitled to admission to Congress—if the point be established, as the radical detractors say it is, that these are States no longer, but Territories only, subject to the will of the conqueror—then it follows that they are not entitled to any lot or part in the business of amending the Constitution. Upon which horn shall the 'central directory' be impaled? Shall we take it that this prodigious amendment, this mighty mouse brought forth by a mountain after five months' parturition, does not mean what it says when it speaks of the States lately in rebellion as States still, with their sovereign functions unimpaired, though for a time interrupted? Or shall we conclude that the doctrine of State suicide is abandoned, the doctrine of subjugation given up, and the criminal blunder of which the radicals have been guilty in excluding the South from Congress at length confessed? Let there be explicit answers upon these heads of the subject. As it at present appears the position of the committee is utterly untenable.

"Aside from these points the worthlessness of the committee's proposition is obvious. It cannot by any possibility effect anything. We may confidently take it for granted that the people of the South will never under any circumstances acquiesce in their own disfranchisement for four years in reference to all that relates to the Federal Government. There is room for difference of opinion on the general merits of the reconstruction problem; on this point there can be none. The South has taken its stand on the ground of a common citizenship, and it will never accept as the price of congressional representation that which would be equivalent to an acknowledgment of four years' servitude or inferiority as the penalty of rebellion. Nor should it be asked to accede to terms of this nature. Punish the rebel leaders, if necessary, by banishment or otherwise. But to propose to punish a whole people to suit the partisan conveniences of those who dictate the penalty is an outrage upon justice and common humanity. With all their errors and faults, the southern people have shown that they are not cowards. They will not belie their nature by writing themselves down slaves at the bidding of a committee appointed to consider the question of reconstruction.

"If we would do aught to hasten the result which all moderate men admit to be exceedingly desirable it is necessary, without more ado, to discard the idea of constitutional changes as the condition precedent of the readmission of the South to Congress. That is the primary step toward reconstruction, practically considered, and we should prepare to take it on the ground of existing rights, subject only to the lawful test of individual fitness. To talk of wholesale and almost indiscriminate punishment as a preliminary measure, to call for concessions implying the relation of supplicants petitioning for favors instead of citizens insisting upon their rights, to demand a confession of inferiority with one breath, while with another admitting the existence of constitutional equality, is to aggravate feelings already much too bitter, and to multiply difficulties which the joint committee have thus far vainly endeavored to overcome."

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, the measure before the House presents a basis upon which it is proposed the insurgent States shall be restored to the Union. It is, therefore, the most important question which can be presented to the House or to the country. It deserves the most mature consideration. I should have been glad if a more general and thorough discussion of the subject could have been had on these particular measures, but the House has decided otherwise. I desire to make a few suggestions as briefly as possible, chiefly in reference to what has been said by other gentlemen who have addressed the House. It is my belief that reorganization of governments in the insurgent States can be secured only by measures which will work a change in the basis of political society. I do not think this can be done by theoretical constitutional or statutory provisions. Anything that leaves the basis of political society in the southern States untouched leaves the enemy in condition to renew the war at his pleasure, and gives him absolute power to destroy the Government whenever he chooses. Therefore, sir, no proposition meets my entire approval that does not propose a radical change in the basis of political society in these States; but I do not, of course, expect the House to adopt my opinions, nor do I ask that they shall be embodied in these propositions which may be adopted.

There are two methods by which the change I propose can be made: one by extending the elective franchise to the negro; the other by restrictions upon the political power of those heretofore invested with the elective franchise, a part of whom are loyal and a part of whom are disloyal; a part of whom are friends and a part of whom are enemies.

I have no doubt that the Government of the United States has full power to extend the elective franchise to the colored population of the insurgent States. I mean authority; I said power. I have no doubt that the Government of the United States has authority to do this under the Constitution; but I do not think they have the power. The distinction I make between authority and power is this: we have, in the nature of our Government, the right to do it; but the public opinion of the country is such at this precise moment as to make it impossible we should do it. It was therefore most wise on the part of the committee on reconstruction to waive this matter in deference to public opinion. The situation of opinion in these States compels us to look to other means to protect the Government against the enemy.

The other has reference, of course, to the disfranchisement of those who are or may be considered public enemies. In regard to that section of the amendment relating to representation, I have this to say: while it is entirely equitable, and does not admit of question on that score from any quarter whatever, yet I do not think it will exert any controlling influence upon the political character of those States. It reduces the representation of the insurgent States some fifteen members. The reduction is not of paramount importance, whether they have more or less members, however loyal they might be. It is but just that they should be restricted to a fair share of representative power. But they do not seek to govern by opinion. They do not rely on ideas for success. They govern by force. Their philosophy is force. Their tradition is force. Whether they be few or many, they will have power whenever they are restored here. While, therefore, sir, I accord cheerfully with the proposition, it does not meet the emergency presented at this time.

The third proposition is one which disfranchises the enemies of the country. I approve that. I think it right in principle. I think it necessary at this time. If I had any opinion to express I should say to the gentlemen of the House that it is impossible to organize a government in the insurgent States and have the enemies of the country in possession of political power in whole or in part, in the local governments or in representation here.

It does not change the result, in my opinion, if you couple with this the franchise of the negro. Certainly it will be much better, if rebels are allowed to vote, that the privilege should be extended to the colored people. I propose, so far as I am concerned, to lose no opportunity to impress upon the country the necessity for the extension of suffrage to the colored men in the best and most effective way possible. But that question is not now presented.

Now, sir, what are the objections to the disfranchisement of the enemies of the country? And in speaking of them I mean those who organized and sustained rebellion against the Government of the United States for five years; who contemplated it for thirty years; who are ready now, not as friends, but as enemies of the Government, to accept whatever share of power may be accorded to them in a Government where the people have the entire power to do that which seems to them right and just. An enemy to the Government, a man who avows himself an enemy of its policy and measures, who has made war against the Government, would not seem to have any absolute right to share political power equally with other men who have never been otherwise than friends of the Government. That proposition would seem to recommend itself to the judgment of every man.

But it is said that there are certain practical difficulties in this matter which ought to control our judgment. It was intimated the other day that there had been some understanding when the enemies of the country laid down their arms that they were to return to power; an implication, if not an agreement, that we are to restore them to their full status as citizens of the United States, with local and representative power.

Now, sir, I do not agree to that at all. I think they had the most distinct information possible given from every department of the Government, by all its officers under all circumstances, that they were not to claim or receive political recognition or the recognition of political power. They surrendered because, as they say, they were beaten. They could not or did not choose to continue the fight any longer, and they laid down their arms, as I believe, with the conviction that it was impossible for them to prosecute the war any further.

The measures adopted by the Government at the time of the surrender show exactly its determination, which the enemy could not misunderstand. General Johnston of the rebel army proposed a treaty with the army of the Union in which it was stipulated that the rebels would lay down their arms on condition that the rebel State governments should be recognized, the Supreme Court deciding where conflicting governments existed, and that the people should be guaranteed their political rights and franchises as well as the rights of person and property. This was summarily rejected by the Government. President Lincoln, when applied to by General Grant for instructions, sent a dispatch written by his own hand, with the approval of President Johnson, directing General Grant to have no communication with General Lee unless for the capitulation of his army, and not to decide, discuss, or confer upon any political question. Certainly those officers who treated with General Grant could not have had any expectation of that kind.

The terms of surrender to General Grant were that the rebels were to return to their homes, not to be disturbed so long as they observed their parole and the laws in force where they resided. The Attorney General decided that they had no right to return to the places where they resided before the war within the loyal States, and that to wear the rebel uniform was a violation of their parole and a fresh act of rebellion.

President Lincoln, as late as March, 1865, in a proclamation in which he referred to a bill passed by both Houses of Congress, declared that while he did not assent to all its provisions, he should be governed by its conditions in any settlement that he should undertake with the insurgent States. One of these conditions was that the mass of rebel leaders, civil and military, were to be forever excluded from political power. President Johnson, in his proclamation of May 29, 1865, which, I think I may say here, what I have said elsewhere at all times, presents a plan of settlement that would be entirely satisfactory to the country, and enable us to reorganize these governments immediately without detriment or danger—President Johnson, in his proclamation of amnesty of the 29th of May, 1865, declares that all persons in military or naval custody, as prisoners of war, including, of course, all the paroled officers and soldiers of the rebel army, were excepted from the act of amnesty and pardon. The proclamation enumerates thirteen or fourteen distinct classes of rebels, embracing nearly all the influential people of the rebel States, who were excepted from the benefits of that proclamation. These facts show that there is no ground for the supposition that the surrender of the rebels proceeded from any just expectation of being restored to power in the Government. And, so far as the President is concerned, his proclamation gives evidence that it was not his intention, even some months after the surrender, to receive them or recognize them as the representatives of political power.

It is said that the acts of pardon granted in individual cases, or the general charter of amnesty and pardon of the 29th of May, changes in some measure the political relation of the public enemies to the Government itself. I do not think so. A pardon does not confer or restore political power. A general act of amnesty differs from an individual pardon only in the fact that it applies to a class of offenders who cannot be individually described. It secures immunity from punishment or prosecution by obliterating all remembrance of the offense. But it confers or restores no one to political power. On the contrary, the general charter of amnesty, even if authorized by Congress, as it may be said to have been by the act of July, 1862, contains conditions and limitations of purpose which excludes any idea of restoring political power to public enemies who might be affected by its provisions. Amnesty and pardon are granted to all persons not in the excepted classes, "with restoration to rights of property" in cases where legal proceedings had not been instituted for its confiscation. So far as the charter of amnesty and pardon is concerned, by its own conditions and terms, by its express terms, all idea of extending to them political privileges or power is excluded.

But, sir, the effect of a pardon deserves to be a little more carefully considered. A pardon restores a criminal when pardoned to all the rights that can be conferred upon him by the authority granting the pardon. That is all. If the President of the United States, in addition to the authority to pardon which he has, had also the power to invest those people with political rights and he expressed it in his pardon, then they would not only be free from prosecution, but be invested with political rights; but the President has no such power. He has the simple power of pardon.

The power of declaring who shall exercise the franchise is in the first instance conferred upon the States by the first article of the Constitution; and in the second instance, by the provision conferring the right to judge of the election of its members, on the Congress of the United States, and without their concurrence the President has no right to invest franchise in anybody. Several of the States have in the exercise of their undoubted right disfranchised those regarded as public enemies. Congress has refused admission to persons claiming rights as members. By the several acts from 1861 to 1865 it has declared the inhabitants of the revolted States to be public enemies. It forbade all commercial intercourse or correspondence with them.* It passed laws for their punishment as traitors. Until these acts of the States and of the General Government are repealed by authority of the States and of Congress no person can exercise political power of his own right, or any other than a delegated power.

A pardon whether by individual act or by general amnesty does not, and cannot, change this condition of things. I suppose this principle to be so well established that it does not require the citation of authorities to maintain it. I venture to say that there is not in the history of law a single case of pardon which is held to invest persons with political power in a Government or State other than that controlled by the authority granting the pardon, or to restore other right than exemption from prosecution or punishment. It is a principle which has at least been recognized by the law department of the Government. I think Attorney General Cushing gave it as his official opinion explicitly that a full pardon cannot be held to restore political rights.

Now, it is said that this disfranchisement cannot be enforced. Why not? Because, forsooth, the States to be affected will not accept it. Very well. It is not necessary; there are twenty-five States represented in this House. Twenty-seven is the number necessary to amend the Constitution. The States of Tennessee and Arkansas will accept this proposition of disfranchisement without hesitation. They have already adopted the principle in the organization of their own State governments. It would be impossible otherwise for the loyal men of Tennessee and Arkansas to maintain governments, and their consent gives us the requisite number of States to make the amendment a vital part of the Constitution. If it be defeated at all, it will be defeated by the Republican States or by the Democratic States of the North. It will not be defeated by the insurgent States. There is, then, no justification for the opinion so strongly expressed, that this measure will fail because the rebel States will not consent to the disfranchisement of any portion of their own people. The proposition is for the loyal States to determine upon what terms they will restore to the Union the insurgent States. It is not necessary that they should participate in our deliberations upon this subject, and wholly without reason that they should have the power to defeat it. It is a matter of congratulation that they have not this power. We have the requisite number of States without them. It is said, again, that we cannot enforce it in these States because seven eighths or nine tenths of the people are enemies to the Government. That is not true. We do our cause great injustice, and we do the people of the South infinitely greater injustice when we accept and publish as our own the arguments of rebel enemies of the country. They say that the whole people of these States voluntarily made war against the Government. Mr. Speaker, it is not so.

I do not believe that there is a State in this Union where at least a clear majority of the people were not from the beginning opposed to the war; and could you remove from the control of public opinion one or two thousand in each of these States, so as to let up from the foundations of political society the mass of common people, you would have a population in all these States as loyal and true to the Government as the people of any portion of the East or West.

I know that the people of the South are filled at present with prejudice against the civilization, the institutions, and the people of the North; but the moment they have felt the beneficial effects of that civilization, whenever they become acquainted with our people, as they will at no distant day, they will cordially and honestly fraternize with them. It requires a little time, but the result is inevitable.

During this terrible war, which has cost the people a million of lives, and of treasure inappreciable, the people of the South have been compelled to take up arms and sustain rebellion. In the Southwest it was made a crime, punishable in the severest manner, for any rebel soldier to declare publicly or to his comrades that this was the rich man's war and the poor man's fight. But it was nevertheless a fact. The people knew that it was the rich man's war and the poor man's fight. The legislation of the insurgent States exempted to a great degree the rich men and their sons on account of the possession of property, while it forced at the point of the bayonet, and oftentimes at the cost of life, the masses of the people to maintain their cause. There is nothing in the whole war more atrocious than the cruel measures taken by the rebel leaders to force the people who had no interest in it and were averse to sharing its dishonor and peril. And no public act, in my opinion, manifests more wisdom or a keener sense of justice than the exclusion by the President from the benefits of the charter of amnesty the rebels whose fortunes exceeded $20,000. Would that it had been enforced against them!

Now, if by any means we could reach the masses of these people we should find loyal men in numbers and strength in all these States. The common people have no interest hostile to the United States. I do not mean that class of men best acquainted with public affairs, I mean the men who have borne no part in the important duties of public life—the common men, the laboring men. We shall find that ultimately, and at no distant day, they will become the truest and best friends of the Government; and this amendment, as I understand it, will contribute greatly to the beneficial result.

Sir, it does not exclude and it will not exclude nine tenths of the population of any of these States. How will it operate? It will begin with the beginning and it will go on to the end. In the first place, it will commence its operations in the States in the valleys of the Ohio and the Mississippi. In each one of those States there is a majority of the people, perhaps a large majority, who, if left to their own judgment, will be friendly to the Government of the United States. And thus from its operations, where it can be immediately applied, and where it will be immediately successful, it will produce the exact result which we desire, the immediate restoration of the governments of the States to the Union, the recognition of the loyal people, and the disfranchisement of the implacable and unchangeable public enemies of the Union, and the creation of State governments upon the sound and enduring basis of common interest and common affection.

Suppose, for instance, that until 1870 some of the southern States—South Carolina, Georgia, or Alabama—should decline to accept the terms of the amendment, and remain outside of the Union. Is it not better that they should be out than in, if that is their spirit? Will it do us any harm or them any good? I think not. On the contrary, the fact that some of the States may be admitted in 1866, as I believe they will be, and others perhaps in 1867, and so on until the last recalcitrant Commonwealth returns to the Union, shows this to be by far the best process that could be devised for the maintenance of our Government and its institutions and the restoration of States.

It was said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that there is no tribunal which can judge of the proper or improper enforcement of this provision. That is an error. In regard to the election of members of Congress here is the tribunal. In regard to the election of Senators, the Senate at the other end of the Capitol is the tribunal, perfect, absolute, competent, and ready always to discharge this duty and make the right decision.

In regard to the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, which seems to have caused more apprehension, the solution is equally simple, certain, and just. There is always a tribunal that is competent to judge whether this provision of the Constitution has been properly enforced. It is not altogether a new question. In 1844 the country escaped a revolution, as many persons think. They did not then, as now, comprehend the secret springs of that peril. In the State of Tennessee one hundred and seventy-five or one hundred and eighty men voted directly for Polk and Dallas as candidates for President and Vice President instead of for the presidential electors. If those votes given against the law were counted, then Mr. Polk would receive the electoral vote of that State. If they were excluded, then the electoral vote of the State would be given for Henry Clay. So closely hung the balance that for six weeks it was impossible to determine who had carried Tennessee. It ultimately became of little importance, because the vote of the great State of New York was given through Silas Wright to Mr. Polk. Had New York voted for Clay, Tennessee would have decided the election. We can now estimate the consequences of that departure from the letter of the law of a small number of Democrats in Tennessee. Had the question reached this House it would present exactly the problem the solution of which gives so much trouble to the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] And its solution removes the difficulty presented by him.

But that case does not stand alone. There is nothing new under the sun. In 1856 Wisconsin did not vote for electors on the day required by law. Her vote when presented here was not counted. If the vote of that State had decided the balance between General Frémont and Mr. Buchanan, it would have made trouble, because we now know that long and careful preparations had been made for rebellion and the opportunity only was wanting. The case presented in 1844 or in 1856 would have been more propitious than that offered by the election of Mr. Lincoln, because it would have concealed the real object of the conspirators, and secured an open and powerful support in the North. It presented the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from Ohio. But this is its solution. It exhibits the almost supernal wisdom of our frame of Government. It shows that the sacrifice of blood and treasure was well made to defend it.

In either of the cases presented by Tennessee or Wisconsin, the Congress would have been the tribunal to decide the issue. The two Houses would have met in convention according to the Constitution. If they agreed the question would have been decided, and the election of President declared in accordance therewith. If there was difference of opinion in regard to the question presented, the Senate would have withdrawn to its Chamber; the House would have remained in its seats; and then after mature deliberation, it may have been for weeks or months, each House would have determined what should be done. And should the two Houses not come to the same conclusion, and refuse to recognize an election, the President of the Senate, or in his absence the honorable Speaker of this House, would have administered the Government until another election could have been held. This would have been done by resolution of Congress within eighteen months from the 4th of March when the vacancy was found to exist. The Constitution is equal to every emergency, and what there is defective, if anything, the wisdom of the people will supply. If then, as lately, a portion of the States had determined to break up the Government, they would then have appealed to arms, and been beaten, in the providence of God, as now. Men in every crisis of our history have predicted the failure of our Government, but it has stood every storm thus far, and will last, I trust, till time is no more. There is less chance of difficulty from this cause than ever before.

It is said again, on the other hand, that there has been no successful example of this plan of organization of Government. Mr. Speaker, America presents new illustrations of history and of government. But we are not left entirely without light. It will be so to the end. She is the pioneer of Christian nations. If we were without a guide, it would not be unwise for us to say that the powers of the Government should be intrusted to its friends and not to its enemies. In a dark night, on a stormy sea, the humblest man on ship-board would know enough to advise that the helm should be put in the hands of a man who wanted to save the ship, and not in his whose purpose was to destroy it. We are not left without guidance. Switzerland, the wisest Government on the face of the earth, one that has encountered greater difficulties with a higher degree of success than any other, has given us a lesson which we ought not to disregard.

In 1848 she suffered from rebellion not dissimilar to ours. She met it as we did. The insurgents were conquered. The revolt was suppressed. She organized governments in the cantons, as Mr. Lincoln undertook to organize governments here. The friends of her Government, soldiers and civilians, marched into the insurgent cantons, outlawed those engaged in the rebellion, and they organized governments on such principles as were consistent with the safety of the governments. They proceeded from canton to canton until all were restored. Power was maintained in the hands of its friends. The disloyal inhabitants of the disloyal cantons were deprived of the rights they had forfeited by crime. As the result of that policy, Switzerland to-day is as sound and safe a Government as there is on the continent of Europe. In a little time she readmitted her recalcitrant sons to their former privileges, and they now, through her liberality, enjoy, without endangering her institutions, the same rights which they enjoyed before the war. What wiser course could they have followed? What better example for us? If we need counsel, to what people can we turn with greater profit than to heroic Switzerland, that for centuries has nurtured republican principles in their purity and in triumph against the despotisms of Europe?

Mr. ECKLEY. Mr. Speaker, any question affecting the fundamental law of the land demands careful and mature deliberation; and it is only when the necessity is great that such changes can be justified. That necessity is upon us, and we cannot, in view of the past and our duty to the present and the future, postpone it.

My colleague [Mr. FINCK] has signaled the alarm at the proposition. Those of us who were members of the last Congress heard the same cry while the amendment was under consideration abolishing slavery, but we heeded it not. The amendment was adopted and ratified, and every person now rejoices, except a small faction known as copperheads, and they lament it only because of the loss of political capital.

The old ship has outdone worse storms than he and his colleagues can invoke from the people of the South, and she will outlive this; and we shall, I hope, all live to see the day when this proposition shall become a part of the Constitution, with the same acquiescence of its predecessor, that, like this one, was born amid the storms of southern rebels and northern copperheads.

The revolution in our affairs, caused by the gigantic struggle through which we have passed, renders such a change absolutely necessary.

Congress is the only organized power that can make it; and we should be craven in spirit if we shrunk from the responsibility. It is claimed that this presents questions entirely new in American politics. I do not think so. If we but follow the wise examples left us by our fathers we shall find in the footprints of the past a precedent for our action that will produce wise and salutary results.

I listened with pleasure to my honorable colleague as he described the terrific struggle through which the nation had passed; a struggle caused by these same rebels for whom he now pours out his sympathy; and I was really sorry that he stood so badly on the record during the time of that unnatural and wicked conflict. I was sorry that he and I did not stand side by side in resisting the attempts of these rebels on the nation's life, as we stood in former days when the Whig party was on earth, resisting the encroachments and demands of this same party. But, alas! how fickle is poor human nature at best. With what pleasure would I recur to the Journals of the Thirty-Eighth Congress if I could find the name of my colleague recorded in favor of any of the measures necessary to levy men, raise money, provide means, or even to punish a guerrilla for shooting down a soldier or a citizen. But with what sadness must I turn over that silent scroll to find the name of my honorable colleague, upon every measure necessary to sustain the Government and resist the rebellion, just where I should have found the name of Jefferson Davis, General Lee, Jacob Thompson, or any other of the rebel leaders, had they been placed as members upon the rolls of this House.

Mr. FINCK. I dislike to interrupt my colleague; but I desire to state what he ought to know very well, that during the Thirty-Eighth Congress I voted for every bill making appropriations to pay our men in the field.

Mr. ECKLEY. I desire my colleague to state whether he voted for the proposition to punish guerrillas.

Mr. FINCK. I will explain that.

Mr. ECKLEY. I trust the gentleman will not take too much of my time. I would like him to answer "yes" or "no."

Mr. FINCK. I will state the facts. There was upon the statute-book a law to punish guerrillas. The bill to which my friend refers was to amend that law and to take away from the President the power to revise the findings of the military courts. I voted against that bill; but I was in favor of punishing guerrillas.

Mr. ECKLEY. That is sufficient. The gentleman voted against the bill.

Sir, we must all bow to the decrees of fate, and I must grieve the loss of an early political associate; but with what indignation must I regard that party by whose winning smiles and lascivious caresses he has been seduced from the paths of virtue. What cup contains bitterness enough to pour upon their heads? What judgment is severe enough to be pronounced against them? Why, sir, in my State they would be prosecuted, under an act entitled "An act for the support and maintenance of illegitimate children."

I agree with my honorable colleague, that we have passed through a fearful ordeal; that we have made untold sacrifices, and that our flag in triumph floats over every inch of territory. I join with him in complimenting the gallant men by whose valor the nation was saved, and to whom we are indebted for victory and the peace we enjoy. To the God of battles and the God of peace do we make our acknowledgments and return our thanks. To our gallant Army in the field, to the Union party that sustained it there, will the present and future generations accord as the human agencies that saved the country from destruction against the combined attack of organized, armed rebels and organized, unarmed copperheads, each in their place in the rôle performing their part in the plan for the nation's overthrow. But to my colleague and the copperhead party no credit is due. They may exhibit their fantastic tricks and play their political games for a little while, but their days are numbered, and the faithful chronicler of these sad events should consign them to the grave of oblivion,

"Unwept, unhonored, and unsung."

Peace, we are told, reigns throughout our borders. I wish I could believe that. But admitting its truth, are we not bound by every consideration to secure to the people, as well South as North, such safe grounds as will forever prevent its being broken? But what securities shall we demand; and in what manner shall they be obtained? By following the precedents of our past history will we find the path of safety.

Two instances of treasonable plots and conspiracies stain our former history. The one, an armed conspiracy to resist the execution of the laws, was organized in the State of Pennsylvania, known as the whisky insurrection. That, like the late rebellion, (though small in comparison,) organized its misguided followers, set the law at defiance, plundered the public mails, and murdered the officers of the law. The Government suppressed it by the power of arms, seized the insurgents, instituted prosecutions against them; but the leader and great instigator in this outrage upon the laws escaped the country and took shelter in foreign lands, thus evading justice and saving his life. His deluded followers were saved by executive clemency. Had Bradford, the instigator, been arrested he would certainly have suffered the fate of a traitor. So cautious was the Pennsylvania Assembly at its next meeting that it carefully scrutinized the claims of all members returned from the insurrectionary district, with a view of cleansing itself from all stains of treason by excluding all participants in the insurrection. Not even the talented and distinguished Gallatin could obtain a seat until he disproved the charge of his having been identified with this hostility to the execution of the laws.

The second occurred some years afterward, and was claimed to have covered a wider field. A prominent Democrat of the State of New York, who had been elevated to the second office in the gift of the people, was charged with having set on foot an armed expedition for the purpose of dismembering the Union. Burr crossed the mountains to the Ohio river, fitted out his flotilla of boats, and floated down the Mississippi. The key-note of alarm was sounded, the President issued his proclamation, the officers of justice were quick upon his track; he was arrested, indicted, and tried. The trial, the most important of any in this country, was conducted on both sides with almost superhuman ability. Nothing on either side was left undone. It is the only case in the history of the Government in which the President left his seat to personally superintend the trial. For want of evidence, under the ruling of that profound jurist and pure patriot, Chief Justice Marshall, Burr was acquitted, and with his acquittal fell all the indictments against those charged as accessory only in his guilt. No one ever doubted that if Burr had been legally convicted he would have made atonement to an outraged country with his life.

What Burr's real design was remains a mystery; and many innocent persons were doubtless implicated with him; some, perhaps, not so innocent. His expedition was fitted out, in part, in my own State; and among those induced to join him was John Smith, then a Senator in Congress from the State of Ohio. Smith was never tried by a civil tribunal, but, for his participation in the so-called conspiracy, was expelled from the Senate.

From these two incidents in history I deduce two things: first, the determination on the part of the Government to vindicate its authority and dignity by inflicting punishment upon such as have violated the law; and second, to expel from its councils such as have participated in treasonable designs. From these we learn the duty of the Government generally and of Congress in particular; for these things have passed into history, and are not influenced by the opinions or prejudices of the present day; and it receives great force from the fact that both the justice and propriety have been approved by the American people for three quarters of a century. Placing ourselves upon these precedents, and relying upon the justice and wisdom of the past, we are not endangered by unexplored paths or the experiments of new adventures. Guarded by the wisdom and example of many Administrations, we but mete out to those of the present day the well-established law that in former times was administered to others for similar offenses, but of lesser magnitude.

How to secure the fruits of that victory and obtain a permanent peace is the question for solution. To admit such members of Congress as they would elect from the States lately in rebellion would secure neither, but lose us both, and we should permit them to gain everything, through congressional action, that they sought to accomplish by arms.

It is claimed that we have no right to exclude their Representatives. I think we have. We do not want another war, and we would be faithless if we did not secure such guarantees as would last through all time. If they have given up the idea of rebellion, they can assure us such guarantees as will secure them in their right of representation and the country in harmony forever. We should exact nothing of them unjust or inconsistent with reason, but we should insist upon that well-recognized principle that maintains in every civilized country, that the highwayman, burglar, and pirate are not fit to sit as administrators of the law.

Those who engaged in the rebellion and strove to overthrow the Government, of their own volition withdrew their allegiance, are not fit, without bringing fruits meet for repentance, to administer its affairs. The foreigner who comes to our shores because he loves our institutions and admires our form of Government, who never, by word or act, evinced hostility to it, is put upon five years' probation before we admit him to citizenship. The reasons that exclude him from citizenship are strengthened in excluding open and avowed traitors. Decency would demand from them at least modesty. They have committed a crime that in any other country they could expiate only with their lives; they ought now to rejoice that by five years of fasting and prayer they could regain the rights of citizenship. From the instances I have given no one who had done an act hostile to the Government ever after participated in its affairs, and no one who was suspected was permitted to hold any position until they had cleared themselves of all imputations, and proved their allegiance by a renewal of the covenant of their faith. Even Burr, one of the most ambitious of his day, lived and died in obscurity, declining all marks of distinction, and avoiding all political notoriety. And the instigator of the whisky insurrection chose to be an exile in the land of strangers, and never sought position under a Government against which he had made war. But that kind of delicacy is not a characteristic of the rebels of this day. Their acts of treason, of cruelty, and barbarity are urged as qualifications for political positions. Already the most prominent places in the rebel States are filled with the most virulent traitors. And scarcely had the smoke of battle cleared away, and the shout of victory died out on the air, before the vice president of the confederacy is demanding a seat in the United States Senate. Such impudence is without a parallel among men, and can only find a precedent in the temptations of the devil to the Son of Man.

That the rebels are conquered, is an admitted fact. That they have any loyalty, any love, for the peace of the country and permanency of the Government, is not manifested by anything they have done. It is true they say they accepted the situation, so does the culprit. They say they laid down their arms. But their arms were forced from them. They say they disbanded their armies, but their armies were captured or scattered by the Union forces. Then what have they done to prove their submission to the law? They have neglected to pay their portion of taxes; they have expelled loyal citizens from the South; they have treated with brutality the freedmen, and enacted laws disgraceful to a Christian age or a Christian people. Those who engaged in the rebellion are as disloyal to-day as they were at any time during the war. Will any one pretend that they have changed? Will any one with truthfulness assert that they have any love for the Government of the United States, and would they not at any time rebel if there was a prospect of success?

In my judgment three things are necessary to be done before we can with safety restore them to their former relations with the Government:

1. Equal and just representation.
2. Security of life, liberty, and property to all the citizens of all the States.
3. To reject all debts or obligations incurred in aid of the rebellion.

The ratification of the constitutional amendment changed the condition of representation and rendered an amendment to the Constitution necessary in order to equalize the just basis of representation. Under the Constitution as it now stands they would count the entire population in the southern States. Before the Constitution was amended, they counted the entire free population and three fifths of the slaves; but there being now no slaves they would count all. In none of those States do they confer the right of suffrage on the colored population. This presents the anomaly of allowing five million white rebels to represent four million loyal blacks, and makes two white persons—rebels at that—in South Carolina equal to five white loyalists in Ohio, Pennsylvania, or New York. To this unjust demand I cannot and will not yield. If all other objections were removed, that one would be a justification for rejecting their Representatives. I could not return to my own gallant State and say to her loyal people and to the three hundred thousand gallant sons she sent to the field that by my vote I had reduced their political power until it required five of these scarred veterans to equal two of the rebels against whom they fought.

If South Carolina persists in withholding the ballot from the colored man, then let her take the alternative we offer, of confining her to the white basis of representation, and instead of the seven hundred thousand, her entire population, let her accept the two hundred and ninety thousand white population as the basis of her representation. For my purpose this sufficiently illustrates the operation of the rule, and the only practicable remedy is in an amendment to the Constitution changing the basis to the voting population, and making that a condition precedent to the admission of Representatives from the insurgent States. But it is said we should admit their Representatives, and if they are not loyal, turn them out. I hope we shall not be deceived by such a trick as that. Some of us have had experience in expelling a member. If Georgia was to send her Toombs here as a Representative, or Kentucky her Breckinridge, both gory with the blood of our murdered soldiers, both ardent supporters of the rebellion in every stage, supporting in every way, and when conquered, and its failure no longer a question, they would not risk their safety in this country, but sought refuge in Europe, not one vote on the other side could be had for their expulsion.

But how are members admitted here? By producing a certificate of election to the Clerk, who makes up the roll, calls it himself, and prepares them for qualifying. Much, then, depends upon the Clerk in the organization of the House. He could exclude them if he desired so to do. The experience of Congress has taught us to beware of dangers from Clerks of their own selection. I heard of a Clerk once who decided that a certificate, setting forth that a person was duly elected a Representative, did not prove that he was elected according to law. As an apology for his fine-spun theory it was said he had partially lost his reason; but I think he had suffered, if possible, a worse calamity than that. He had united his fortunes with the disunionists, enough certainly to drive any man mad. When the Clerk makes up his roll, calls the members, they take the oath, how are you to get them out of their seats but by expulsion, which requires a two-thirds vote.

Let us look at this matter in its practical operation. Suppose we admit the Representatives from the rebel States, and the bloody General Forrest should be returned a member, who produced his certificate of election, was placed on the roll, answered to the call, and took the oath; could you expel him on account of his treason? Certainly not; unless you could expel all the rest from the insurgent States, and that you could not do. And it would be the merest folly to attempt it. It would then become a political question. The Democratic party would then all be here—the open rebels of the South, the three hundred thousand Knights of the Golden Circle, the sympathizers of the North; the prisons would be emptied, the galleys cheated, the Canadian refugees would be called home, and if that was not enough, they would resurrect the conspirators and call from the tomb of infamy the murderers of the Andersonville prisoners. Then they would have a Democratic party strong enough in this Hall to prevent the expulsion of one of their number. As to the provision disfranchising those who have participated in the rebellion, it is objected to, first, for want of power, and second, on the ground of expediency. Neither, in my judgment, are sound. As to the first, I have no doubt of the power under the Constitution as it is. Such is and has been its interpretation from the foundation of the Government. Under a congressional act persons convicted of a crime against the laws of the United States, the penalty for which is imprisonment in the penitentiary, are now and always have been disfranchised, and a pardon did not restore them unless the warrant of pardon so provided.

The second is equally unsound. It was formerly doubted whether it was expedient to restore the elective franchise to those who had been convicted of a crime. The objection rests upon the ground that the number to be disfranchised are so numerous. This is greatly exaggerated if we take as true what is said by southern men, for it is seldom you can find one who has not been opposed to secession and in favor of the Union all the time. Whether this be true or not it should be no argument against it. The reason for it proceeded upon the ground of self-preservation, by protecting the elective franchise and keeping it pure. Others may desire to make up a party, or to strengthen one already made, by incorporating in it the worst kind of criminals; but it will destroy the object and purpose of the principle referred to. I have no desire, and should take no pride in any such political association. And the country certainly derives no security from such political organizations. But suppose the mass of the people of a State are pirates, counterfeiters, or other criminals, would gentlemen be willing to repeal the laws now in force in order to give them an opportunity to land their piratical crafts and come on shore to assist in the election of a President or members of Congress because they are numerous? And let it be borne in mind that these latter offenses are only crimes committed against property; that of treason is against the nation, against the whole people—the highest known to the law.

The only objection I have to the proposition is that it does not go far enough. I would disfranchise them forever. They have no right, founded in justice, to participate in the administration of the Government or exercise political power. If they receive protection in their persons and property, are permitted to share in the nation's bounties, and live in security under the broad ægis of the nation's flag, it is far more than the nation owes them.

Looking at the desolated fields of the South, the beggarly condition of the people, the army of maimed and helpless rebels, and the demoralized state of society, they must be the most stupid people in the world or they would ask to have them disfranchised themselves, and every loyal southern man does that. Nay, they should place them under such disabilities that they never could exercise political power again. The whole North is full of loyal refugees who do not dare return to their former homes. If they happen to have property there it is destroyed by those persons you propose to continue in power. Reject the amendment disfranchising rebels and you must widen the asylum in the North for those southern people who have sympathy with the Government. Let us have the courage to follow the example of the loyal people of Tennessee and Missouri, and exclude them from the ballot-box. Ask the gallant men of Tennessee what security they would have if the provision disfranchising rebels was repealed. They would tell you they would be overrun by rebels, and that the forty thousand gallant men who battled for the Union would be prostrated at the mercy of these disarmed traitors.

Let us now turn to the North and ask the million of gallant men who for four years stood like the mailed hosts of old between the nation and its destruction, and vanquished and drove back these hirelings of crime, and they will answer you, no rewards for treason. Ask the maimed and disabled soldier, and he will tell you that he did not think he was giving his leg or his arm to a Government whose representatives would vote away his political rights. Ask the widow, and in tears she will turn to her children and tell you that she was widowed, they were orphaned, they inherited poverty, she struggled in want, but she did not suppose that all this was to confer the power of the Government upon the murderer of husband and father. Ask the whole loyal people of the North, and you will receive for answer that you endanger the peace of the country by trusting the ballot in the hands of the traitor.

Mr. Speaker, I have not time to trace this subject further. I hope the report of the committee will be adopted; and in conclusion let me say to the one hundred and forty thousand people I have the honor to represent, that if they desire to have the rebels admitted into this House and the ballot placed in the hand of the traitor, they must select some other agent than me, for, so help me God, I will never vote to admit unconditionally a rebel Representative to a seat in this Hall or to place the ballot unrestricted in the hands of the traitor. In that way I shall contribute in rendering "treason odious."

Mr. LONGYEAR. Mr. Speaker, the questions before the House are not so much whether the rebellious States are in or out of the Union; or whether the Government has or has not the right to impose conditions upon their return to working relations with it. Those questions have already been settled by the uniform action and declarations of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the Government.

The Supreme Court, as long ago as 1862, declared, in the decision of the prize cases, (2 Black's Reports, 636, 667,) that "the present civil war between the United States and the so-called confederate States has such character and magnitude as to give the United States the same rights and powers which they might exercise in the case of a national or foreign war;" and, quoting Vattel for authority, the court further declared that "a civil war breaks the bands of society and Government, or at least suspends their force and effect."

The Thirty-Eighth Congress, at its first session, and while the war was still flagrant, by solemn enactment declared the State governments in those States subverted and overthrown, and imposed conditions upon their reconstruction. This enactment most unfortunately did not receive the signature of the President, although he approved of all its provisions in the proclamation which he issued soon after its passage. The same thing has been assumed and acted upon by Congress and by each House in numerous other enactments and resolutions since that time, many of which received the sanction of the late President Lincoln.

The present incumbent of the presidential chair, while he remained the Andrew Johnson of Tennessee for whom the great loyal masses of the nation gave their suffrages for Vice President of the nation in 1864, both before and since his elevation to that position, ay, and since by the hand of treason he became elevated to be the chief Executive of the nation, has declared that all government in those States and in each of them had ceased to exist; and not only that, but that the right to regulate suffrage and to impose conditions in the efforts of those who had been in rebellion to reconstruct State governments existed in the national Government. I will only quote a single but oft-repeated declaration of President Johnson upon this point. In each of his famous proclamations appointing provisional governors for the several States in rebellion, occurs this remarkable passage:

"Whereas the rebellion which has been waged by a portion of the people of the United States against the properly constituted authorities of the Government thereof, in the most violent and revolting form, but whose organized and armed forces have now been almost entirely overcome, has in its revolutionary process deprived the people of the State of [North Carolina, &c.] of all civil government."

The President in each of those proclamations also assumed to regulate suffrage and eligibility to office, as follows:

"Provided, That at any election that may be hereafter held for choosing delegates to any State convention, as aforesaid, no person shall be qualified as an elector, or shall be eligible as a member of such convention, unless he shall previously have taken and subscribed the oath of amnesty as set forth in the President's proclamation of May 29, 1865, and is a voter qualified as prescribed by the constitution and laws of the State of [North Carolina, &c.] in force immediately before the 20th day of May, 1861, [or otherwise as the case was,] the date of the so-called ordinance of secession."

These declarations and acts of the present Executive were made and done, too, after active hostilities had ceased, and the armed force of the rebellion had surrendered to or been broken and dispersed by the superior force of the national Government, events upon the happening of which it is contended by the advocates of State rights here and elsewhere the States in rebellion at once resumed all their rights as States of the Union, including, of course, the right of representation in Congress and the right to regulate suffrage and office in their own way.

Without stopping, then, to discuss these questions upon principle, I assume, as proven by authority of all the coordinate branches of the national Government, the following propositions:

1. That as a result of the rebellion, all civil government was destroyed in those States which were engaged in it.

2. That the people of those States can erect new State governments only by virtue of the authority and consent of the national Government, and upon such terms and conditions as the latter may prescribe.

3. And in this connection the national Government may regulate suffrage and eligibility to office, and make and establish such other regulations as may be necessary for its future security and perpetuity.

4. And it makes no difference in this respect whether such regulations are established by statute or by constitutional amendment. The loyal people who, by their Representatives and Senators constituting the Congress for the time being, have the power to propose constitutional amendments and enact laws for the common welfare, have equal power through their Legislatures or conventions to ratify and make effectual such constitutional amendments.

He who attempts to argue against these propositions does so against the uniform current and logic of the swift-passing events of the last five years and their inevitable sequences, and will find all his high-sounding rhetoric return to him empty, like echo from adamantine cliff in a desolate forest.

I do not propose to discuss the question here whether the power to prescribe such regulations and conditions is in the Executive or in the Congress. I believe it is in Congress. The people believe it is in Congress, and the great masses of the loyal people both North and South are looking to Congress to-day for protection and security; and for one, I intend to do my duty toward them in that respect to the best of my ability.

The only question really open for discussion is, what regulations and conditions are necessary; and what shall be imposed to insure the future domestic tranquility of the people and the security and perpetuity of our national existence?

The amendments and bills reported by the committee on reconstruction fall far short of the expectations of the people, and I may say are short of what I may have desired. The fact is the people are always ahead of their legislators in all matters of reform. But so far as the report goes it is in the right direction, and I will not reject it for the sole reason that it does not go far enough. The constitutional amendment proposed by the committee, with a single objection, meets my hearty approval. That objection is to the third section, and it is not that it does not go far enough, nor that it goes too far, but that it comes too late. I would disfranchise every voluntary rebel in the land, and place him where the late Andrew Johnson of Tennessee, at a time when the patriotic predominated over the sinister elements of his nature, said he should be placed, "on the back seats" in the great work of restoring the body-politic to health and vigor. But that same Andrew Johnson, acting as President of the United States, and under authority, too, of an act of Congress has, in my opinion, placed it beyond our power to do this without a violation of the faith of the Government in the eyes of the whole world.

What is the case presented? Section three reads as follows:

Until the 4th day of July, 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for members of Congress and for electors of President and Vice President of the United States.

"All persons who voluntarily adhered," &c. Let us see what persons are included in this expression. It would seem that the word "all" is sufficiently comprehensive and can admit of no exceptions; but let us see if its use here is not delusive under the circumstances now surrounding the question. By authority of law, full pardon and amnesty have been granted—

1. To all rebels below a certain rank who should take a certain oath, &c.

2. To all below the rank of colonel who were worth less than $20,000 at the commencement of the rebellion. This included, of course, the great mass of the southern people.

3. Nearly all of the classes above excepted have since received special pardons, and what remain are being pardoned now day by day, and before the proposed amendment can become part and parcel of the Constitution there will probably not be left a single unpardoned rebel in the whole land, from the highest to the lowest.

In the light of the events of the past five years, and of the fiendish barbarism practiced by these rebels during hostilities, and of the devilish hate still ranking in the bosoms of the great mass of them toward the Union and toward loyal men, these are humiliating facts; but still they are facts, and we must face them and not stultify ourselves in the eyes of the world by ignoring them.

Amnesty and pardon, although not strictly synonymous terms, have been used as such in this connection. Amnesty has the effect "to efface the crime and cause it to be forgotten."

This is the language of the authorities, and this the effect that has always been given to it by all civilized nations. It not only exempts the party from punishment, but remits him to all his former rights, natural, civil, and political, with simply two exceptions: first, where rights of third persons have intervened; and second, where the disability has been created by statute, and existed at the time of pardon. I concede that if the disability now proposed to be created had existed by the Constitution or by statute at the time of amnesty granted, it would remain until removed by the same formalities; but who ever heard of any civilized nation affixing to an offense a punishment or even a disability after the crime itself had been effaced, wiped out, obliterated by an amnesty or a pardon?

The eminent gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee on the part of the House, who reported this amendment, taking the same view of the law of the case as I do, tells us in effect that the disability is not intended to apply to such as have received pardon and amnesty. He tells us that if the amendment is adopted and becomes part of the Constitution, and one of the amnestied rebels comes to the polls and offers his vote for member of Congress, &c., and shows his pardon, then he has not adhered, &c., and is not included in the expression, "all persons who have adhered," &c. This is no doubt correct; but let me tell the gentleman that in this view of the case the amendment is meaningless, yes, worse than meaningless, it is cause of discord among the friends of the balance of the amendment, where the utmost harmony should be cultivated. If adopted, it would not stand in the way of a single rebel ballot. Long before it can be adopted, every one of the few unpardoned rebels now remaining will have received the extreme unction of pardon by his Excellency the President of the United States, and will have become a voter by the side of the most loyal, notwithstanding the prohibition. It would be a dead letter.

The provision would also be so easily evaded by appointing electors of President and Vice President through their Legislatures, as South Carolina has always done.

Let us then reject this dead weight, and not load down good provisions, absolutely essential provisions, by this, which, however good in and of itself, cannot be enforced.

I regard this provision, if adopted, both worthless and harmless, and therefore I shall vote for the proposed amendment as a whole, whether this be rejected or retained. I am heartily in favor of the whole amendment, except this section three, and should be in favor of that if I thought it could be given any effect; and I have said this much because of my anxiety that the main provisions of the amendment should prevail, and not be jeopardized by the retention of a worthless provision.

Rebels must be taken care of here in the Halls of Congress; and so long as the loyal people of the country remain true to themselves and the Government, traitors will be taken care of here. The sword of justice will continue to hang over the portals of these Halls, and no traitor will be allowed to pass their thresholds.

Mr. BEAMAN. Mr. Speaker, to say that I am not entirely satisfied with the plan for the reconstruction of the rebel States reported by the committee is probably to utter the sentiment of nearly every member of the House, including the members of that committee. It is most likely, also, that the expectation of the country will be somewhat disappointed. Mindful of the terrible struggle through which we have just passed, with all its sad incidents, the people are naturally earnest, anxious, and watchful. Impressed with the former teaching of your Chief Magistrate, they have come to believe that treason is crime, and ought to be punished; and that in any plan adopted for admitting the people of the rebel States to a participation in the government of the country, ample safeguards will be provided for future security.

Sir, I feel compelled to say that I do not think the report of the committee quite meets their just expectations. Nevertheless, so various are the views of gentlemen of the House, as well as of the individual members of the committee, perhaps it is as nearly satisfactory as any system that could have been agreed on with any well-founded hope of adoption. I am inclined, therefore, to support the joint resolution, though I hope it may be amended. I have serious objections to the third section, and I shall experience regret if, through the inflexibility of parliamentary rules, I am compelled to vote upon the original resolution without an attempt to amend it. It seems to me that the third section will be found useless in its results and impracticable in its operation, while it is calculated to foster irritation and bad blood among the people of the South. It makes a show on the face of it of accomplishing what it is impotent to perform; that is to say, it assumes until the 4th day of July, 1870, to "exclude all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort," from the right to vote "for electors for President and Vice President of the United States," yet we very well know that such a provision would be entirely inoperative, because electors for President and Vice President can be appointed by the Legislatures according to a practice that has always obtained in South Carolina. The provision does not extend to the election of Senators, and consequently it can operate only to affect the election of members of this House, and that only for a period of four years.

The State governments, the inspectors of election, the rejection or reception and canvassing of votes, the returns and certificates, in short the whole machinery of the elections will be in the hands and under the control of the very men whom you propose to disfranchise, and the difficulties that will arise in an attempt to execute the law are too obvious to require particular specification. This section looks as though it was intended for ornament rather than for use. Perhaps I should say it has the appearance of having been introduced to multiply the conditions of restoration, thereby rendering the scheme somewhat more imposing. It was doubtless the offspring of compromise, the result of a contest of adverse opinions, in which each one of the progenitors gave up so much of his paternity that the bantling is a mere shadow. It is, however, a shade too thin to blind the eye, and it might as well be removed altogether. The people are not likely to be blinded by so thin a veil, and it is folly to undertake to deceive ourselves. The people do not stand on punctilio. They want no expedient adopted in order to gratify their vanity, or to save a point of honor. They desire the adoption of no measure whose sole object is to assert their power over the rebels; that has already been established in the clash of arms. They want protection and security for the future, and to that end they believe it indispensable that the Government should be administered by loyal hands.

I do not know as there will be an opportunity to offer amendments to this joint resolution; but if permitted, I shall move to strike out the third section and insert in lieu thereof a section which I have taken in substance from the bill introduced from the committee by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The provision which I would have inserted is, as follows:

SEC. 3. No person shall hereafter be eligible to any office under the Government of the United States who is included in any of the following classes namely:

1. The president and vice president of the Confederate States of America so called, and the heads of departments thereof.

2. Those who in other countries acted as agents of the Confederate States of America so called.

3. Heads of Departments of the United States, officers of the Army and Navy of the United States, and all persons educated at the Military or Naval Academy of the United States, judges of the courts of the United States, and members of either House of the Thirty-Sixth Congress of the United States who gave aid and comfort to the late rebellion.

The disability proposed by this amendment is quite inconsiderable, if we have regard to the magnitude and consequences of the late rebellion, and I have no doubt it falls short of the public expectation. But inconsiderable as it is, it would at least prevent the intrusion of the arch traitor Jefferson Davis into the Senate of the United States, and would exclude permanently from this Hall the rebels who left it in 1861 for the field of blood. Nor could such a measure be deemed objectionable by any candid mind, whether it be regarded as a question of security for the future or as a punishment for past offenses. What other nation on the face of the earth would be so merciful, so forgiving? These men, by their flagitious crimes, have created a mortgage of billions upon the property of posterity that is to be. They have murdered hundreds of thousands of their fellow-men, and endangered our national existence. They have forfeited citizenship, property, life, which justice refuses to restore. But we forget justice, and remember only mercy. We give them back life, property, citizenship. And is not this enough? Shall we restore them to power, and make them our rulers? Such a determination should be preceded by another amendment to the Constitution. The word treason should be expunged from our organic law.

Mr. Speaker, I have little more to say. My views in regard to the great subject of reconstruction have been expressed in this Chamber more than once, and I do not wish to repeat them. But I desire to say that in my judgment the remainder of the joint resolution has great merit and ought to be adopted. I did look for more thorough and reliable protection for the loyal men in the rebel States than we are likely to secure. I did hope to see the rights of the freedmen completely established. I did believe that we should not ignore the services of the brave colored men who heroically bled in the defense of their country—a country from which thus far they have received injuries rather than blessings—and I did hope that a just, if not a grateful country, would insist that the preservers of liberty should enjoy some share of its fruits; that we should have the manhood and magnanimity to declare that men who have wielded the sword in defense of their country are fit to be intrusted with the ballot. But I am convinced that my expectations, hitherto fondly cherished, are doomed to some disappointment.

Yet I take this occasion to place on record the assertion, that if this generation shall fail fully to perform the duty that Providence seems to have imposed upon it, the blame will not rest wholly upon the Thirty-Ninth Congress. Every measure adopted for the security of the people against rebels must be carried by a two-thirds vote of each House. Against an antagonistic Executive a majority of Congress alone cannot adopt legislation needful to the condition of the country.

But I will not on this account abandon all. I will accept of the best arrangement available. I will vote for the substitute I propose, if I have an opportunity. I will vote simply to strike out the third section, if I can do no more; and failing in that, I will vote for the joint resolution as it stands.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the arguments made by the honorable gentlemen upon the other side; and out of five or six to whom I have attentively listened, only one has treated the minority on this side of the House with common courtesy or common respect. I am sorry that a grave and important question like this cannot be discussed by the representatives of the people of this country without indulging in vile vituperation of those who happen to disagree with the majority. Sir, I honor the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] for the manner in which he has always treated us on this side, and for the ability with which he has discussed the questions which have come before this House for consideration. Sir, I think it is belittling the character of this House for a gentleman of such high standing and of so much intellect as the honorable gentleman from the Lancaster district of Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to commence his argument by charging us here with being nothing but "catamounts." Such a method of treating these great questions will not settle the present difficulties of the country, nor heal the bleeding wounds of the Republic. Such a course of proceeding will not bring back our country to the enjoyment of the blessings of civil liberty and those great principles of constitutional freedom for which our revolutionary fathers fought.

Sir, I had hoped that after the investigation we have had upon the different subjects which have agitated this Congress, the time had come when gentlemen upon both sides of the House would turn their hearts from bloody strife to a contemplation of the blessings of peace and union in this land.

I do not mean, sir, as is now proposed by the measure under consideration, to have peace by disunion, but I mean to have peace by restoring and referring to the instrumentalities by which the Constitution and the Union were first established by our fathers; and I believe, if these instrumentalities, which were founded in a spirit of compromise, charity, friendship, love, and affection, were employed in this House, the bonds which have been torn asunder by four years of bloody war will be again cemented together.

I believe while I am here sustaining the opposition to this joint resolution, I am fortified by one who holds the reins of power in the presidential chair, a patriot and statesman, a man whose whole ambition is to have back again that glorious Union, and the old flag with every star there emblazoned upon it the emblem of victory and of the unity of all the States, whether North or South. He wants all the States, as heretofore, to be represented in reference to the legislation of the country.

While the proposition which has been produced here is not so rabid as some of the propositions agreed to be submitted by this committee, yet I say that it is fraught with great danger and evil to the country, and the elementary foundations upon which the liberties of this Union have rested for seventy-five years are about to be thrown down and trampled in the dust; and that glorious flag which was carried in triumph during the last war is about to be trampled under foot, and the time has arrived when Andrew Johnson and the Democratic party have determined to put that flag upon their shoulders and to plant it upon the dome of the State capitol of South Carolina, and to have it waving there as it is over the dome of the Capitol of the United States, representing a union of love and equal representation.

Now, sir, I have examined these propositions with some minuteness, and I have come to the conclusion different to what some others have come, that the first section of this programme of disunion is the most dangerous to liberty. It saps the foundation of the Government; it destroys the elementary principles of the States; it consolidates everything into one imperial despotism; it annihilates all the rights which lie at the foundation of the Union of the States, and which have characterized this Government and made it prosperous and great during the long period of its existence.

This section of the joint resolution is no more nor less than an attempt to embody in the Constitution of the United States that outrageous and miserable civil rights bill which passed both Houses of Congress and was vetoed by the President of the United States upon the ground that it was a direct attempt to consolidate the power of the States and to take away from them the elementary principles which lie at their foundation. It is only an attempt to ingraft upon the Constitution of the United States one of the most dangerous, most wicked, most intolerant, and most odious propositions ever introduced into this House or attempted to be ingrafted upon the fundamental law of the Federal Union.

It provides that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. What are privileges and immunities? Why, sir, all the rights we have under the laws of the country are embraced under the definition of privileges and immunities. The right to vote is a privilege. The right to marry is a privilege. The right to contract is a privilege. The right to be a juror is a privilege. The right to be a judge or President of the United States is a privilege. I hold if that ever becomes a part of the fundamental law of the land it will prevent any State from refusing to allow anything to anybody embraced under this term of privileges and immunities. If a negro is refused the right to be a juror, that will take away from him his privileges and immunities as a citizen of the United States, and the Federal Government will step in and interfere, and the result will be a contest between the powers of the Federal Government and the powers of the States. It will result in a revolution worse than that through which we have just passed. It will rock the earth like the throes of an earthquake until its tragedy will summon the inhabitants of the world to witness its dreadful shock.

I believe it will be, if that contest comes between Federal and State powers, a time when nature will bleed with agony in every part. That, sir, will be an introduction to the time when despotism and tyranny will march forth undisturbed and unbroken, in silence and in darkness, in this land which was once the land of freedom, where the sound of freedom once awakened the souls of the sons and daughters of America, when from the mountain-tops to the shore of the ocean they drank in the love of liberty.

I assert that the second section of this proposed amendment is unparalleled in ferocity. It saps the foundation of the rights of the States, by taking away the representation to which they would be entitled under the present Constitution. When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] brought forward a proposition from the committee on reconstruction to amend the Constitution of the United States, interfering with the elementary principles of taxation and representation, the principles for which our fathers fought when they rebelled against the tyranny of King George and the English Parliament who undertook to tax the people of the colonies without representation, the proposition was defeated in this House upon the ground that it would destroy a fundamental principle, that there should be taxation only according to representation.

This, sir, is precisely such a proposition as that. It declares that if the southern people refuse to allow the negroes to vote, then all that portion of the male colored population of twenty-one years of age and upward shall be excluded in the basis of representation—shall not be counted in ascertaining how many Representatives the States are entitled to.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has the frankness to state to the House what the object and purpose of the second clause are. He says:

"The effect of this provision will be either to compel the States to grant universal suffrage or so to shear them of their power as to keep them forever in a hopeless minority in the national Government, both legislative and executive."

Yes, gentlemen, it is but the negro again appearing in the background. The only object of the constitutional amendment is to drive the people of the South, ay, and even the people of the North, wherever there is much of a negro population, to allow that population not qualified but universal suffrage, without regard to intelligence or character, to allow them to come to the ballot-box and cast their votes equally with the white men.

Why do you not meet this question boldly and openly? Why do you undertake to deceive the people by offering to them an amendment which you say is based upon a principle of justice, that only the voting population shall be represented, when you admit by your leader in this House, the honorable gentleman [Mr.

STEVENS] who introduced into the committee this whole scheme of disunion and despotism, that the object of this amendment is to force the southern States to grant to the negro unrestricted suffrage?

Sir, I want it distinctly understood that the American people believe that this Government was made for white men and white women. They do not believe, nor can you make them believe—the edict of God Almighty is stamped against it—that there is a social equality between the black race and the white.

I have no fault to find with the colored race. I have not the slightest antipathy to them. I wish them well, and if I were in a State where they exist in large numbers I would vote to give them every right enjoyed by the white people except the right of a negro man to marry a white woman and the right to vote. But, sir, this proposition goes further than any that has ever been attempted to be carried into effect. Why, sir, even in Rhode Island to-day there is a property qualification in regard to the white man's voting as well as the negro. And yet Representatives of the eastern, middle, western, and some of the border States come here and attempt in this indirect way to inflict upon the people of the South negro suffrage. God deliver this people from such a wicked, odious, pestilent despotism! God save the people of the South from the degradation by which they would be obliged to go to the polls and vote side by side with the negro!

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I am always willing to yield, but in a half-hour speech I cannot.

The committee dare not submit the broad proposition to the people of the United States of negro suffrage. They dare not to-day pass the negro suffrage bill which passed this House in the Senate of the United States because, as I have heard one honorable and leading man on the Republican side of the House say, it would sink into oblivion the party that would advocate before the American people the equal right of the negro with the white man to suffrage.

And I do not believe that the gentlemen who favor this amendment believe that a single proposition contained in it will ever be adopted by three fourths of the States. Why do you not do something practical? We have been here something like six months. We have labored, toiled, and endeavored to bolster up the remains of the old Union, and you come in at this late day of the session with a proposition which you know—and I put it to the conscience of any man on the Democratic or Republican side of the House—will never be adopted by three fourths of the States.

Sir, I want some principle embodied in a constitutional amendment that the southern States will accept. I desire to see the Union restored, the Union of our fathers. I want peace, prosperity, happiness, greatness, grandeur, and glory such as characterized this nation when the Democratic party had control. I want you to put such a proposition before the people as shall meet their approbation. Do not pretend that you are in favor of the unity of the States when you offer a proposition which every reasonable, honorable, conscientious man must know will never be adopted by the States. Do you believe the people of the South will close their eyes to the teaching of ages and wait for shackles and chains to convince them that their liberties are endangered and allow no awakening convulsions to shake their rugged minds until despotism shall eat out their vitals?

I am not unmindful of the lessons taught us by the despotism of the Old World. I remember Poland and Hungary, and I stand here protesting against this measure which is more wicked than the tyranny practiced upon them. I believe under God that Andrew Johnson will plant the flag of liberty on every hill-top of this land until the tidings shall go forth to the civilized world that the United States of America are united in one bright constellation based upon equal representation.

You come out with another proposition, in the third section, to disfranchise a million voters, and I think I can say with safety that a speech has not been made on the other side wherein something was not said in favor of the enfranchisement of the human race, and yet you come here to-day, in the face of heaven and this Congress, and undertake to enunciate a doctrine that will, if carried out, disfranchise seven or eight million people, and that will put them in a worse condition than the serfs of Russia or the downtrodden people of Poland and Hungary until the year 1870. It is an entire change of front. You have been all the time maintaining the principle of representation based upon the voting population, and now, when these people have been so unfortunate as to be burdened with a free colored race, in consequence of the sins of northern fanatics and secessionists, you propose to disfranchise seven or eight million who had no original participation in the matter.

Why, sir, the Scriptures tell me that when Christ came upon the earth the fallen world had been doomed to punishment for the commission of sin and had been assigned to eternal damnation. And I am informed by the same Scriptures that Christ gave His body, His blood, and His soul as a propitiation for the sins of mankind. Now, I ask you to emulate the noble example of the Saviour of the world. Let us treat our southern brethren like men, like freemen, like fellow-citizens. And we will have a laurel crown placed upon our brows, if not here, then in heaven, and we shall receive the plaudit, "Well done, good and faithful servants of the Republic."

There is no honor in standing here and abusing the southern people. The revolution through which we have just passed was such a revolution as Abraham Lincoln, when a member of Congress some years ago, said that the people had a right to engage in as an effort to throw off a Government they did not like and to establish another that they preferred. The people of the South attempted to revolutionize the Government; they arrayed large armies against the United States and failed. And if we had failed in our revolution against Great Britain I have no doubt there would have been found in the Parliament of that country radicals who would have urged against us what the radicals here urge against the people of the South.

Our people have shed their blood and spent their treasure in profusion to preserve this Union. The bones of our brave soldiers are now bleaching upon the soil of Virginia. I have not yet forgotten that the sacred tomb of Washington, around which our soldiers gathered and renewed their vows to preserve the institutions of liberty bequeathed to us by our fathers, is in the soil of Virginia, one of the States which a majority of the members of this Congress are trying to keep out of this Union.

Rebellion or revolution never has been considered by the civilized world as having that odiousness and moral turpitude that attaches to men for the commission of heinous crimes. And when the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] undertakes to charge the great masses of the South as being murderers like Probst, he goes counter to the history of the world, and against the revolution which in the end gave Magna Charta to England, and which handed down to this country those bulwarks of liberty upon which our Declaration of Independence and our Constitution are founded. I say they are not murderers, they are not thieves, they are not felons; they are simply political convicts before the altar of patriotism. And the patriotic man who now sits in the presidential chair has, in the spirit of Christianity and humanity, extended to these men pardons, which I say, which the courts say, which tradition says, and which the history of the world says, relieve their recipients of all the effects consequent upon the crime.

Mr. KELLEY. As the gentleman has referred to me personally—

Mr. ROGERS. I cannot be interrupted, for I have but thirty minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. I have to say—

Mr. ROGERS. I cannot be interrupted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] is entitled to proceed without interruption.

Mr. KELLEY. As the gentleman misrepresents me—

Mr. ROGERS. I cannot yield.

Mr. KELLEY. And will not yield for an explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is not in order and will take his seat.

Mr. KELLEY (taking his seat.) I must pronounce his statement false.

Mr. ROGERS. I say the gentleman must not come here and vilify the people of the South in this way by comparing them with murderers, and by bringing in the argument that they are as deserving of reprobation and punishment as the monster Probst. I say the masses of the people in the South are not to blame for this war at all. It was the leaders of the South, such men as Yancey and others there, and the fanatical demagogues of the North, some of whom the President has named, (I of course except those upon this floor,) who are guilty of this war.

Sir, you can never win the affections of any people by treating them in the manner in which you propose to treat those people by these measures. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is an honest man; I give him credit for that, for I have taken particular notice and studied his caliber, and I believe he is honest in his opinions.

Yes, sir, the honorable gentleman [Mr. STEVENS] says that these persons can come in after the 4th of July, 1870. This resolution does not guaranty any such thing. We must refer to the bill with which the committee accompany the resolution. That bill provides that every State in this Union that is now unrepresented must, before being allowed to have Representatives here, even though they can take the test oath, ratify this constitutional amendment. Though this constitutional amendment should be ratified by three fourths of the States, not one of the eleven States now unrepresented can have representation here unless each State itself joins in ratifying it. Is that fair? It has been said by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania that nineteen States—three fourths of those that have never passed acts of secession—are sufficient for the ratification of this constitutional amendment. Why, then, do you seek to compel each of the southern States to ratify the amendment and alter its constitution and laws in conformity thereto, before you will admit here, on taking the usual oath, such honorable and loyal men as are now presenting themselves as Representatives from the State of Tennessee and the State of Arkansas?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, in my half hour I shall confine myself to the amendments of the Constitution now under consideration. When the bill reported by the committee of fifteen comes up for action by this House I may desire to say something in regard to it.

I intend to vote for this amendment in the form reported, with the exception of the third section. It is not all I could wish; it is not all I hope may yet be adopted and ratified; for I am not without hope that Congress and the people of the several States may yet rise above a mean prejudice and do equal and exact justice to all men, by putting in practice that "self-evident truth" of the Declaration of Independence, that Governments "derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," and giving to every citizen, white or black, who has not forfeited the right by his crimes, the ballot. But I do not think it is becoming in a legislator to oppose some good because the measure is not all he wants.

The first section of the amendment proposed is as follows:

SEC. 1. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws.

So far as this section is concerned, there is but one clause in it which is not already in the Constitution, and it might as well in my opinion read, "No State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." But a reaffirmation of a good principle will do no harm, and I shall not therefore oppose it on account of what I may regard as surplusage.

"Equal protection of the laws;" can there be any well-founded objection to this? Is not this the very foundation of a republican government? Is it not the undeniable right of every subject of the Government to receive "equal protection of the laws" with every other subject? How can he have and enjoy equal rights of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" without "equal protection of the laws?" This is so self-evident and just that no man whose soul is not too cramped and dwarfed to hold the smallest germ of justice can fail to see and appreciate it.

The second section of the amendments proposed is as follows:

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever in any State the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age.

I like this better than the one this House adopted some time since, and which was defeated in the Senate. That amendment I declared then, as I do now, that I did not like. It received my vote in common with many other members of this House, but with hesitation, doubt, and protest. I will not reiterate the reasons now; but, sir, I have no sympathy with nor approval for the denunciations which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has seen fit to hurl at those Senators who differed with him and defeated the adoption of that amendment. I rather admire their patriotism, their courage, and their sense.

The amendment, however, now under consideration is free from what I considered the most objectionable features of the other.

The Constitution now provides for the apportionment of Representatives according to the "whole number of free persons" and "three fifths of all other persons." Consequently, before emancipation, three fifths of the slaves were enumerated, which gave to the slave States nineteen Representatives in Congress, and as many electors of President, based upon a constituency of slaves alone. But now there are no "other persons;" all are free; and when the other two fifths are added in the enumeration they will give the late slave States thirteen more Representatives and electoral votes than before, making thirty-two Representatives and electors for the four million emancipated slaves. Now, this amendment says to those States this: "If the freedmen are so degraded and ignorant as to be unworthy of enfranchisement; if they are not capable of governing themselves, but must be held in subjection to and governed by their late masters, then they are not fit to govern the country through the votes of others." They shall not by any such prestidigitation, be dead at the ballot-box, but alive here, dumb, without a voice for their own government, and with thirty-two voices on this floor, and thirty-two votes for President and Vice President. They shall not be used to swell their rebel masters into giants and dwarf the loyal and patriotic men of the free States into Tom Thumbs! If you deny to any portion of the loyal citizens of your State the right to vote for Representatives you shall not assume to represent them, and, as you have done for so long a time, misrepresent and oppress them. This is a step in the right direction; and although I should prefer to see incorporated into the Constitution a guarantee of universal suffrage, as we cannot get the required two thirds for that, I cordially support this proposition as the next best.

This amendment, too, I fully believe, will in a reasonably short period bring universal suffrage.

The fourth section of this amendment, repudiating the rebel debt and claims for slaves, will be most heartily adopted and approved by every loyal man in the nation. Every man or woman who holds a Government bond, or who pays a tax, every crippled soldier or widow of a dead soldier, who holds a pension certificate, and everybody who hates treason and rebellion, and prays for the prosperity of the Government, will rejoice at its adoption.

The third section excludes all persons who voluntarily adhered to the rebellion, giving it aid and comfort, from the right to vote for members of Congress, and for electors for President and Vice President until the 4th of July, 1870. I cannot regard this section as of any practical value. I believe it to be difficult, if not impossible, of fulfillment; and I have fears that it may greatly embarrass, if not defeat, the adoption of the other sections should we pass it through this House.

If the rebels are to be disfranchised at all, they should be for a longer period. Again, some rebels are deserving of a total and lasting disfranchisement, while others who are embraced in this provision are not near so criminal. But such a provision would be taken to imply that all shall have the right to vote after July, 1870. Besides, there is a large class of men, both in the North and South, equally, yea, and more, guilty than thousands of the misguided men who will be disfranchised by this provision, who will not be affected by it. I allude to those politicians and others at the South who, keeping themselves out of danger, set on the ignorant and brave to fight for what they were told by these rascals were "their rights;" and to other politicians, editors, "copperheads," in the North, some of whom were and are members of Congress, who encouraged them and discouraged our soldiers.

How is it to be ascertained who "gave aid and comfort" to the insurrection? Is it by challenge and oath at the polls, or shall we have a registration throughout the United States with officers to settle and adjudge that question as to every voter? It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this provision is worse than useless, and will very much mar the beneficent effect of the other most excellent provisions of this amendment. Why, sir, the almost universal testimony from the rebel States is that the soldiers who fought us in the field accept their situation of "defeated and vanquished" with a much better grace than the politicians and non-combatants. They do not want to fight again. They are inspired with a wholesome respect for northern character and for the Government. They have ceased their bragging, and are willing to accept the position which the results of the war has placed them in.

Then, with the exception of the third section, I am heartily for the amendment, and if instead of that section we could incorporate a provision into the Constitution which should forever disqualify all the leading rebels from holding any office under the United States, thus making "treason odious" and traitors infamous, the country would hail it with joy.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are men in this House who are opposed to making any amendments to the Constitution, as they say, "until the revolted States are represented here." They say that those States are entitled "of right" to have their Senators and Representatives in this Capitol. They say that it is wrong to enact any legislation affecting those States without first "consulting them." This is the pretense. The real fact is they know very well that if each of those States had its two Senators in the other end of the Capitol, and the members which the present basis of representation gives them in this end, amendments would be impossible, for their votes, added to those already here, who have been upon their side throughout the war, will always prevent their adoption.

What would be the result in such a case? Mr. Speaker, I tremble for my country when I contemplate the possibility of such a conclusion to the bloody struggle we have gone through. Let me enumerate some of the calamities which will follow:

1. There would be the admission to Congress, and other places of power, of unrepentant and unwashed murderers and traitors.

2. The driving from their borders of every loyal man and woman who has been faithful to the Government.

3. Repeal of the civil rights bill, and grinding to the very depths of misery, compared with which slavery would be a boon, the four million freedmen.

4. Assumption by the General Government of the rebel debt, and payment to rebel masters for their slaves.

5. They would extend the pension laws to embrace the traitors who fought against the Government, and would pay the claims of rebels for damages by the war.

6. They would elect for the next President not Andrew Johnson, as some suppose, but Robert E. Lee, who might possibly reward his northern friends by giving places in his Cabinet to Fernando Wood, of New York, and Vallandigham, of Ohio.

Such is the picture. Why, sir, rather than such a consummation, a thousand times rather that we had never pulled trigger or drawn sword to maintain the integrity of the Government. Better, a million times better, that we had saved the blood its preservation has cost us. Why, sir, the very bones of the uncoffined dead would turn in their graves at such a result of their sacrifice. I know, and with shame confess it, that there are recreants and apostates among us, not many, I thank God, however, but some there are now in Congress, who have been trusted by an honest and confiding constituency, but who prefer to bask in the sunshine of executive favor, who rather "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift may follow fawning," and betray their trust; but their number is small.

The tribe of Judas has never been a very flourishing one, for those who do not, like Judas, in remorse hang themselves, very soon wither under the scorching indignation of mankind. There are not enough of them, I trust, to defeat what is absolutely demanded by the country. And the country does demand that we ingraft upon the organic law of the nation, placing them in the custody of the whole people, beyond the reach of party or faction, or of sudden passion, to repeal them, these or similar and stronger amendments. The preservation of the Government requires it. The rights and liberties of the loyal poor cannot be preserved without it. The financial credit of the Government will be ruined unless it is done. These things to me seem inevitable.

But those gentlemen upon the other side of the House, whose vocation seems to be to oppose every measure which is in the interest of the Government and of humanity, think it would be an excellent idea to have the rebels here, to themselves vote upon and fix the conditions of reconstruction. A most happy idea! Having failed to destroy the Government by a resort to arms, now only once let them in here under the old apportionment, which makes a rebel of South Carolina as big as two or three loyal men of Illinois, let them in with the blood of slain patriots yet dripping from their fingers, and the doubly damning crime of starving prisoners still blackening their souls, and then talk about amending the Constitution.

Sir, the Constitution makes Congress the judge of the election and qualification of its own members. The Constitution also declares that "the Government" (not the President) "shall guaranty to each State a republican form of government." When a Territory makes application for admission as a State, the Congress has first to pass the law, and fix the terms for its admission.

The States in rebellion revolted, destroyed their State governments as States of this Union; fought us four years for a separate nationality; were vanquished. Now, who shall determine the conditions upon which Congress shall receive their Senators and Representatives again? Who shall say whether they have readopted a republican form of government?

The President seems to suppose it his prerogative. But the President will yet learn that he is not the "Government." He dictated to those States conditions, what they should and should not put into their constitutions, and cannot Congress, the representatives of the people, the real "Government," do the same?

The whole copperhead fraternity applaud the President. Rebels South and sympathizers with rebellion North glorify Andrew Johnson; the devilish company of traitors praise him; the confederates of Booth and Payne praise him; the importers of poisoned clothing praise him; the glorious company of Jeff. Davis, his cabinet, his congress, his generals, with all the enemies of freedom in our own land, glorify him; and the enemies of liberty and republican institutions throughout the world, all who were on the side of the rebellion and against us throughout the war, praise and magnify his name. These, together with a few Judases and Esaus, applaud Andrew Johnson. Yet he dictated conditions to the rebel States, and cannot the law-making power of the Government do the same?

Sir, it is high time that traitors and the world shall know that the same men who preserved the Government from destruction, who made the laws, furnished the means, and did the fighting necessary for its preservation and defense, ought to and will reconstruct and do what is necessary to maintain it. The same who dictated terms to rebels in the field ought to and will dictate the terms upon which, and which only, they may be received into fellowship and power again. Men to whom the people have intrusted positions of high honor and power may apostatize and betray them for a little season, but they are sure to be crushed under the wheels of the great car of the people's wrath.

There are some who suppose that men who have given limbs and health and the best years of their lives for the salvation of their country, can now be bought for a petty post office; that fathers who have laid their sons upon the altar of their country are to be turned aside with the hope of a little temporary, contemptible patronage. Such persons do not know the American people, the Union people of the North. They have sacrificed too much to turn back now; their patriotism is made of better material, of sterner stuff than that. A people, in whose every house there is either a returned soldier or the vacant chair of one who never will return, cannot be bought with any such stuff. And it is strange that men in high places do not know these things. Are they both blind and deaf? Why, sir, a man need not read the papers to find it out. If he will but put his ear to the ground he may still hear the tramp, tramp, tramp, of the men who marched with Sherman to the sea, and with Grant to Richmond and Vicksburg, still keeping time to the same music, and still animated and inspired by the same determination. The very air is vocal with the loud demands of the people; while the invisible spirits of half a million of the noblest men who ever lived, and who sleep the sleep which shall know no waking until the last great roll-call is sounded, beseech us that we do not let their sacrifice be in vain.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to discuss the merits of this measure, for I give it, with the exception of the third section, my hearty support. I shall vote for the amendment if I cannot get the section excluded. But I prefer not to stake the infinite good of the remainder upon the uncertainty of ever incorporating the third section in the Constitution. I desire now to call the attention of the House again to the question which I raised yesterday, and to which my colleague [Mr. BANKS] has referred in the remarks which he made a short time ago, namely, that of a possible contest in the Electoral College. I do feel that the question, notwithstanding the easy solution of it to which he has arrived, has more of a serious character in it than seems to have suggested itself to his mind; and with the indulgence of the House I will endeavor to show it.

There is no legislation in the land upon the subject. The only provision governing the counting of the votes of the Electoral College is in the Constitution itself; and it is in these words:

"The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates; and the votes shall then be counted."

But who shall decide, if there be a dispute, whether a vote has come from a man legally chosen? There is no tribunal yet erected to determine that fact. Chancellor Kent says that it is casus omissus, a case that has not been provided for by the framers of the Constitution; that there is no provision in the laws or the Constitution of the United States by which that may be determined. Whether or not it be beyond our power under the Constitution to make such provision, certain it is that we have made no such provision. Chancellor Kent said upon this point, as reported in the debate in connection with the very case which has been cited by my colleague, that of the Wisconsin vote in 1856, that it was a casus omissus, and neither law nor the Constitution itself had provided a solution of the difficulty. When the nation should be involved in such a contest he trembled for the result. He speaks of it in his Commentaries in the following words:

"The Constitution does not express by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes and a closely contested election, this power may be important; and I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the House are present only as spectators, to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction."

Upon the occasion alluded to by my colleague, Henry Winter Davis used this language:

"Now, sir, no strict constructionist, or wide or loose constructionist, can find any function confided to both Houses together or to one separately, which enables them to pass, preliminarily, upon the point whether one vote shall be counted or another rejected. No judgment is called for at all. On the contrary, the Constitution carefully avoids asking for any judgment by anybody upon a mere count."

The idea of referring this to the two Houses in their separate capacity for solution involves at once another difficulty. The two Houses in their separate capacity act as legislators, and legislators alone, and their functions are all prescribed by the Constitution itself. This is not one of them. They cannot as separate bodies act upon the genuineness of the election of a member of the Electoral College, for they have not been constituted for any such purpose nor clothed with any such power. They are not clothed with the judicial power of passing upon the validity of an election of President and Vice President; and suppose the Senate comes to one conclusion and the House to another, what is the result? Suppose the Senate in the Wisconsin case had determined that Mr. Buchanan was elected and the House in its separate capacity had determined that no one was elected, the Constitution requires that the House, thereupon, shall proceed immediately, yes, immediately is the command of the Constitution, without the concurrence of the Senate, to choose a President. Then comes the terrible peril in which this country will be involved, the ordeal through which it will have to pass where the House of Representatives determine one way and the Senate the other.

I do not mean to say it is not within our power under the Constitution to provide a tribunal; upon that question there is no occasion to remark. I have only to say that as yet no such tribunal has been provided. On the occasion alluded to by my colleague it was the opinion of learned men both in the House and in the Senate that the country barely escaped a revolution. They did not decide, as I understood my colleague to say, by passing into their respective Halls whether the vote of Wisconsin should be counted or not. The question was not decided, and remains to be decided to this day. After being in convention and witnessing the opening of the votes, the Senate of its own motion left this Hall and went into their separate Chamber before the work was completed and there undertook to complete by concurrent action, by joint committee of the two Houses, what ever failed to be done here in the meeting of the two bodies, growing out of the dispute about the Wisconsin vote.

But, Mr. Speaker, they failed to accomplish anything. Their resolution was laid upon the table. So with a similar resolution in the House. To-day it has not been decided whether those votes of Wisconsin should be counted or not. Now, suppose the disputed vote had determined the result, and suppose the House differed in its conclusion with the Senate of the United States, and the House elected one man President and the Senate declared that another man was elected. It needs no argument and no suggestion from me to show the House the peril in which the nation would have been involved, and all this in a time of comparative peace. That is one objection I have to the third section in the proposed amendment of the Constitution unless you erect some tribunal to decide the question which may be made. It increases that peril by increasing the danger of a contest, and at a time, too, when there is not yet peace. The embers of war are still glowing. Still, as I said before, I am disposed to vote for it if that cannot be stricken out, but I will give it my hearty support, and so will every loyal heart, if not embarrassed by that clause.

Let me read, if I have a moment's time, what was said by a distinguished gentleman who has since been Governor of his State, Mr. Washburn, of Maine, when the peace of our country came so nigh being disturbed by the Wisconsin case:

"The Constitution provides that the President of the Senate, in the presence of the two Houses, shall open all certificates, and that the votes shall be counted, and the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President of the United States, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and so in regard to the Vice President. The votes shall be opened in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives and then counted. By whom? There is no provision of the Constitution, or of law, that they shall be counted by the Senate or the House, or by a joint convention. There has been no joint convention; nor could there have been any. The assemblage here could do nothing for which it had not the authority of law, and there is no law authorizing the count of these votes by a joint convention, or prescribing the rules and regulations to be observed therein. It was the duty of the President of the Senate here, in the presence of the two Houses, to open the certificates, and to cause the votes to be counted. The Houses had directed how they were to be counted, by a teller appointed on the part of the Senate and two tellers appointed on the part of the House. These tellers made the count, and here, in the presence of us all, made their report to the President of the Senate; and the President of the Senate, in the presence of the two Houses, and in exact conformity with the provisions of the Constitution, did declare the whole number of votes, and did declare who had the majority. Nothing but that could have been done. There was no power on the part of the Senate, or on the part of the House, to interfere with the execution of this duty precisely as specified in the Constitution and in the resolution of the two Houses.

I hold, therefore, that no motion whatever can be made, and that the meeting, under the Constitution, the law of 1792, and the joint resolution, is functus officio. I have no doubt, sir, that there is here a casus omissus; that there is no law and no provision of the Constitution by which anything can possibly be done except what has been done by the President of the Senate in presence of the two Houses. I hold that he ruled aright when he refused to entertain the motions made to him, and when he announced from the chair, in presence of the Senate, and to the House, what had been declared to him by the tellers. That is all that he did, and all that he had authority to do. I am, at the same time, very clear that it is of the highest importance that there should be some legislation on this subject. All that we can now do is to acquiesce in the decision that has been made, and to set ourselves to work immediately for the passage of a law which will prevent any trouble or difficulty of this kind in future. I received a letter but a few days ago from a gentleman eminent for his wisdom and ability, who states therein that the late Chancellor Kent, of New York, had told him that here was clearly a casus omissus; that there was no power, either in the House or Senate, or in a joint convention, to interfere and participate authoritatively in counting and declaring the votes and deciding upon their validity; and he said that the Chancellor added that he feared the time might come when the country would be shaken to its center on this point."

Mr. Seward and Mr. Collamer in the Senate, on the same occasion, expressed similar views, each declaring the impotency of the two Houses or any tribunal known to the law to solve the difficulty, and at the same time each rejoicing at the escape from peril which the immaturity of the vote in question had secured, but pointing out the terrible danger to which the nation would be exposed if ever a material vote in the Electoral College should be questioned.

[Here the hammer fell.]

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a privileged question, and move that evening sessions be hereafter dispensed with. I do so for the reason the House is so far ahead of the Senate that it is unnecessary for us to come here at night, and for the further reason that the reporters are utterly overwhelmed with labor.

The motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. BINGHAM obtained the floor.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the gentleman to allow me one moment to say a word of reply to my colleague.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am willing to yield if it does not come out of my time, otherwise I must proceed.

The SPEAKER. It will come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I beg the House to remember that the three several measures reported by the committee on reconstruction must be considered together as an entirety in order to determine the merit of the question immediately involved before the House in the adoption of the constitutional amendment. I do not believe myself, sir, that the purpose for which this committee was organized by the House would be fully attained if nothing more were to be done by the Congress of the United States than simply to send to the people of the several States the proposition reported by the committee for the amendment of the Constitution.

There are three measures, Mr. Speaker, and not, as some gentlemen seem to argue, but one, that have been reported by this committee. The first of these measures is a condition precedent to the reorganization and restoration to political power of any State lately in insurrection. That measure has more than once during this debate been lost sight of by gentlemen who have spoken.

No State lately in insurrection, according to one of the measures reported, in case it shall become a law of the United States, can ever exercise political powers in this Union until the pending constitutional amendment shall first have become a part of the Constitution of the United States, by the consent of the Legislatures of three fourths of the States now maintaining their constitutional relations to the Government, and by the subsequent consent of the insurrectionary State itself, the State also conforming its own constitution and laws to all its requirements.

Additional to this there is yet another measure reported by the committee to which I attach great importance, and to which I doubt not the loyal people of this country of every section will attach great importance. That is the bill which disqualifies forever from holding any office of honor or trust within the Republic every leading and marked actor in the late rebellion. By that bill the president and vice president of the late confederate States so called will be excluded; the members of the Thirty-Sixth Congress who in any manner aided this rebellion will be excluded; all persons who were educated at the national academies, naval or military, who have been endowed by the people with the power of knowledge, a gift next in value to the gift of the understanding with which the breath of the Almighty has given them, are excluded; the persons who represented this confederacy of treason and crime in any part of the habitable globe are excluded; and above all and beyond all, all persons who in any manner subjected to untimely death by exposure or neglect or the slow torture of famine or poison the captive defenders of the Union, are forever excluded.

The mere statement and concession of the people's right to exercise this power, which is undoubtedly the sovereign right of the American people, by a congressional act, ought to have suggested to the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] that if it is needful in this great work of reconstruction further to disfranchise the participants in this rebellion, it can be done in like manner by an act of Congress, and without a constitutional amendment.

The franchise of a Federal elective office is as clearly one of the privileges of a citizen of the United States as is the elective franchise for choosing Representatives in Congress or presidential electors. They are both provided for and guaranteed in your Constitution. Why, then, prohibit rebels from the enjoyment of the first for life by an act of Congress and restrict the second for a term of years by a constitutional amendment? To be sure we all agree, and the great body of the people of this country agree, and the committee thus far in reporting measures of reconstruction agree, that the exercise of the elective franchise, though it be one of the privileges of a citizen of the Republic, is exclusively under the control of the States. But, sir, the committee never intimated and never intended to intimate by any measure they have reported that any State lately in insurrection can exercise either that power or any other until it is restored to its constitutional relation to the Union save by the express or implied consent of the Congress of the United States, nor that after being restored they can exercise that power contrary to the express conditions prescribed by Congress for their restoration. The power to prescribe these conditions is exclusively in Congress.

That is the philosophy of every measure of reconstruction now pending before the House. And that is wherein it is opposed to the opinions of gentlemen on the other side of the House who have spoken, I am sorry to say—and I say it without the slightest intention of giving offense to any man—not in the spirit of representatives of the people, but in the spirit of partisans. For myself, I cannot approach the discussion of this great question, which concerns the safety of all, in the spirit of a partisan. God forbid that I should approach this subject in any other character than that of a representative of the people—a representative of the people not unmindful of the oath which I took, sir, before your tribune.

Mr. WRIGHT. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman, by reflection, seems to infer that we do not represent the people, and that we are unmindful of our oaths.

The SPEAKER. That is not a point of order under parliamentary law, but an interruption without the consent of the member speaking.

Mr. BINGHAM. The want of the Republic to-day is not a Democratic party, is not a Republican party, is not any party save a party for the Union, for the Constitution, for the supremacy of the laws, for the restoration of all the States to their political rights and powers under such irrevocable guarantees as will forevermore secure the safety of the Republic, the equality of the States, and the equal rights of all the people under the sanctions of inviolable law.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that after the roll shall have been called this day, and the departing sun shall have gilded with its last rays the dome of the Capitol, it will not be recorded by the pen of the historian that the sad hour had come to this great Republic which, in the day of its approaching dissolution, came to the republic of ancient Rome, when it was said Cæsar had his party, Antony had his party, Brutus had his party, but the Commonwealth had none!

I speak to-day, Mr. Speaker, to the party that is for the Republic; to the party that is for the Constitution; to the party that is for the speedy restoration to their constitutional relations of the late insurrectionary States, under such perpetual guarantees as will guard the future of the Republic by the united voice of a united people against the sad calamities which have in these late years befallen it.

Mr. Speaker, the final settlement of this grave question which touches the nation's life is at last with the people of the loyal States—the loyal people of the Union. To the end, therefore, knowing, as the committee did know, that parties must dissolve, that men must perish from the earth, but that the Commonwealth is for all time, if its laws be just and its people be faithful, they propose to the several States a perpetual covenant in the form of a constitutional amendment, never to be broken so long as the people adhere to their cherished forms of government, which, when ratified, will secure the safety of all and the rights of each, not only during the present generation, but throughout all generations, until this grand example of free government shall itself be forgotten. The amendment reported by the committee is as follows:

ARTICLE —.

SEC. 1. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever, in any State, the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age.

SEC. 3. Until the 4th day of July, in the year 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for Representatives in Congress and for electors for President and Vice President of the United States.

SEC. 4. Neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation already incurred, or which may hereafter be incurred, in aid of insurrection or of war against the United States, or any claim for compensation for loss of involuntary service or labor.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

The necessity for the first section of this amendment to the Constitution, Mr. Speaker, is one of the lessons that have been taught to your committee and taught to all the people of this country by the history of the past four years of terrific conflict—that history in which God is, and in which He teaches the profoundest lessons to men and nations. There was a want hitherto, and there remains a want now, in the Constitution of our country, which the proposed amendment will supply. What is that? It is the power in the people, the whole people of the United States, by express authority of the Constitution to do that by congressional enactment which hitherto they have not had the power to do, and have never even attempted to do; that is, to protect by national law the privileges and immunities of all the citizens of the Republic and the inborn rights of every person within its jurisdiction whenever the same shall be abridged or denied by the unconstitutional acts of any State.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, in passing, to say that this amendment takes from no State any right that ever pertained to it. No State ever had the right, under the forms of law or otherwise, to deny to any freeman the equal protection of the laws or to abridge the privileges or immunities of any citizen of the Republic, although many of them have assumed and exercised the power, and that without remedy. The amendment does not give, as the second section shows, the power to Congress of regulating suffrage in the several States.

The second section excludes the conclusion that by the first section suffrage is subjected to congressional law; save, indeed, with this exception, that as the right in the people of each State to a republican government and to choose their Representatives in Congress is of the guarantees of the Constitution, by this amendment a remedy might be given directly for a case supposed by Madison, where treason might change a State government from a republican to a despotic government, and thereby deny suffrage to the people. Why should any American citizen object to that? But, sir, it has been suggested, not here, but elsewhere, if this section does not confer suffrage the need of it is not perceived. To all such I beg leave again to say, that many instances of State injustice and oppression have already occurred in the State legislation of this Union, of flagrant violations of the guaranteed privileges of citizens of the United States, for which the national Government furnished and could furnish by law no remedy whatever. Contrary to the express letter of your Constitution, "cruel and unusual punishments" have been inflicted under State laws within this Union upon citizens, not only for crimes committed, but for sacred duty done, for which and against which the Government of the United States had provided no remedy and could provide none.

Sir, the words of the Constitution that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States" include, among other privileges, the right to bear true allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and to be protected in life, liberty, and property. Next, sir, to the allegiance which we all owe to God our Creator, is the allegiance which we owe to our common country.

The time was in our history, thirty-three years ago, when, in the State of South Carolina, by solemn ordinance adopted in a convention held under the authority of State law, it was ordained, as a part of the fundamental law of that State, that the citizens of South Carolina, being citizens of the United States as well, should abjure their allegiance to every other government or authority than that of the State of South Carolina.

That ordinance contained these words:

"The allegiance of the citizens of this State is due to the State; and no allegiance is due from them to any other Power or authority; and the General Assembly of said State is hereby empowered from time to time, when they may deem it proper, to provide for the administration to the citizens and officers of the State, or such of the said officers as they may think fit, of suitable oaths or affirmations, binding them to the observance of such allegiance, and abjuring all other allegiance; and also to define what shall amount to a violation of their allegiance, and to provide the proper punishment for such violation."

There was also, as gentlemen know, an attempt made at the same time by that State to nullify the revenue laws of the United States. What was the legislation of Congress in that day to meet this usurpation of authority by that State, violative alike of the rights of the national Government and of the rights of the citizen?

In that hour of danger and trial to the country there was as able a body of men in this Capitol as was ever convened in Washington, and of these were Webster, Clay, Benton, Silas Wright, John Quincy Adams, and Edward Livingston. They provided a remedy by law for the invasion of the rights of the Federal Government and for the protection of its officials and those assisting them in executing the revenue laws. (See 4 Statutes-at-Large, 632-33.) No remedy was provided to protect the citizen. Why was the act to provide for the collection of the revenue passed, and to protect all acting under it, and no protection given to secure the citizen against punishment for fidelity to his country? But one answer can be given. There was in the Constitution of the United States an express grant of power to the Federal Congress to lay and collect duties and imposts and to pass all laws necessary to carry that grant of power into execution. But, sir, that body of great and patriotic men looked in vain for any grant of power in the Constitution by which to give protection to the citizens of the United States resident in South Carolina against the infamous provision of the ordinance which required them to abjure the allegiance which they owed their country. It was an opprobrium to the Republic that for fidelity to the United States they could not by national law be protected against the degrading punishment inflicted on slaves and felons by State law. That great want of the citizen and stranger, protection by national law from unconstitutional State enactments, is supplied by the first section of this amendment. That is the extent that it hath, no more; and let gentlemen answer to God and their country who oppose its incorporation into the organic law of the land.

The second section of the amendment simply provides for the equalization of representation among all the States of the Union, North, South, East, and West. It makes no discrimination. New York has a colored population of fifty thousand. By this section, if that great State discriminates against her colored population as to the elective franchise, (except in cases of crime,) she loses to that extent her representative power in Congress. So also will it be with every other State.

Upon the third section of the amendment gentlemen are divided upon this side of the House as well as upon the other. It is a provision that until the year 1870 all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for Representatives in Congress or for electors for President or Vice President of the United States. This section imposes no other or further disability.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this section can bring no strength to the amendment, although I fully agree with the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] in the words which he so fitly uttered, it is within the authority of the people of the United States to disfranchise these parties. But, sir, I submit to the honorable gentleman, and I submit to the House, that if we have the power by a mere act of Congress, (as is conceded by the committee,) to take from rebels the franchise of office under the Government of the United States for life, as is provided in the bill reported by the committee, we can as well take from them until 1870, by an act of Congress, the right to vote for Representatives in Congress or for presidential electors, as is provided in the third section of this amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. And have it vetoed.

Mr. BINGHAM. My friend from Pennsylvania says, "and have it vetoed." I am not fearful of any veto at the other end of the avenue. I believe no veto can defeat the final passage of either of the measures reported to the House, nor can a veto defeat the final triumph of this constitutional amendment before the people. The success of the amendment here depends upon no veto. It does not go to the President for his sanction. Touching, however, the other question, the veto of the bill, even with the provision of the third section added to it, I do not believe for a moment, that the President will veto it, and for the reasons suggested, which I have not time to enumerate now, by the gentleman from Massachusetts in the citations he made from the President's proclamation of the 29th of May last and the just deductions he drew therefrom. I can vote for the amendment with the third section in as readily as without it. It raises no question of power; it imposes no unjust disability. It involves a question of policy, not of power. The sovereignty of the nation can unquestionably disfranchise the persons referred to, not only until 1870, but until seventy times seventy shall have passed over them, if it pleases God to allow them so long to live upon the earth.

The question upon the third section, and the only question, is, what do we gain by putting it in the constitutional amendment? If thereby we endanger the adoption of the amendment in the Senate, or its final ratification by the requisite number of States, we should omit it. It has been said that the third section is incapable of execution if adopted. I beg leave to say to the House that in my opinion an amendment that is not to be executed to the full, and which is incapable of full execution, ought not to be put into the Constitution. My honorable colleague from the Columbus district, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] in my judgment, suggested, in the few remarks which he made yesterday, the only method by which the Government of the United States can enforce the first clause of that section, and that is by making a registry law for congressional districts, and the election of Representatives to Congress all over the country, and appointing election officers to conduct the same. The first clause only of the third section can in that way be executed; but is there anybody here who proposes to send Federal election officers into Massachusetts or New York to control the elections of Representatives to Congress? The amendment, sir, is of universal application, and if adopted, it is to be enforced in every State in the Union. There are voters within the operation of this section in every State. I have no objection to their disfranchisement, but are you going to enforce the provision if adopted? If not, why retain it? Is it to be retained simply to furnish demagogues a pretext for raising the howl that we exclude rebels for four years only that we may control the next presidential election? Honest, intelligent, and reflecting men will scout such a suggestion, but the calculating and the careless or thoughtless may accept and act upon it to the hurt, the lasting hurt, of the sacred cause this day in your hands. How, I ask, can the last clause of this third section be enforced?

That clause of the section excludes until 1870 all rebels from voting for electors for President and Vice President of the United States.

I venture to say that by the very letter and intentment of the Constitution of our country, the great seal of a State, duly organized and exercising its functions within this Union touching the appointment of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, is final and conclusive upon Congress, except when the certificate shows that the electors were appointed on a day other than that prescribed by the Constitution or the laws. The Constitution has provided that these electors shall be appointed by each State in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct; that the Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they shall give their votes, which day shall be the same throughout the United States, and that the electors shall certify their action.

If the State and the electors' certificates show that all these provisions have been complied with, Congress cannot go behind them and inquire who voted for the electors. If, on the contrary, the certificate from any State discloses that the electors did not meet on the day prescribed by law, as was the fact in the Wisconsin case, to which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] referred, of course the Congress could reject the vote from that State, but where the certificates are regular, where they show a due appointment of electors, that the electors were chosen on the day prescribed by law, and met and voted for President and Vice President on the day prescribed by law, Congress cannot go behind the certificates; neither can the two Houses of Congress, in joint convention or separately, investigate the question. The appointment of electors for President and Vice President of the United States is the act of a State and not of individuals. "Each State shall appoint," says the Constitution; therefore the act can be evidenced only by the certificate of the State officials, under its great seal, which imports absolute verity. How could Congress say the appointment was not the act of the State against the certificate and seal of the State?

The remarks of some gentlemen to the effect that under the Constitution we could enforce the first clause of the section by inquiring into the election of members of the House or of the Senate, do not apply to the last clause, because the express language of the Constitution is that "each House shall be the judge of the elections and returns" as well as the "qualifications of its own members." There is no like grant in the Constitution that each House or both Houses in joint convention may inquire into the appointment of electors; therefore the second clause of the third section of the amendment is useless.

I venture to say that clause is useless unless, indeed, by implication Congress is to declare the express text of the Constitution as I have cited it repealed by the proposed amendment when adopted, and that by virtue of it Congress will prescribe by law the mode and manner of appointing electors for President and Vice President of the United States, in the face of the existing provision of the Constitution that "each State shall appoint the electors in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct." Who will say, if this amendment is adopted, that the State Legislatures may not direct the manner and each State appoint electors? To what, then, are we reduced? This amendment does not disqualify any rebel or aider of the rebellion from voting at all the State elections for all State officers, nor does it disqualify them from being appointed presidential electors. It amounts, therefore, to this: though it be adopted, and made part of the Constitution, yet all persons "who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort," may vote at all the State elections for State officers, and, being largely in the majority in every insurrectionary State, may elect the State Legislature, which may appoint electors for President and Vice President of the United States, and from aught in the amendment may appoint rebels as such electors.

It seems to me, sir, that it must by this time be apparent to members of the House that this clause of the amendment is never to be executed until that part of the text of your Constitution is stricken out; or in other words, that it will require another amendment to the Constitution to enforce this clause if adopted.

I trust, therefore, that when the vote comes to be taken on the pending motion to strike out which is offered by way of instruction to the motion to recommit, it will be adopted, and that afterward the House will, if it deems it important, put such a provision as to the election of Representatives to Congress as it has the lawful right to do in the bill of disfranchisement.

Mr. Speaker, there is another section which simply prohibits the United States or any State of this Union from ever assuming or paying any part of the rebel debt or making compensation for emancipated slaves. I do not believe that there is a man on this floor who can answer to his constituency for withholding his vote from that proposition. It involves the future fidelity of the nation. It is a declaration in solemn form, if accepted by the people, that the resources of this great country shall be used in the future, not to liquidate debts contracted in aid of rebellion, not to pay for emancipated slaves, but to maintain inviolate the plighted faith of the nation to all the world and especially to its dead and its living defenders.

Mr. Speaker, I trust that this amendment, with or without the third section, will pass this House. I trust that the disfranchisement bill, with or without additions, will pass this House. I trust that the enabling act for the restoration of the States that have been in rebellion will, with amendment, pass this House; so that the day may soon come when Tennessee—loyal Tennessee, loyal in the very heart of the rebellion, her mountains and plains blasted by the ravages of war and stained with the blood of her faithful children fallen in the great struggle for the maintenance of the Union—having already conformed her constitution and laws to every provision of this amendment, will at once upon its submission by Congress irrevocably ratify it, and be without further delay represented in Congress by her loyal Representatives and Senators, duly elected and duly qualified and ready to take the oath of office prescribed by existing law.

Let that great example be set by Tennessee and it will be worth a hundred thousand votes to the loyal people in the free North. Let this be done and it will be hailed as the harbinger of that day for which all good men pray, when the fallen pillars of the Republic shall be restored without violence or the noise of words or the sound of the hammer, each to its original place in the sacred temple of our national liberties, thereby giving assurance to all the world that for the defense of the Republic it was not in vain that a million and a half of men, the very elect of the earth, rushed to arms; that the Republic still lives, and will live forevermore, the sanctuary of an inviolable justice, the refuge of liberty, and the imperishable monument of the nation's dead, from the humblest soldier who perished on the march, or went down amid the thunder and tempest of the dread conflict, up through all the shining roll of heroes, and patriots, and martyrs, to the incorruptible and immortal Commander-in-Chief, who fell by an assassin's hand in the capital, and thus died that his country might live.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to conclude the debate, but I will not move the previous question until I finish what I have to say.

I am glad, sir, to see great unanimity among the Union friends in this House on all the provisions of this joint resolution except the third one. I am not very much gratified to see any division among our friends on that which I consider the vital proposition of them all. Without that, it amounts to nothing. I do not care the snap of my finger whether it be passed or not if that be stricken out. Before another Congress shall have assembled here, and before this can be carried into full effect, there will be no friends of the Union left on this side of the House to carry it out as—

Mr. LE BLOND. Members are crowding the aisles on the other side and the open space in the center of the House so that we can neither see nor hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. Members must resume their seats.

Mr. STEVENS. I should be sorry to find that that provision was stricken out, because before any portion of this can be put into operation there will be, if not a Herod, a worse than Herod elsewhere to obstruct our actions. That side of the House will be filled with yelling secessionists and hissing copperheads. Give us the third section or give us nothing. Do not balk us with the pretense of an amendment which throws the Union into the hands of the enemy before it becomes consolidated.

Gentlemen say I speak of party. Whenever party is necessary to sustain the Union I say rally to your party and save the Union. I do not hesitate to say at once, that section is there to save or destroy the Union party, is there to save or destroy the Union by the salvation or destruction of the Union party.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] who has just taken his seat thinks it difficult to carry it into execution, and he proposes to put it into a bill which the President can veto. Will my friend tell me how much easier it is to execute it as a law than as a provision of the Constitution? I say if this amendment prevails you must legislate to carry out many parts of it. You must legislate for the purpose of ascertaining the basis of representation: You must legislate for registry such as they have in Maryland. It will not execute itself, but as soon as it becomes a law, Congress at the next session will legislate to carry it out both in reference to the presidential and all other elections as we have the right to do. So that objection falls to the ground.

Gentlemen tell us it is too strong—too strong for what? Too strong for their stomachs, but not for the people. Some say it is too lenient. It is too lenient for my hard heart. Not only to 1870, but to 18070, every rebel who shed the blood of loyal men should be prevented from exercising any power in this Government. That, even, would be too mild a punishment for them.

Gentlemen here have said you must not humble these people. Why not? Do not they deserve humiliation? Do not they deserve degradation? If they do not, who does? What criminal, what felon deserves it more, sir? They have not yet confessed their sins; and He who administers mercy and justice never forgives until the sinner confesses his sins and humbles himself at His footstool. Why should we forgive any more than He?

But we are told that we must take them back as equal brothers at once. I shall not agree they shall come back except as supplicants in sackcloth and ashes. Let them come back and ask forgiveness, and let us then consider how many we will forgive and how many we will exclude. All I regret is, this is not sufficiently stringent.

Sir, they tell us, I hear several gentlemen say, that these men should be admitted as equal brethren. Let not these friends of secession sing to me their siren song of peace and good will until they can stop my ears to the screams and groans of the dying victims at Memphis. I hold in my hand an elaborate account from a man whom I know to be of the highest respectability in the country, every word of which I believe. This account of that foul transaction only reached me last night. It is more horrible in its atrocity, although not to the same extent, than the massacre at Jamaica. Tell me Tennessee or any other State is loyal of whom such things are proved!

I regret that the true men of these States cannot be brought in, but they cannot be brought in with rebel constituency behind them. They would misrepresent their States. Therefore I can never agree to let them in under the present state of affairs. Let us have probation; let us be sure that something more than mere willingness to come in has been felt by them.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy many minutes. I was indeed astonished to find my respected colleague, I will not say so tender-hearted, but so lenient to those toward whom mercy is not rendered necessary. But I know so well his natural kindness of heart and his proximity to that eloquent divine who so lately has slaughtered whole herds of fatted calves, that I cannot be much surprised at it. But, sir, if he is so fond of such associates, let me suggest in all kindness to him that he can find better company nearer home. He lives very near Cherry Hill, where there is a State institution containing several hundred inmates who—

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him in his geography? I do not live near Cherry Hill. I live on the top of Chestnut Hill. [Laughter.] And I would like to know the name of the distinguished divine to whom he refers. I cannot recollect any one.

Mr. STEVENS. It is the late Henry Ward Beecher. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. I understood my colleague to say a neighbor of mine. Mr. Beecher lives about a hundred miles from me.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, that is in the neighborhood in this country, three thousand miles in extent. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman himself is about as near and much nearer to him in many things than I am. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. How near does my friend live to Cherry Hill?

Mr. THAYER. About ten miles.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, let him walk ten miles, instead of going two or three thousand South, and he will find, as I said, three or four hundred inmates, whom, if he wishes to forgive and enfranchise, he will find at present a little restrained of their rights. They have done nothing but err. There is no blood upon their hands; they have only erred in committing such little acts as arson and larceny. Let him go to one of those corridors and cause it to be opened and they will flock around him, and he will see men who are not half as bloody and have not committed half as many crimes as the rebels whom he wishes to see immediately admitted here.

Now, sir, for my part I am willing they shall come in when they are ready. Do not, I pray you, admit those who have slaughtered half a million of our countrymen until their clothes are dried, and until they are reclad. I do not wish to sit side by side with men whose garments smell of the blood of my kindred. Gentlemen seem to forget the scenes that were enacted here years ago. Many of you were not here. But my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] ought to have kept up his reading enough to have been familiar with the history of those days, when the men that you propose to admit occupied the other side of the House; when the mighty Toombs, with his shaggy locks, headed a gang who, with shouts of defiance on this floor, rendered this a hell of legislation.

Ah, sir, it was but six years ago when they were here, just before they went out to join the armies of Catiline, just before they left this Hall. Those of you who were here then will remember the scene in which every southern member, encouraged by their allies, came forth in one yelling body, because a speech for freedom was being made here; when weapons were drawn, and Barksdale's bowie-knife gleamed before our eyes. Would you have these men back again so soon to reenact those scenes? Wait until I am gone, I pray you. I want not to go through it again. It will be but a short time for my colleague to wait. I hope he will not put us to that test.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. THAYER. This amendment does not affect the eligibility of the people to whom he refers. That portion to which I directed my remarks excludes them from voting; and I wish to ask my colleague in this connection whether he thinks he can build a penitentiary big enough to hold eight million people.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir, a penitentiary which is built at the point of the bayonet down below, and if they undertake to come here we will shoot them. That is the way to take care of these people. They deserve it, at least for a time.

Now, sir, if the gentlemen had remembered the scenes twenty years ago, when no man dared to speak without risking his life, when but a few men did do it—for there were cowards in those days, as there are in these—you would not have found them asking to bring these men in, and I only wonder that my friend from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] should intimate a desire to bring them here.

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg the gentleman's attention one moment. I have not by one word or vote of mine ever justified him in saying that I consent ever to bring them in.

Mr. STEVENS. Never; but the gentleman wished to strike out a section and kill this amendment, the most popular before the people of any that can be presented.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the gentleman to indulge me a moment. The third section does not touch the question of their coming in.

Mr. STEVENS. Then why is it you oppose it? If it is going to hurt nobody, in God's name let it remain. If it is going to hurt anybody, it will be the men that deserve it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my motion to recommit, and move the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. In case the previous question is not seconded, will my motion to amend be in order?

The SPEAKER. A motion to amend will be in order if the previous question is not seconded.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I hope it will be voted down, so that I may move this amendment:

All persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving aid and comfort to the so-called southern confederacy, are forever excluded from holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The question being put, there were—ayes 90, noes 59.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I demand tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. FARNSWORTH and STEVENS.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes 57.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred on ordering the main question.

Mr. DELANO. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 79, not voting 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Banks, Baxter, Bidwell, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Deftrees, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Grider, Grinnell, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Kerr, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McCullough, McIndoe, Mercer, Morrill, Moulton, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Ward, Elihu B. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—84.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boyer, Buckland, Bundy, Coffroth, Cullom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Dodge, Donnelly, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Hayes, Henderson, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Jenckes, Kasson, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Longyear, Marshall, McKee, McRuer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Myers, Newell, Phelps, Plants, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stillwell, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Winfield, and Wright—79.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Brandegee, Culver, Denison, Farquhar, Hale, Hill, Hogan, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Marvin, Nicholson, Noel, Pomeroy, Sloan, Starr, Van Aernam, and Wentworth—20.

So the main question was ordered.

During the roll-call,

Mr. STROUSE stated that his colleague, Mr. DENISON, had been called away on account of sickness in his family.

The result having been announced as above recorded,

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. LE BLOND and Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I call for the reading of the engrossed joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is not on the Clerk's table.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move the House adjourn, and upon that motion I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw my call for the reading of the engrossed joint resolution.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Then I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to inquire of the Chair if it is in order to move to recommend this joint resolution with instructions to amend.

The SPEAKER. That is not now in order pending the execution of the previous question. The previous question will not be exhausted until the joint resolution has been read the third time.

The joint resolution was then read the third time, as follows:

A joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE.—

SEC. 1. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever in any State the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age.

SEC. 3. Until the 4th day of July, in the year 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for Representatives in Congress and for electors for President and Vice President of the United States.

SEC. 4. Neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation already incurred, or which may hereafter be incurred, in aid of insurrection or of war against the United States, or any claim for compensation for loss of involuntary service or labor.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

Mr. STEVENS. I call the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE and Mr. LE BLOND called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Does not the Constitution require that the vote upon the passage of an amendment to the Constitution shall be taken by yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. The Constitution requires that the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays upon the passage of a measure over a veto. But it only says that the passage of an amendment to the Constitution shall be by a two-thirds vote of each House of Congress, but does not say that the vote shall be by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 128, nays 37, not voting 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Deftrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Stillwell, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and the Speaker—128.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Chanler, Coffroth, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Harris, Kerr, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Smith, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Whaley, Winfield, and Wright—37.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Brandegee, Culver, Denison, Farquhar, Hale, Hill, Hogan, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Marvin, Nicholson, Noel, Pomeroy, Sloan, Starr, and Wentworth—19.

So, two thirds voting in the affirmative, the joint resolution was passed.

When the name of Mr. RAYMOND was called, his response in the affirmative was received with applause on the floor and in the galleries.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. TAYLOR. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. James M. HUMPHREY, is paired with another colleague, Mr. POMEROY.

Mr. DEMING. My colleagues, Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. HUBBARD, are both absent. If they were present they would both vote for this joint resolution.

Mr. ANCONA. My colleague, Mr. JOHN-SON, is still detained from his seat by illness.

Mr. RADFORD. My colleague, Mr. JONES, is absent on account of sickness; if he was here he would vote against this joint resolution.

The announcement of the vote, as above recorded, was received with applause on the floor and in the galleries.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. I want to know if it is understood that the proceedings of this House are to be interrupted by those who come here and occupy the galleries.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] makes the point of order that expressions of approbation or disapprobation from persons occupying the galleries are not in order. The Chair sustains the point of order. Members upon the floor and spectators in the gallery will observe the rules of the House and maintain order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not want our proceedings to be interrupted by the "nigger-heads" in the galleries. [Hisses in the galleries.]

Mr. STEVENS. Is it in order for members on the floor to disturb those in the galleries? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Members upon the floor should not insult the spectators in the galleries.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WAGON ROADS IN THE TERRITORIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in reply to a resolution of the House of the 4th instant, in regard to certain wagon roads in the Territories of Idaho, Montana, Dakota, and Nebraska; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

CLERKS IN THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in reply to a resolution of the House of the 7th instant, in regard to the number of clerks employed in that Department, in what army they served, &c.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN EXPENDITURES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in response to a resolution of the House of the 23d ultimo, relative to expenditures in the Indian service; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

COLORADO CITIZENS OF CHICAGO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House an address to the Congress of the United States from the colored citizens of Chicago, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROSS moved that the address be referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next. I would say that I certainly would not make this motion if I thought that by sitting here to-morrow and next day we would facilitate the adjournment of this Congress one single day. But I know the situation of business in the Senate, and the situation of business in this House, and I am satisfied there is no necessity for us to press matters as we have been doing. We have done a pretty good week's work this week, and everybody is tired, and the Doorkeeper wants to-morrow and next day for the purpose of cleaning up this Hall and putting down the matting for the summer.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I desire to say to the House that it is impossible that this work of fixing the Hall can be done inside of four days; and, therefore, there is no use in adjourning. If we meet, the committees can be called, and we can make considerable progress with our business.

The question was taken on agreeing to the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and there were—ayes 78, noes 68.

Mr. FARNSWORTH called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 68, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Banks, Beaman, Bidwell, Blow, Boyer, Chanler, Cobb, Cofroth, Conkling, Davis, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eldridge, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Hulburd, Kasson, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, Le Blond, Longyear, Marshall, Marston, McCullough, McRuer, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Niblack, Paine, Phelps, Pike, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—79.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bergen, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, Deffries, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Fernsworth, Ferry, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Higby, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Morris, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Price, Ritter, Rollins, Ross, Sitgreaves, Taber, Thayer, Van Aernam, Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and Windom—68.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Brandegee, Bromwell, Buckland, Bundy, Cook, Culver, Denison, Farquhar, Hale, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Asabel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Lynch, Marvin, McIndoe, Nicholson, Neill, Plants, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Sloan, Starr, Stevens, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Welker, Wentworth, and Stephen F. Wilson—36.

So the motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 667) entitled "An act to amend an act to establish the grade of vice admiral in the United States Navy."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed House bills of the following titles with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 397) to authorize the coinage of five-cent pieces; and

An act (H. R. No. 511) imposing a duty on live animals.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SMITH asked leave of absence for Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri, for three days.

Leave was granted.

Mr. McCULLOUGH asked leave of absence for Mr. HARRIS for one week.

Leave was granted.

Mr. BINGHAM asked leave of absence for Mr. SHELLABARGER for ten days.

Leave was granted.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, asked indefinite leave of absence for Mr. HOLBROOK.

Leave was granted.

Mr. ROSS asked leave of absence for Mr. THORNTON for one week.

Leave was granted.

TAXES ON IMPORTED SPIRITS.

Mr. DARLING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to refund certain taxes upon imported spirits; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

DUTY ON LIVE ANIMALS.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, the House, by unanimous consent, proceeded to the consideration of Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 511) entitled "An act imposing a duty on live animals."

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the bill the following: Provided, That any such animals now bona fide owned by resident citizens of the United States, and now in any of the Provinces of British America, may be imported into the United States free of duty until the expiration of ten days next after the passage of this act.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TELEGRAPHIC LINES.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to aid in the construction of telegraphic lines, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

TAX ON TOBACCO AND CIGARS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to present at this time an amendment to the tax bill, relating to tobacco and cigars. I desire that it may be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so that it can be taken up in connection with the bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

Mr. BANKS. I move that, by unanimous consent, the Senate amendments to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 133) relative to the attempted assassination of the Emperor of Russia be taken from the Speaker's table and considered at this time.

There was no objection; and the amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

In line five strike out the word "their."

Add the following as a new section:

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to forward a copy of this resolution to the Emperor of Russia.

The amendments were concurred in.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. BOYER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be, and are hereby, requested to inquire into the expediency of so amending the pension laws as to place dependent fathers on the same footing with dependent mothers.

IRRIGATION AND CANAL COMPANY.

* Mr. HIGBY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill granting right of way and making a grant of land to the Sierra Nevada and Contra Costa Irrigation and Canal Company, in the State of California.

Mr. WRIGHT. I object.

LAND-GRANT RAILROAD IN OREGON.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, Senate bill No. 99, entitled "An act granting land to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Albany, Oregon, to the eastern boundary of said State," was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ADJOURNMENT OVER—AGAIN.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask that by unanimous consent it be understood that no business shall be transacted in the House next Monday, but that immediately on meeting we shall adjourn. To-morrow and Saturday, with Monday, will not more than give the Doorkeeper sufficient time to put the matting upon the floor of the House and complete the other arrangements for the summer occupancy of the Hall. We have agreed to adjourn till Monday, and unless we now allow sufficient time for having this job thoroughly done, we shall very soon have another adjournment of two or three days. I trust there will be no objection to my proposition.

Mr. MILLER. I object.

The SPEAKER. An adjournment of this House under the Constitution cannot be for more than three days except with the concurrence of the Senate. The Speaker will therefore be obliged to take the chair at twelve o'clock next Monday; but if there should be no quorum in attendance those present can of course adjourn until the next day.

J. B. WALKER AND OTHERS.

On motion of Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Banking and Currency was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of J. B. Walker, and others, officers of the New Hampshire Savings Bank, in Concord, New Hampshire; and the same was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

CLAIMS AGAINST VENEZUELA.

Mr. DRIGGS. A resolution which I offered the other day contained an error, being addressed to the Secretary of State, instead of the President. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution for the purpose of correcting that error:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to cause to be furnished to this House a list of the claims of citizens of the United States now pending in the United States legation at Caracas, against the United States of Venezuela, with a brief indication of the causes of complaint and the reasons why payments have not been enforced during a long series of years, and what measures are necessary to bring these long-deferred claims to a speedy settlement.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

RESOLUTIONS OF CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE.

Mr. McRUER, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Legislature of California indorsing the action of the delegation in Congress from that State in voting for the passage of the bill known as the Freedmen's Bureau bill; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Public Buildings be directed to report to this House the number of clerks and employes in his official service, with the States from which they were appointed, and what were their occupations previous to their appointment, with the number who were in the Union Army, and the names, number, and residences of such, if any, as have been in the rebel army, and by whom those of the latter class were recommended for appointment.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the employment of additional counsel in cases of claims depending against the Government of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WASHINGTON CANAL.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to call the attention of the House to a matter affecting the sanitary condition of this city.

It is understood that workmen, under the direction of the city authorities, have commenced removing the deposit and sediment from the Washington canal, throwing this offensive matter upon the banks. The subject has been referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, who, having examined the question, deem it very injudicious and unsafe for the city authorities to allow such work to be done. Under the direction of the committee, I have prepared a joint resolution having in view the stopping of that work. I ask unanimous consent to report that joint resolution for consideration at the present time.

Mr. ALLEY. I object.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The gentleman ought to hear the resolution read before he objects.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at forty minutes past four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BANKS. The petition of Richard Mason, Augustus Brises, James H. Davis, George W. Lester, and 100 others, citizens of the United States, against the passage of the second section of the constitutional amendment now pending, and for a law granting equal political rights to all citizens without regard to race or color.

By Mr. J. HUMPHREY. The petition of William W. Gardener, and others, glass-blowers, in relation to revenue taxation.

By Mr. HULBURD. The petitions of sundry citizens of the counties of St. Lawrence, Franklin, and Jefferson, New York, asking an ad valorem duty and an increase of duty on imported flax.

Also, a remonstrance of sundry citizens of Oneida county, New York, against the bill to reorganize the Federal judiciary.

By Mr. HUBBARD, of New York. The petition of 72 citizens of the county of Chenango, New York, asking that a duty of ten cents per pound and ten percent ad valorem be levied on all unwashed foreign wools competing with American wools, the value whereof at the last port of export, including charges in such port, shall be thirty-two cents or less per pound, and that a duty of twelve cents per pound and ten percent ad valorem be levied on all like wools, the value whereof, including charges in port, shall exceed thirty-two cents per pound; and that the above rates of duties be doubled on washed wools and trebled on soiled wools.

Also, the petition of citizens of the town of Oxford, in the county of Chenango, New York, for a daily mail route from Unadilla, in the county of Otsego, to that place.

By Mr. McINDOE. The petition of R. O. Harris, and 67 others, praying that mail route No. 13122, in Adams county, Wisconsin, be altered and extended.

Also, a petition for the establishing of a mail route from Friendship, in Adams county, Wisconsin, by Arende, to Barnum, in said county.

By Mr. RICE of Maine. The petition of Dr. E. F. Sanger, and others, physicians of Penobscot county, Maine, for exemption of certain medicines from import duties.

By Mr. RADFORD. The petition of citizens of New York, for the regulation of inter-State insurances.

By Mr. WARD. The petition of numerous citizens of Heune, in Alleghany county, New York, in favor of increasing the tariff on wool.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 11, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES presented concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of the establishment of a Bureau of Education; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of C. W. Walker, and a large number of other citizens of Macgregor, in the State of Iowa, who pray that Congress will frame and pass a general law regulating the bridging of the upper Mississippi river, making provision therein that neither railroad nor water traffic be impeded or impaired. I present also another and similar petition from citizens of the same place, containing the same prayer. I move that these petitions be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of the Long Island Historical Society, in relation to the unburied remains of soldiers on the battlefield of Shiloh; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a memorial of citizens of Natchez, Mississippi, remonstrating against the proposed tax on cotton; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 103) to refer the petition of Benjamin Holiday to the Court of Claims, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. M. J. Walker, praying for compensation for property taken and used by the United States forces at Vicksburg, Mississippi, in 1863 and 1864, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Augustus Hubbell, late captain and commissary of subsistence United States volunteers, praying that he may be allowed, in the settlement of his accounts, a certain amount of money which he alleges to have been stolen from him on the 17th of July, 1865, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Henry Roy de La Reintrie, praying that compensation be allowed him for effective and valuable services rendered to the Government of the United States in California in exposing fraudulent land claims against the Government, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Benjamin Tilley, praying for compensation for land in the city of Washington occupied by the Government as a part of the site on which Camp Fry is situated, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, the bill (S. No. 119) granting lands to the Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Fort Gibson Railroad Company to aid in extending their railroad and telegraph line from the southern boundary of Kansas to the northern boundary of Texas, in the direction of Galveston bay, was recommended to the Committee on Public Lands.

DEBATES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to inquire into the necessity of more correct reports of the debates of the Senate, and to report a remedy for the practice of changing and suppressing words spoken in debate in the Senate and substituting therefor matter not spoken.

I do not ask for the present consideration of the resolution, and I will not occupy the time of the Senate with it now, because when the resolution is considered I desire to submit some remarks in connection with it and in explanation of it. I am willing, therefore, that the resolution shall lie over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie over under the rules.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 133) relative to the attempted assassination of the Emperor of Russia, and to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 511) imposing a duty on live animals.

PAY DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House joint resolution No. 130. It is a small matter, and will not require the consumption of time.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 130) to carry into immediate effect the bill to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy was considered as in Committee of the Whole. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of an act to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy, with the least delay possible, the joint resolution authorizes the President of the United States to waive the examination of such officers in the pay department of the Navy as are on duty abroad, and cannot at present be examined as required by law; but such examinations as are required by law are to be made as soon as practicable after the return of the officers to the United States, and no officer found to be disqualified is to receive the promotion contemplated in the act herein referred to.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported the joint resolution with an amendment, to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to retain or to appoint, under existing laws and regulations, such volunteer officers in the Navy as the exigencies of the service may require until their places can be supplied by graduates from the Naval Academy.

Mr. CONNESS. As I understand that amendment, it proposes simply to put the volunteer officers, who have now had years of experience, in the service temporarily out of the Navy as soon as their places can be supplied by graduates of the Naval Academy. It does not strike me as a very wise thing to be done, and I should like to hear from the honorable chairman of the Naval Committee his views on the wisdom of the amendment proposed. It will be remembered that the officers of the volunteer Navy had experience as seamen in the mercantile marine before they entered that branch of the naval service; and it appears to me that when experienced officers, many of whom have rendered efficient and valuable service during the war, are transferred into the Navy there should be a provision for their remaining there. I do not know why they should give place to graduates from the Naval Academy. I should like to hear from the chairman on the subject.

Mr. GRIMES. I think the Senator from California misapprehends the scope of this proposition. Under laws passed in 1861, 1862, and 1863, the Secretary of the Navy was authorized to appoint certain persons, such as might pass the board of examination, to certain grades in the volunteer service of the Navy; but there was a provision in the law declaring that they should cease to be officers of the United States whenever the rebellion ended. These officers are now scattered all over the world in various squadrons, and it is simply proposed to enact a law so that if the President of the United States should see fit to-morrow to issue a proclamation declaring that the rebellion has entirely ceased, from that moment these officers shall not cease to be, but shall continue in the service and draw their pay and perform their duty to the Government.

The question as to whether the volunteer officers shall be retained in the permanent Navy is not embraced in this joint resolution, but is embraced in another proposition which is under consideration in the Committee on Naval Affairs. This section simply retains these officers for the present, until there shall be subsequent legislation by Congress. That is the purport and scope of it. It was drawn in the Navy Department by gentlemen who entertain the same views in regard to the adoption of the volunteer officers into the Navy that the Senator from California entertains, as I understand from what he has said.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I offer as an additional section the following:

And be it further resolved, That naval constructors shall hereafter be held to be staff officers in the Navy, and entitled to all the rights and privileges and subject to all the liabilities and duties of such.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed, and the bill be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed; and its title was amended by adding "and for other purposes."

PENSION BUSINESS.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I ask that the following order may be entered:

Ordered, That Friday next, after the expiration of the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of bills and reports from the Committee on Pensions.

There is, perhaps, enough business of this kind to occupy an hour or two. It is important that we should dispose of it, and I propose to take next Friday for that purpose.

The order was agreed to.

J. W. GORDON.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 127.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 127) for the relief of Jonathan W. Gordon, late major in the eleventh regiment of infantry, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury, in settling the accounts of J. W. Gordon, late major in the eleventh regiment of infantry, to allow him a credit of $600 on account of bounties paid enlisted men in accordance with the provisions of the act of July, 1862, but before that act went into effect.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASIATIC CHOLERA.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to take up House joint resolution No. 116, to prevent the introduction of cholera into the ports of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution, the question being on the amendment proposed yesterday by Mr. EDMUNDS to the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the consent of the honorable Senator from Michigan to let this subject lie over for a little while, that we may call up a bill concerning the Pacific coast which will not occupy a very long time.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will it lead to debate?

Mr. CONNESS. I think not at all. This subject of the cholera is a pretty dangerous one, and has proven to be a tedious one in this body, and we should like to be relieved from it a little while this morning with the Senator's permission.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hardly think the resolution will lead to any further debate. I desire simply to ask that the letter which I hold in my hand may be read.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will not consent to my request, of course I shall not persist in it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think this resolution will be disposed of sooner perhaps than the Senator's bill can be passed. I think there will be no further discussion upon it. I am perfectly willing to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Vermont and dispose of the question in that way. I have no feeling on the subject, but I ask in justice to the physicians and surgeons who were before the Committee on Commerce that the letter which I hold in my hand and now send to the desk may be read.

The Secretary read the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 11, 1866.

DEAR SIR: I have had inserted in the National Intelligencer of this morning a notice correcting a misapprehension that seems to prevail to some extent that the medical committee on "cholera and quarantine," of which I am chairman, was delegated by the American Medical Association. When before the Committee on Commerce I stated that our committee was appointed at a meeting of medical men at Baltimore on the 4th instant, assembled on a call numerously signed by physicians from every part of the United States to petition the Government to adopt a general uniform system of quarantine at all our ports, and the "memorial" presented by Hon. Mr. MORGAN, which was adopted at said meeting, was headed "memorial of physicians," and no mention was made of the national convention except that I stated verbally that those who signed the call of the meeting were members of that body.

It is true that the subject of quarantine and cholera was brought before the convention, and a "plan of quarantine," submitted by Dr. Marsden, of Quebec, and discussed at some length, when the whole matter was postponed till near the close of the session, when it was laid on the table by a vote of 68 to 60, only a little more than one third of the members being present. The question was not decided on the issue of contagion or non-contagion, portability or non-portability, quarantine or no quarantine, but on the expediency of petitioning Congress on the subject. A very general feeling prevailed in the convention that the medical profession ought not to proffer their advice, and thrust their opinions upon the Government, but wait until their opinions were asked. With this conviction many who believed in the infectious and portable character of cholera moved to lay the matter on the table, especially as at the late hour it was brought up there was no opportunity for a full discussion. In consequence many of those who were not satisfied with this disposal of the matter signed the call for the aforesaid meeting, who adopted the "memorial" which has been presented to the Senate.

CHARLES A. LEE, M. D.,

Hon. Mr. CHANDLER.

Chairman of Committee.

Mr. SUMNER. When the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] rose yesterday, it may be remembered that I at the same time tried to catch the eye of the Chair. I had intended to say something very much in the sense in which he spoke. I should not have said it so well, and I was not prepared with the authority which he had in his hand, though I had intended to allude to it.

I should not say anything now but for the remarks of my friend from New York [Mr. HARRIS] who seemed so much at a loss where to find the power which it is now proposed to exercise. He was so much at a loss that he went beyond those bounds which he usually prescribes for himself in this Chamber, and indulged in an unwonted levity. Not content with showing, as he supposed, that the power did not exist where it was said to exist, he asked, with a humorous face, whether it was not found under the clause to guaranty a republican form of government. I am very glad to find that my excellent friend is disposed to look to that clause of the Constitution. It is a clause that has been very much neglected, but to my mind it is one of the most potent in the whole Constitution, full of beneficent power that it would be well if this Government now, at this crisis of its history, were disposed to exercise. In this clause are waters of healing for our distressed country. Follow this clause in its natural and obvious requirements, and you will have security, peace, and liberty under the safeguard of that Great Guarantee, the Equal Rights of all.

But I must remind my excellent friend that there is no occasion at this time for any resort to this transcendent source of power. The power from which this resolution is derived is obvious. My friend interrupts me to say that it is the war power. I say it is obvious, and I will show him in a moment that it is not the war power. It is a power that has been exercised constantly, from the beginning of our history, with regard to which there can be no question; because it is embodied in one of the clearest texts of the Constitution; because it has been expounded by a series of decisions from our Supreme Court, which are among the most authoritative in our history. It is the power to regulate commerce. My friend smiles; but he must not smile at the Constitution of his country. That reads as follows:

"Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States."

By this resolution it is proposed to regulate commerce with foreign nations. Have not all the regulations with regard to passengers been under this power? Have they not all been the regulation of commerce with foreign nations? Can there be any doubt on the question? Is it not as plain as language can make it? Why, sir, ever since I have been in Congress we have had annual bills for the regulation of passengers coming into our ports—bills of different degrees of stringency, laying one penalty here, and another penalty there, all in the execution of this unquestionable power.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator be kind enough to look at the second clause of the amended proposition, where it says:

That he—

That is the Secretary of War—

shall also enforce the establishment of sanitary cordons to prevent the spread of said disease from infected districts adjacent to or within the limits of the United States?

Not confining it to the lines between the States, but giving him authority to establish cordons within the jurisdiction of a State. I should like to know where the Constitution authorizes such a thing as that.

Mr. SUMNER. I am obliged to my friend even for interrupting me to call attention to that section, though he will pardon me if I do not answer him at this moment, but do so when I come to that part of the resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. Any time will do, so that we get it.

Mr. SUMNER. You will have it all. I am dwelling now on the question of the power derived from the positive text of the Constitution to regulate commerce with foreign nations. I say that in the execution of that power we have undertaken to apply all manner of restrictions and regulations to the transportation of passengers. We have gone so far as to provide for the quantity of water that shall be on board each ship in proportion to every passenger. We have subjected every ship to regulations while at sea, and again to other regulations after arriving in port. The exercise of the power has by practice been placed absolutely beyond question. Then, as I have already said, it is entrenched in the very best judicial decisions of our country. I submit that no person can raise a question with regard to it.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. About the question of regulating the importation of passengers from foreign countries nobody raises a question or a doubt. This is a question of quarantine, in its character police. Is there any precedent in the history of the United States where that power has been exercised by the general Government?

Mr. SUMNER. I am very glad the Senator presses that question. I meet it. Does the Senator mean to suggest that the same power that can reach to the sea, and determine even the quantity of water that shall be in the hold for each passenger cannot apply the minutest possible regulation when that same ship at least arrives in the harbor?

Mr. MORRILL. Will my friend allow me to answer him right there?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. I maintain that when the passenger is landed and comes within the limits and jurisdiction of the State and within its police power, the commercial power of the Government ceases at that point, and the treatment of the passenger thereafter is within the police power of the State exclusively.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the Senator goes beyond the decision of the Supreme Court. He overrules that decision.

Mr. MORRILL. I am precisely on a line with the license cases, in which the principle was applied to the importation of liquors, in which the court settled that until they were landed the Government of the United States had exclusive jurisdiction, but when they were landed and were undertaken to be distributed the police power of the State intervened and became exclusive.

Mr. SUMNER. At a certain stage I admit that the police power of the State may intervene, but I do nevertheless insist as beyond question that the power of the United States is complete over every passenger vessel when it arrives in the harbor, so that it may be subjected to any regulations in the discretion of Congress for the public good with reference to passengers. Of course this is discretion to be exercised wisely for the public good, to the end that the public health may not suffer. Strange if the national Government, which is our guardian against foreign foes, may not protect us against this fearful enemy.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not deny that; I agree to that—

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. MORRILL. Now, my query is, can the power of commerce, that power which regulates the passengers on their passage to this country, follow the passengers entirely into the States and overrule the internal police of the States? That is the question.

Mr. SUMNER. Now the Senator puts a question which runs into the question already propounded by the Senator from Iowa, and to which I am coming in due course of time. I have not quite arrived at it. I was illustrating the power that the General Government would have in the harbor; and now let me give another illustration, which is familiar to my honorable friend; it is with reference to goods which arrive. I need not remind the Senator from Maine that when goods have arrived subject to duties the custom-house exercises its control according to the prescription of law, not only while those goods are water-borne, but after they have been landed, and if they have been landed in violation of the law, it pursues those goods even into the interior.

Mr. CHANDLER. To the Rocky mountains.

Mr. SUMNER. A Senator behind me says even to the Rocky mountains. It is enough to say that it pursues those goods into the interior. In short, the Constitution of the United States was not so absurd, nor have our courts been so absurd in its interpretation, as to recognize a power in the custom-house merely at the door of the granite structure, and to require that it shall stop there. No, sir, the power must be made effective. We have practically made it effective with reference to goods. We have also, to a certain extent, made it effective through decisions of the Supreme Court with reference to passengers. It now remains that we should carry it one stage further, and for the public good, and to secure the public health, which is a great part of the public good, to insist that this same power shall be applicable, just as we have already insisted that it is applicable, to the pursuit of goods. I cannot myself see the difference between the two cases. It seems to me that the power over goods imported at our custom-house under the acts of Congress, the power over passengers introduced into this country under acts of Congress, are both derived from the same source, and you can find no limitation for one and no expansion for one which is not equally applicable to the other. I insist, therefore, that on this simple text, the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, you find ample power for this action. You must annul this text, or at least limit it by construction and dwarf its fair proportions, or the power of Congress to provide against cholera is perfect.

But Senators call my attention to the second clause of the resolution, which is as follows:

That he shall also enforce the establishment of sanitary cordons to prevent the spread of said disease from infected districts adjacent to or within the limits of the United States.

To my mind this clause may be treated under two different heads: first, it may be regarded as ancillary from the nature of the case to the power which is derived under the clause to regulate commerce with foreign nations. From the nature of the case, if you have the power to shut out cholera from the ports, you must be intrusted with an associate power to follow this same enemy even into the interior, precisely as you follow goods that have escaped the exercise of your power in the ports. I am willing, therefore, to put it even on the first clause of this constitutional provision, calling it simply ancillary. But I do not stop there, for annexed to the first clause are the words, "and among the several States." Congress has power to regulate commerce among the several States. Now, sir, assuming that commerce is, as it has been described or defined by our Supreme Court, intercourse among men, embracing the transportation not only of goods but of passengers, and applicable to everything that comes under the comprehensive term intercourse, giving to it that expansive definition which I think you will find in some of the decisions of the Supreme Court, I ask you if you do not find under that second clause ample power also to regulate this matter. Congress has power to regulate commerce, communication, intercourse, transportation of freight and transportation of passengers among the several States. To make that effective, you must concede to it a power such as is described in the clause to which the Senator from Iowa has directed my attention:

It shall also enforce the establishment of sanitary cordons to prevent the spread of said disease from infected districts adjacent to or within the limits of the United States.

There is no reference here to State lines, and why? From the necessity of the case. The disease itself does not recognize State lines. The authority which goes forth to meet the disease must be at least on an equality with the disease, and can recognize no State lines. How vain to set up State rights as an impediment to this beneficent power.

I therefore conclude that the power over this subject is plenary, whether you look at the first clause of the Constitution to which I have called attention relating to foreign commerce, or the second clause relating to commerce among the States. It is full, it is complete. Hence I put aside the constitutional objection, whether urged seriously or in levity, as it was perhaps by my excellent friend from New York; I put it aside as absolutely out of the question and irrelevant. Congress has ample power over this whole question; and, sir, permit me to ask if it had not ample power over this whole question, where should we be as a Government at this time? Can we confess that a great Government of the world must fold its arms and see a foreign enemy, for such it is, crossing the sea and invading our shores and we unable to go forth to meet it? I do not believe that this transcendent Republic is thus imbecile. I believe that under the text of the Constitution, as well as from the nature of the case, it has ample powers to meet the enemy in the simple text of the Constitution regulating commerce. To my own mind the case seems too clear for argument.

And this brings me, sir, to the proposed amendment of the Senator from Vermont. He moves to strike out the clause to which I called attention myself the other day and to substitute certain words creating a commission. I objected to this clause the other day; I will read it now:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, with the cooperation of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury, whose concurrent action shall be directed by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, to adopt an efficient and uniform system of quarantine against the introduction into this country of the Asiatic cholera.

I objected, it may be remembered, to this clause as placing this bill under the patronage of the war power. I did not think it needed that patronage, though I was willing to admit that it might need sometimes the exercise of the war authority; but I did not think that it needed to be derived from the war power. It was not from the nature of the case an exercise of this power, but it was clearly derived from the power over the commerce of the country; and I regretted, therefore, that the framers of the bill had seemed to put the war power in the forefront. Now, the Senator from Vermont meets that suggestion by an amendment to the effect that a commission shall be constituted, embracing the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury. I have no particular criticism to make upon that amendment; if the Senate consent to it, I shall certainly be disposed to join; but I think that a better form still may be adopted and one which shall place what we do more completely and unreservedly under that power of the Constitution from which I think it is derived; that is, the power to regulate commerce. I would therefore propose that the duty shall be confided primarily to the Secretary of the Treasury, who, in the exercise of his powers, shall be aided by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, under the direction of the President of the United States.

It seems to me that with that change the bill will be brought into absolute harmony with the Constitution, will be above criticism, and it will be amply effective. I would therefore, if I could have the permission of my friend the Senator from Vermont, propose the amendment in this form: to strike out in the third line the word "War" and insert "the Treasury;" to strike out in the fourth line the word "Navy" and insert the word "War;" and to strike out in the fifth line the word "Treasury" and insert "Navy," and then to strike out the words "whose concurrent action shall be directed by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy," and insert simply "under the direction of the President of the United States;" so that the clause would read:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the cooperation of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, under the direction of the President of the United States, to adopt an efficient and uniform system of quarantine, &c.

In making this change we shall simply enlarge and expand the existing powers of the Secretary of the Treasury. He is now the head of the custom-house; he regulates the passenger system. Go further, and give him these additional powers that shall enable him, so far as he can, to prevent the introduction of disease into the country. All that we do will be in harmony with the practice of the Government, and I submit will be above question. The Government, in the exercise of admitted powers, will be, I trust, more than a match for the cholera.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, as there are now two amendments pending, that of the committee and my own, and inasmuch as the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts reaches the same point that I had in view, and may be more satisfactory to Senators, with the leave of the Senate I withdraw the amendment I offered, in order that the Senator from Massachusetts may offer his.

Mr. SUMNER. That being withdrawn, I move now to amend the amendment of the committee in the way I suggested, by striking out in line three the word "War" and inserting "the Treasury;" by striking out in line four the words "the Navy" and inserting "War;" in line five by striking out "Treasury" and inserting "War;" and also by striking out the words "whose concurrent action shall be directed by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy" and inserting "under the direction of the President of the United States."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the object of this resolution commends itself to the Senate, provided it can be accomplished. We all have an interest, in common with the whole country, in keeping the cholera out of the United States if we can; if we have the power by legislation to accomplish that purpose, it is our duty to exert it; but I am unable to agree with the honorable member from Massachusetts, that there is any such power under the authority with which Congress is clothed of regulating commerce with foreign nations and between the States. The other grounds on which it is supposed the resolution can be maintained, as far as the authority of the honorable member from Massachusetts is concerned, I understand to be abandoned. It is not to be maintained upon the war power, because there is no war, actual or anticipated, and before any authority can be exerted under the war power with which Congress is clothed, there must be a state of war. During the late rebellion we gave as broad an interpretation to that power, and perhaps broader than the framers of the Constitution designed; but it is immaterial now to inquire whether in the past during a war, or whether in the future if there should be a war, we can go to the extent we have done, or whether in going to that extent we were justified or not, looking strictly to the true interpretation of the Constitution in that particular. I think all will agree that there must be a war before the power that grows out of a state of war can be exerted; and as nobody pretends that there is a condition of war now, or as far as we know that any war is anticipated, either with a foreign nation or among ourselves, the resolution upon the table cannot be justified upon that ground.

Nor does it profess, even if it could have been justified upon that ground, to be the exertion of the war power. It is intended to avoid disease, and nothing else. It is a sanitary regulation. It is a regulation to be accomplished by means of quarantine, or by quasi means of the same description. My friend from Massachusetts supposes—and the honorable member from Vermont yesterday, in proposing his amendment, put it upon that ground—that the measure can be maintained under the authority which Congress has to regulate commerce with foreign nations. My friend from Vermont will permit me to say that he misapprehends—I speak it with all respect—the principle upon which the passenger cases were decided. At that time the Supreme Court—a majority of the judges following what they supposed to be the rule established in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in 9 Wheaton—were of the opinion that the authority conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce between the United States and foreign nations was exclusive, so that over that subject the States had no control whatever, and upon reasoning very plausible, and not only plausible, but very forcible, as stated in the opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, who gave the unanimous opinion of the court in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden. But in the subsequent cases, in the passenger cases, and afterward more decidedly in what were called the license cases, a majority of the court came to the conclusion that the power was not an exclusive one, and that the States had a right to pass laws the effect of which was to regulate commerce in all cases in which such laws would not, in that particular, conflict with any existing laws which Congress might have passed. In other words, the court held that the power was, in one sense, a concurrent power; that if the United States thought proper to exercise their authority, about which there could be no doubt, but did not make an entire regulation, that which was not regulated fell within the scope of the power of the State. It is due to my own opinion and due to candor to say that I think the latter opinions of the Supreme Court in that particular were erroneous. My belief at the time was, and my belief now is, that the power was designed to be exclusive; and that, therefore, if Congress should fail to regulate entirely commerce between the United States and a foreign nation, Congress would have declared, by the failure to regulate, that what was being done with commerce as between the United States and foreign nations and the several States, was just in the condition in which Congress desired it to remain. In other words, the power of regulating commerce with which Congress is clothed is a power exerted in a case of that description by not regulating. The subject itself seems to be—and I speak now upon the authority of Mr. Chief Justice Marshall—one which necessarily must be entrusted to one power, to one Government; and if so, as nobody can doubt that the power is given to Congress by the Constitution, that power, in my opinion, is exclusive of like authority on the part of the States. But the received doctrine of the Supreme Court now is otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business, which is House bill No. 280, upon which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that the special order will be laid aside informally. I think we can get a vote very soon on this question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no desire to go on; not the slightest.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think we can get a vote very soon on this measure.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think not.

Mr. CHANDLER. My colleague is willing to wait.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday can be laid aside by unanimous consent only.

Mr. JOHNSON. Not by my consent.

Mr. CLARK. I think we had better go on with the Post Office bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose there is no danger of the cholera coming here in the next two months.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the unfinished business will not be laid aside.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. TRUMBULL.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the discussion upon the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] now under consideration has taken so wide a range as almost to induce the belief that certain gentlemen who have spoken have become oblivious of the subject-matter of discussion. This liberality having been extended by the Presiding Officer to others, I trust I shall not fall under the censure of any gentleman if I avail myself of it also. I cannot, therefore, assure the Senate that in what I am about to say I shall confine myself very strictly to the amendment under consideration.

Mr. President, it has been declared during this discussion and on numerous other occasions, both in the Senate and out, that the so-called policy of the President of the United States, who holds his office, under the Constitution, by reason of the death of President Lincoln, is but the same policy enunciated and attempted to be carried out by the latter; and we have been told by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE], and the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN], in very energetic and emphatic tones, that this policy is the identical policy of Mr. Lincoln in regard to the reconstruction of the rebel States. I take issue with those Senators upon this question of fact. I deny that the policy of President Johnson is identically the policy of President Lincoln upon that most grave and important subject; and I shall show, or at least endeavor to show, in my feeble way, that the two lines of policy, that of Mr. Lincoln and that of Mr. Johnson, are in point of principle as wide apart as the poles; that while on the part of President Johnson there is an assertion of the absolute power of the Executive to interfere in the manner he has interfered for the restoration of the rebel States, while it is asserted in his behalf that he has this omnipotent power, and that it does not belong to Congress, Mr. Lincoln always, in his most solemn proclamations and acts, disclaimed that power and was ever careful to protest that he, as the executive branch of the Government, possessed no real power on the subject of the readmission of the rebel States into Congress. Let us recall a part of the history of the times and endeavor to see the exact position occupied by Mr. Lincoln touching the power of Congress and his own power over the question of the readmission of Senators and Representatives from the rebel States into Congress.

But before I come to that, let us, if it be possible, ascertain what this policy of Mr. Johnson actually is. Let us entertain clear ideas upon the subject, and ascertain what is the real essence, the gist of the controversy now existing between him and Congress. The best announcement of the policy of Mr. Johnson upon the subject of reconstruction is of course to be found in the most solemn paper he ever signed, and that is his message at the opening of the present session of Congress. I have read that message with care, and studied it carefully and repeatedly, and so has the country. If there be any document in existence that is well comprehended both in Congress and out of it, it is that document. The following is a brief synopsis of the views of the President contained in that paper.

It assumes and asserts the power in the President to appoint provisional governors of the rebel States, to give them authority to call conventions, and to reestablish civil governments in them. This it claims as an executive power, a power derived under the Constitution, a power which he has exercised; but, sir, a power which in my judgment exists for him in no part of the Constitution. In this document he claims the right to reorganize civil governments as and for State governments in the rebel States, with all the powers, rights, and privileges of States of and in the Union. In short, he claims the power, as the Executive of the United States, to make peace with the States once in insurrection.

Sir, under what clause of the Constitution does the President find the power to proclaim and reestablish peace, after a state of war has intervened, whether with a foreign country with which we may happen to be at war, or a State or district declared by Congress to be in insurrection? He has not the power under the Constitution to make war, and for the same reason he has no power under the Constitution to make peace; and Congress has never in any statute given him any authority whatever to declare peace even in regard to the rebel States. Gentlemen will look in vain for any such authority. In the act of 1861 the President was authorized to declare certain States in insurrection; but, sir, Congress never gave to him any power to declare the insurrection to be at an end, much less to declare the insurrectionary districts again restored to the status they occupied before the war, or to declare that peace in the full constitutional sense of the term has been restored.

Mr. COWAN. Is there any necessity for a declaration that the rebellion is over? Is there any necessity in a case of this kind for a declaration that peace is restored?

Mr. HOWARD. That is by no means the question. The question is, not whether there be any necessity for granting such a power to the President, but whether it has been granted. I assert that Congress have never granted any such power to the President as to declare that peace in all its forms and in all its relations has been restored to the insurrectionary districts. Congress have taken good care to reserve to themselves this authority. I remind the Senate of the fact that the statute I allude to was drawn by the hand of one of the most cautious, circumspect, and profound constitutional lawyers of the country, Mr. Collamer, of Vermont. He carefully abstained from inserting any clause in that statute authorizing the President to declare that peace was restored.

But the message assumes that it is within the constitutional competency of the President to make peace with the insurrectionary States. It assumes this without the slightest recognition in any of its pages or paragraphs of the power or duty of Congress to legislate on this most important subject. In fact, the message ignores completely Congress and its authority, and treats the Executive as the only source of power over the conquered States. It does not consult or offer to consult Congress at all on the subject of reconstruction, and takes as little pains to refer this subject or any branch of it to Congress, as if there was no Congress; but with singular coolness asks the two Houses to judge, each for themselves, of the elections, returns, and qualifications of their own members. I will refer to the message itself. After stating that he had pursued a certain process in attempting to restore the rebel States to the Union, that he had done this thing, that, and the other, the President says:

"The amendment to the Constitution being adopted it would remain for the States, whose power has been so long in abeyance, to resume their places in the two branches of the national Legislature, and thereby complete the work of restoration."

And this is all he says of the power of the Congress of the United States to legislate or in any way to act upon the question of the re-admission of the insurrectionary States into Congress. It is a plain and undisguised assumption that he, and he alone, has imparted to them the legal right to be again represented in Congress.

To make this certain he adds:

"Here it is for you, fellow-citizens of the Senate, and for you, fellow-citizens of the House of Representatives, to judge, each of you for yourselves, of the elections, returns, and qualifications of your own members."

Sir, had the seceding States been out of the Union for four years without war, had not a blow been struck nor a soldier marched against them, and had they seen fit to come back into the Union quietly, peacefully, and of their own accord, the message could not have been more silent as to the effect of the war upon their condition. On the part of the President of the United States the claim is put forth that he, and he only, has the right to resort to the measures necessary for the reconstruction of the States, and he has assumed, solely in virtue of the executive authority, to appoint provisional governors, without sanction of law—for there is no law nor a part of a law that authorizes him to appoint them—to impart to them power to convoke conventions and to give to those conventions certain power over the reformation of State constitutions, power to enact laws, power to call together Legislatures, and, in short, to cover the whole field of State legislation; and after having done all this he very coolly and very condescendingly says to Congress, "It now remains for you, gentlemen of the Senate, and for you, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, to judge"—of what? Of the fitness of the States for re-admission? No, sir. To judge of anything else? No, sir; but simply and solely to judge of the elections and qualifications of the Senators and Representatives that may have been elected from these States thus reconstructed under the executive decree. There is a complete denial on the part of the Executive of any authority in Congress to interfere, to inter-meddle, or to regulate in any manner whatever the internal concerns of the insurrectionary States, or to take any step with regard to their internal policy or their internal legislation.

To show that I am not incorrect in this, and in order that the country may be made aware of what the President has actually done under this high claim of power, I beg to call the attention of Senators to the circular letter addressed by Mr. Johnson soon after the cessation of actual hostilities to the various provisional governors of the insurrectionary States. I have here the commission which he issued to his numerous provisional governors. He, the President of the United States, assumes, of his own motion, without authority of Congress, without calling together Congress, or in any way consulting or proposing to consult them, to issue to each of these provisional governors this imperial commission, assuming to grant full legislative authority over the conquered States. After reciting in very laborious phrase the fact that he is President of the United States, that he is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and adding what is not contained in the Constitution or the laws of the land, that he also is "chief civil executive officer of the United States," he says:

"Now, therefore, in obedience to the high and solemn duties imposed upon me by the Constitution of the United States"—

I call the attention of the especial friends of the President to this singular language, and I shall ask them to explain it before this discussion ceases—

"Now, therefore, in obedience to the high and solemn duties imposed upon me by the Constitution of the United States, and for the purpose of enabling the loyal people of said State to organize a State government, whereby justice may be established, domestic tranquillity insured, and loyal citizens protected in all their rights of life, liberty, and property, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, do hereby appoint A B [this is directed to Governor Holden] provisional governor of the State of North Carolina, whose duty it shall be, at the earliest practicable period, to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for convening a convention composed of delegates to be chosen by that portion of the people of said State who are loyal to the United States, and no others, for the purpose of altering or amending the constitution thereof, and with authority to exercise, within the limits of said State, all the powers necessary and proper to enable such loyal people of the State of North Carolina to restore said State to its constitutional relations to the Federal Government, and to present such a republican form of State government as will entitle the State to the guarantee of the United States therefor, and its people to protection by the United States against invasion, insurrection, and domestic violence."

The authority conveyed by this commission is perfectly plenary, perfectly boundless in its scope and extent—"authority to exercise within the limits of said State all the powers necessary and proper to enable such loyal people to restore said State to its constitutional relations to the Federal Government."

Now, sir, I ask, under what clause of the Constitution of the United States is it that the President derives this boundless and undefined authority he has thus assumed to impart to his provisional governor? I assert that no such power is granted by the Constitution. There is nothing of the kind in it. As well might the President of the United States, in case of a conquest by the armies of the United States of a foreign country in the prosecution of a foreign war, assume to appoint a provisional governor and give him full power to call together a convention of the conquered people, to authorize that convention to frame a constitution for that people, to authorize them to elect a legislative body to enact laws, and, indeed, to launch and put in motion the whole machinery of civil government in a foreign land conquered by our arms, and to impart to the community thus framed and fashioned the right to be represented in the two Houses of Congress as one of the States of the Union, as to assume to give his provisional governors in the insurrectionary district the like authority.

Understand me, Mr. President; I do not assert that there was no necessity in the rebel States to make some provision against anarchy and for the preservation of order. I do not assert that a conquered people is to be left entirely to the results of war, anarchy, bloodshed, and private rapine. The laws of war and the laws of nations provide for the preservation of order and protection of private rights; and the general in the field is bound to afford this protection. That is by no means the question. The question is, what power has the President of the United States over the subject of legislation in the conquered country? Has the President of the United States this most important power? Is he the only legislative authority in the land whose duty it is to see to it that loyal governments are established, or does it belong to Congress? That is the point. I maintain that the power belongs to Congress, and to Congress alone. How was the necessity produced of any interference of this kind on the part of the United States? How has it happened that provisional governors became necessary? It was by the results of war. Who carried on the war? Was it the President? Who raised the Army? Who armed, clothed, disciplined, officered, drilled them? Congress, and not the President.

Sir, this claim of legislative authority on the part of the President, a claim perfectly distinct and outspoken so far as he is concerned, is, in my judgment, one of the most enormous usurpations of the power of Congress ever attempted; and if the Congress of the United States at this moment, the most momentous in the history of this Government, shall wink at the assumption, if they shall not stand up in their places here and manfully and resolutely assert their constitutional power over the whole subject, I look forward to the time when the will of the Executive of this nation shall become the law of the land, and the authority of Congress dwindle in feebleness, and finally become lost in desuetude and contempt.

What, sir, was the plain duty of the President on the cessation of actual hostilities in the spring of 1865? The Constitution provides that the President shall, upon extraordinary occasions, convoke Congress for the purpose of taking their advice and enabling them to pass such acts of legislation as may be required. Sir, has there ever been any occasion in our past history, is it likely that another occasion will arise in our future history, more imperiously calling upon the Executive to convoke Congress and submit the whole matter to their judgment than that occasion? We had been engaged in one of the most bloody and ferocious wars known in history. At least eleven millions of the people of the United States had been for four years waging a relentless, wicked, rebellious war against the Government. The loyal States had sent to the field uncounted myriads of their sons to combat the enemy. There was scarcely a plantation from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, scarcely a stream of water throughout the length and breadth of the land whose banks had not been dyed with the blood of the faithful or of the rebellious. More than one half the geographical extent of our territory lying east of the Rocky mountains had been in the acknowledged possession of the rebellion. We had sacrificed untold millions of dollars in the prosecution of the war to uphold the authority of the Constitution, and there was hardly a household throughout the loyal North in which there were not tears of lamentation over the loss of some dear one who had bravely gone to the field and sacrificed his life under the folds of the old flag. At the North we were divided by political parties. We had in our midst a party who had openly declared against the further prosecution of the war and pronounced it a failure, a party who for long anxious months were on the very eve of taking up arms also against the Government and acting as the allies of the rebels. The whole country, from center to circumference, was convulsed and thrown almost into anarchy by these great and perilous events. Our relations with foreign Powers had also become greatly entangled, and there was never an occasion when it was so necessary to call Congress together, take their advice, and appeal to them for proper legislation; and yet Mr. Johnson, acting I know not under whose advice, assumed to himself the whole task of restoring what he calls peace, and of reconstructing the rebel States, without convocation of the representatives of the States and the people, in utter disregard of their authority or the measures of legislation which they might think demanded by the public safety.

I complain of this course of conduct on the part of the Executive because I believe it to be a usurpation of the authority which pertains, not to him, but to Congress; and here is the gist of the controversy; here is the bone of contention. Mr. Johnson, backed by certain advisers, says to the country and to Congress, "The executive power is sufficient in the premises; the executive power has recreated and reconstructed the States; you, gentlemen of Congress, have nothing to do with this subject; you have no power of legislation over it; I, the Executive, I, Andrew Johnson, assume to myself the authority of declaring when a State is restored to the Union and when it is entitled to readmission by its Senators and Representatives into the Halls of Congress." This is the point. The policy of Mr. Johnson was plainly announced in his opening message. He had, forsooth, reconstructed the States, and he says to us, in very condescending terms, "It belongs to you now, gentlemen of either House, to judge merely of the qualifications of the members who shall be sent to you by my reconstructed States!"

Now, Mr. President, I come to the question of what was the policy of President Lincoln; and here I desire the particular attention of the apologists of this great stretch of executive power. That I do not err in saying it is claimed in behalf of Mr. Johnson that he is but pursuing the same policy pursued by Mr. Lincoln, the following extract will sufficiently prove. In his 22d of February speech, already famous at home and abroad, and in which Mr. Johnson undertook to develop his policy and to eulogize it, he said:

"The very policy which I am pursuing now was pursued under his [Mr. Lincoln's] administration, and was being pursued by him when that inscrutable Providence saw fit to remove him, I trust, to a better world than this."

"The very policy which I am pursuing," is the language of President Johnson.

Again, the honorable Secretary of State, in the speech he made at the Cooper Institute in New York on the same evening, speaking of the same subject, used the following equally emphatic language:

"And it is the same plan that Abraham Lincoln projected before he was removed from his high trust, the same one that Andrew Johnson was executing for him in Tennessee."

That policy, sir, here asserted to be the same as that of Mr. Lincoln, is immediate readmission to Congress, without delay, without securities, without condition; and it is based upon this monstrous assumption, to which I have already alluded, that it is competent for the Executive to reconstruct the insurrectionary States; that it is for him and not for Congress to impart political power and legislative capacity to the people of the insurrectionary States. Now, sir, I assert that Mr. Lincoln never adopted any such principle, and I stand here in my feeble way to vindicate the memory of that great and good man from such an aspersion upon his character.

Mr. Lincoln, in his proclamation of the 8th of December, 1863, after declaring that he should recognize as the true government of the insurrectionary States the one which should be constituted according to the provisions of each of his proclamation, proceeds to use the following cautious and significant language, which seems to have been entirely overlooked or forgotten by the advocates of the immediate restoration policy:

"To avoid misunderstanding, it may be proper to say that this proclamation, so far as it relates to State governments, has no reference to States wherein loyal State governments have all the while been maintained. And for the same reason"—

That is, to avoid misunderstanding—

"it may be proper to further say that whether members sent to Congress from any State shall be admitted to seats constitutionally rests exclusively with the respective Houses, and not to any extent with the Executive."

Here is Mr. Lincoln's protest against his own authority so to construct an insurrectionary State as to impart to it the right of electing and sending members of the Senate and House of Representatives. He refused to recognize as within himself any such authority. He denied it in the most guarded language of which he was capable. Is that the doctrine of President Johnson to-day? Does he deny that to him pertains the power of imparting political rights to the insurrectionary States in such a way as to enable them legally and constitutionally to elect Senators and Representatives? No, sir. He asserts it; and he asserts that this having been done by virtue of his imperial decrees, all that remains for Congress to do is to pass, each House for itself, upon the naked, barren question of the sufficiency, the regularity, or formality or informality of the mere certificates of election which may be brought here.

He has assumed to enable the insurrectionary States to elect Senators and Representatives to come to these Halls and participate in our legislation. And this is the great point of controversy between us, the assumption on his part to interfere in the legislation of Congress and the denial of that authority on our part. Such is the gist of the controversy. "My policy" means immediate readmission into the two Houses of Congress in the persons of the Senators and Representatives elected by these reconstructed rebellious States without qualification, without condition, and without taking security against a recurrence of the war.

Mr. Lincoln never adopted any such principle, but he denied it. He was careful, in order to avoid any misunderstanding on this most delicate question, so to express himself in his proclamation as to leave no ground of controversy or disputation. He asserts that the right of readmission belongs exclusively to Congress, and not to any extent to the Executive. That is not, however, "my policy," nor the doctrine of the advocates of "my policy."

Mr. President, allusion has been made to what is known as the dying speech of President Lincoln. Even that has been quoted on this floor in support of the pretensions of the Executive. Sir, this doctrine receives no support from the dying speech of Abraham Lincoln. On the contrary it receives from that speech a most stern and decisive rebuke. On that occasion President Lincoln said:

"As a general rule I abstain from reading the reports of attacks upon myself, wishing not to be provoked by that to which I cannot properly offer an answer. In spite of this precaution, however, it comes to my knowledge that I am much censured from some supposed agency in setting up and seeking to sustain the new State government of Louisiana. In this I have done just so much as, and no more than, the public knows."

A phrase in its tone and style entirely Lincolnian.

"In the annual message of December, 1863, and accompanying proclamation, I presented a plan of reconstruction, (as the phrase goes,) which I promised, if adopted by any State, should be acceptable to and sustained by the executive government of the nation. I distinctly stated that this was not the only plan which might possibly be acceptable; but I also distinctly protested that the Executive claimed no right to say when or whether members should be admitted to seats in Congress from such States."

A full, solemn, plump disclaimer on the part of President Lincoln of the exercise of that assumed power which I am now combatting, the power asserted at present by President Johnson of the right of the rebel States to readmission into Congress.

Mr. COWAN. I beg the honorable Senator's pardon for interrupting him, but I know that he has no design to misrepresent the President; I think not, at least.

Mr. HOWARD. Not at all.

Mr. COWAN. Has not the President quite as distinctly, quite as plumply disclaimed on his part any attempt to influence Congress to admit members from the southern States upon this floor? Has he not said that that rests exclusively with each House of Congress? Mr. Lincoln said "the respective Houses of Congress." Is it not but fair to the President to say that he has never on any occasion or at any time claimed that he had the right to dictate to Congress whether they should receive this member or that member or the other? Is not the true question this: when a southern applicant for a seat comes here, shall the Senate of the United States decide upon it for themselves, and shall the House of Representatives decide for themselves, or shall a joint committee of the two Houses, and both Houses, decide the question rather than the respective Houses, as President Lincoln said, or each House as President Johnson has declared?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, there is in the mind of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania or in my own a great confusion of ideas. I am combatting this principle, to wit, that it is the right of the President of the United States so to reconstruct, reconstitute, or recreate the insurrectionary State governments as to enable them, in virtue of his executive decrees, to elect a Senator or Representative at all. That is the point. The mere formal question of the power of each House to decide upon credentials is one which I am not discussing. I go far behind that; I go down to the bottom, to the essence of the question, and deny the power of the President to impart to the people of any rebel State any political rights whatever; and I claim that that power belongs to Congress and to Congress alone. I have not said that Mr. Johnson had ever stated that he claimed he had the right to dictate whether this House or the other should admit this particular member or the other particular member to a seat in the House. That is a side issue, as the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania readily sees if he understands the question. It has nothing to do with the real question I am discussing. That is the power of the President of the United States to impart political rights to enemies who have forfeited them by making war against the United States.

Mr. COWAN. The honorable Senator will allow me a word, so that we may understand each other; because I really desire to understand him, and I think he is fair enough to desire to understand other people. Do I understand the honorable Senator, then, to say here that, in the rebellion, the rebel States were utterly and entirely destroyed, had no existence whatever in the eyes of the Constitution and the laws, and that the President had no authority whatever to institute any measures for their rehabilitation and for their replacement in their order as States, and that it is in that of which he complains of the President?

Mr. HOWARD. I shall not now undertake, for it is unnecessary, to lay down the exact boundaries and limitations of the power of the President of the United States, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, in regard to a conquered people. That is an immaterial question. However, in part answer to the gentleman's rather prolix interrogatory, I will say, that it is not competent for a military commander in the field, whether he be "Commander-in-Chief" or acting in any other capacity under the Constitution of the United States, to impart political or legislative rights to the conquered community. That is what I assert. The Commander-in-Chief holds the sword of physical force; all his acts as Commander-in-Chief are connected with the prosecution of the war as such, and go not a single inch beyond the necessities of the war. He has no authority to assume the legislative power that appertains to the Government who appoints him and whose servant he is, and undertake to exercise legislative authority in the country where he is the conqueror. Let the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania read the numerous cases in Roman history and in Grecian history, and indeed in all other histories in which such attempts have been made on the part of commanders in the field, and he will not find a single instance in which any attempt to exercise legislative authority over a conquered people has been tolerated by the Government at home.

Mr. COWAN. I wish to state distinctly to the honorable Senator from Michigan that my theory is as simple—

Mr. HOWARD. I do not wish to be interrupted by a statement of the gentleman's theory. He has stated it so often on this floor that I think I tolerably well understand it myself.

Mr. COWAN. I hope the honorable Senator will allow me. I want to make that statement just here as he is addressing his argument to me.

Mr. HOWARD. I am willing to allow almost anything; but I will not be interrupted to expose the Senate to the infliction of an essay—

Mr. COWAN. Of course I will not persist; but if the gentleman will not allow me to put the question here, I will put it at a time when he cannot avoid it.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator will pardon me for saying that although my refusal in this case may not be entirely agreeable to him, it cannot be beyond his recollection that he, on some occasions heretofore, has shown a little intolerance of interruption.

When I was interrupted I was reading the dying speech of Mr. Lincoln. I must go back to it. He says:

"In the annual message of December, 1863, and accompanying proclamation, I presented a plan of reconstruction, (as the phrase goes,) which I promised, if adopted by any State, should be acceptable to and sustained by the executive government of the nation. I distinctly stated that this was not the only plan which might possibly be acceptable; and I also distinctly protested that the Executive claimed no right."

Hearken to his language—

"that the Executive claimed no right to say when or whether members should be admitted to seats in Congress from such States. This plan was, in advance, submitted to the then Cabinet, and distinctly approved by every member of it. One of them suggested that I should then, and in that connection, apply the emancipation proclamation to the theretofore excepted parts of Virginia and Louisiana; that I should drop the suggestion about apprenticeship for freed people, and that I should omit the protest against my own power in regard to the admission of members of Congress."

Will the Senator from Pennsylvania have the goodness to listen to this language?

Such was the peculiar caution, on this mighty subject, of Abraham Lincoln. He disclaimed in the most distinct and emphatic terms both in his proclamation of the 8th of December, 1863, and in what is called his dying speech, made only a few days before his death, all authority in himself to impart to the States he was attempting to reconstruct any constitutional right to elect members of Congress, whether Senators or Representatives, in such a way as to give them a legal title to be admitted to seats. That is what he means and exactly what he means—nothing more, nothing less. That is by no means the doctrine of the present day. The claim now is that the right to elect, and consequently the legal right to have the party elected, if possessing the requisite personal qualifications, admitted to his seat in either House, has been imparted by the President's authority and under his commission, and that Congress are concluded and debarred any inquiry into the right claimed.

Again, sir, Mr. Lincoln did not confine himself to the peculiar mode of reconstruction mentioned in that proclamation. Early in July following, as the world knows, Congress with great unanimity passed a bill for the reestablishment of the rebel States, commonly known as the "Winter Davis bill," a bill which President Lincoln did not see fit to approve; but for his omission to approve it he gives, in the proclamation he issued on the 8th of July, 1864, the following reason:

"Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do proclaim, declare, and make known, that while I am, (as I was in December last, when by proclamation I propounded a plan for restoration,) unprepared, by a formal approval of this bill, to be inflexibly committed to any single plan of restoration; and while I am also unprepared to declare that the free State constitutions and governments already adopted and installed in Arkansas and Louisiana shall be set aside and held for naught, thereby repelling and discouraging the loyal citizens who have set up the same as to further effort, or to declare a constitutional competency in Congress to abolish slavery in States, but am at the same time sincerely hoping and expecting that a constitutional amendment abolishing slavery throughout the nation may be adopted, nevertheless I am fully satisfied with the system for restoration contained in the bill as one very proper plan for the loyal people of any State choosing to adopt it, and that I am, and at all times shall be, prepared to give the executive aid and assistance to any such people, so soon as the military resistance to the United States shall have been suppressed in any such State, and the people thereof shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and the laws of the United States, in which cases military governors will be appointed, with directions to proceed according to the bill."

Here it is apparent that Mr. Lincoln was not willing to be bound down even to his own plan as sketched in his proclamation of the 8th of December, 1863, but that he was entirely satisfied with the bill he had omitted to approve; and he solemnly promised, in his proclamation of July, 1864, that whenever military resistance should cease in any of the rebel States, and the people in those States were willing to return to their loyalty, he would give them his executive aid by appointing a provisional governor and giving governors the authority granted by the bill. Here were his two schemes, both of them liberal, and the last had the bill been approved, free from all constitutional objections.

Now, sir, let Mr. Lincoln be no longer quoted here or elsewhere as being the author of this enormous policy by which the whole power of Congress over the subject of reconstruction is to be absorbed into the single hand of the Executive. Do not desecrate the name of that great and good man by imputing to him such a gross attempt to usurp the powers of Congress.

Mr. President, the honorable Secretary of State, in the prepared speech delivered by him at the Cooper Institute, in New York, on the 22d of February, simultaneously with the delivery of President Johnson's speech, to which I have alluded, speaking of the restoration of the rebel States, uses the following very strange language:

"Now, I am sure this plan is going to succeed."

That is, the plan of President Johnson; the plan of immediate, unconditional readmission into Congress.

"I am sure of it, because some plan must succeed."

He is perfectly sure that a particular plan is going to succeed, because he is sure some plan must succeed. When I was a school-boy, attending to my logic, had I uttered such a sentence, I think the professor would have told me it was a non sequitur. But let us proceed. The Secretary continues:

"And because this is the only plan which has ever been attempted, or which I think ever will be attempted."

The only plan! Had the honorable Secretary forgotten the plan of Mr. Lincoln, as different in principle from that of Mr. Johnson as light from darkness? He says:

"Certainly it is the only one that can be attempted with success."

Sir, we will try that issue. I make no boast; I throw out no menace and no defiance; but I say with confidence here to the friends of this policy that I will try that issue before the country. I know of nothing in it which should deter an honest man from espousing the negative; and I tell you, sir, that when this issue is fully and fairly presented to the people of the United States, when they come to understand what it is in its length and in its breadth, in its designs, in its purposes, in its enormous dangers, in its injustice, in its cruelties, and in all its deformities, you need not doubt that that honest and loyal and gallant people who have done so much to preserve the Government, to maintain its dignity and its honor, will utter a lasting and an indelible rebuke to the policy so confidently and so boastfully advocated by the Secretary of State. He says further:

"It is nearly executed already. The States are there—"

Hearken to this—

"The States are there, just as fully in the exercise of their State functions and powers and faculties as the State of New York is, at Albany, to-day."

What is the logical consequence of this? If the eleven rebel States are at the present time as legitimately and constitutionally in the exercise of their proper functions, and as much entitled to be represented in the two Houses of Congress as is the State of New York, and if Congress are wantonly and wickedly refusing to allow them the same privilege of representation here as is enjoyed by the State of New York, what is the consequence? What is the logical result of this position, or rather assumption, of the Secretary of State, that they are as perfectly rehabilitated, that they are as perfectly in the enjoyment of their State rights as is the State of New York?

Sir, I would not impute to the Secretary of State any unlawful intention; I do not; but I cannot read this language and fail to see that it at least squints at the possibility of an armed interference at some future day and the establishment by means of the executive sword of these reconstructed States regularly in Congress, with the full quota of Senators and Representatives. If they are constitutionally entitled to this representation, as much so as New York, it is wholly unconstitutional for us to keep them out, and clearly our sworn duty to let them in.

In short, according to the Secretary of State, the conduct of Congress upon this subject is usurpatory, tyrannical, revolutionary, and even treasonable. There is but one step between such a position and advising the employment of military force to carry out its purposes. He says:

"Representatives can come up and lay their hands upon the Bible and take the oath, and remain there."

Now, I think this is going to be done. It may not be done to-day. I thought it ought to be done on the first day of this session of Congress. Others thought it better to wait and inquire—take a recess. Then I thought it had better be done when the recess was ended. Others thought it had better be postponed, to the 1st of February. Now they are talking of postponing it until they can pass some law."

It is quite apparent that the Secretary deems no law necessary to the reintroduction of the Senators and Representatives of the rebel States into these Halls; he seems to have ignored entirely the effects of the war upon the rebel States and the legislation of Congress, and looks upon them as just as much entitled at this day to be readmitted here as the State of New York is entitled to enjoy the benefits of her present representation here. This readmission, he says, is all that remains to be done:

"And it is the same plan that Abraham Lincoln projected before he was removed from his high trust, the same one that Andrew Johnson was executing for him in Tennessee. It will be done."

"Then, as the Union is to be restored some time there is to be some plan which is practicable, and if there is some one, then some one who is in favor of it can tell me what that plan is and when it is likely to be adopted. I pause for a reply. I have never seen any other plan proposed. I have seen this plan suggested at two successive Congresses, that, notwithstanding the conditions of the States, they should be legislated into the condition of Territories, and should be governed by the military arm till they had performed sufficient acts of purgation, and should be brought in at some far-off period."

I read from the speech chiefly to show what the real doctrine is, known as "my policy;" that it is a claim on the part of the Executive that he in his decrees has reestablished these States and put them in possession of all their functions as States, without the assistance and without the sanction of Congress, and that therefore they are entitled to be represented now; and that for Congress to wait any longer, to keep them out by any statute or any measure it may see fit to resort to, is doing a great wrong to the insurrectionary States. Sir, we are doing no wrong to the insurrectionary States. I concur with the honorable Secretary of State when he says the time will come when they will be readmitted to the Union with all their rights and privileges, with their full complement of Senators and Representatives; but I do not hold that it is the duty of Congress to admit them now and immediately. I think we ought to take time to consider, that we ought to look especially to the condition of the southern people, and ascertain to our own satisfaction whether they are in such a social and political condition as to make it safe and secure for us to readmit them.

Sir, I reject, as entirely untenable, the principle, if it can be called a principle, that whenever a disloyal State sends to Congress a loyal representative that loyal representative ought to be admitted to his seat if he has been regularly elected. Upon this point a great deal has been said both in Congress and out of Congress. We are told that if they send here loyal Senators, our duty is to admit them; if they send here loyal Representatives, the duty of the House is to admit their Representatives. Sir, I deny it. That assertion is in direct inconsistency with the essential principle of republican government. What is a representative who is sent to the Congress expected to do? What is his leading characteristic? Is he not expected to represent the interests and the feelings of the constituency who send him? Certainly. Who expects that a particular constituency will elect a man to Congress and send him here as their representative, whose principles are utterly at war with theirs, or whose interests or principles or prejudices are inconsistent with theirs? And yet the honorable Senator from Connecticut holds, I believe, that we ought to admit the loyal representatives without the slightest reference to the character of the constituency whom they represent. Sir, that is a great fallacy.

Mr. DIXON. If the Senator had taken the trouble to listen to what I said, or to read it afterward, he would have seen that I expressly stated that the constituency should be loyal as well as the representative.

Mr. HOWARD. Perhaps I mistake the Senator's views; but certain it is that the principle has been repeatedly advocated on this floor.

Mr. DIXON. The President said the same thing in the message from which the Senator has just read. The Senator will certainly find it in one of his messages.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish the Senator would look it up for me. I have not been so fortunate as to discover it. Mr. President, it is the character of the constituency that is to be represented in Congress by the person elected, and not that of the mere representative himself. He is but their servant and agent.

Mr. DIXON. If the Senator will allow me, I can repeat from recollection what the President says. The President says that each State ought to be represented when they present themselves, not only in an attitude of loyalty and harmony, but also in the persons of representatives whose loyalty cannot be questioned under any legal or constitutional test. That is his language.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall feel better satisfied when I read the exact language of the President, a little more secure as to what Mr. Johnson actually means. But, sir, the idea of allowing a representative who swears that he is loyal to come to Congress and take his seat, for no other reason than that he swears he is loyal, while at the same time the fact is his whole constituency is disloyal, unfriendly to the Government, and indisposed to uphold it, is to me a most inexpressible absurdity. It is the character of the constituency, and the constituency alone, that is to be looked to. Only a few months ago every one of these several southern constituencies was in open rebellion against the Government. There was not a single congressional district throughout the rebellious States that did not have within its limits a large majority, and the whole community had been declared public enemies by Congress. I was very glad the other day to hear the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, who a year or so ago had spoken so eloquently here in favor of dealing gently with our southern brethren, who told us over and over and over again that the Union element was large and strong and powerful throughout the South, and that, in order to bring the war to a successful and speedy close, our best policy was to cultivate and befriend that portion of the rebel community—I was glad to hear him, the other day, acknowledge that those Union men, once so precious and so numerous, were but rari nantes in gurgite vasto; that they were few and far between, swimming, I suppose, almost out of sight of each other in the vast and stormy gulf of the rebellion.

Well, sir, such is the fact. It is a fact, and it has been recognized for four years past—a fact recognized by the laws of the United States and by the decision of the Supreme Court—that practically the whole southern people were hostile to the United States, hostile to this Government, anxious to overthrow it, determined to overthrow it, making sacrifices beyond those ever submitted to by any other portion of the human family to overthrow, not a bad, oppressive Government, but a Government which had never been felt by them except in the benefits it conferred upon them. How vain, how idle is it to pretend that within only a few months from the close of these bloody scenes it has transpired that a large majority or any majority or any considerable portion of the people of those States have become loyal and friendly to the Government, willing to go on and act the part of good citizens in upholding it and carrying out its purposes. I have been in the way of obtaining some information on the subject, which it may not be useless to lay before the Senate. I ask leave to read, for the purpose of showing what is the actual condition of the rebel population in the South, especially in Virginia, an extract from the testimony taken before the reconstruction committee of Hon. John M. Botts. The following question was put to him:

"What is the feeling of the ex-rebels in Virginia generally toward the Government of the United States?"

He answered:

"At the time of the surrender of General Lee's army and the restoration of peace, I think there was not only a general but an almost universal acquiescence and congratulation among the people that the war had terminated, and a large majority of them were at least contented, if not gratified, that it had terminated by a restoration of the State to the Union. At that time the leaders, too, seemed to have been entirely subdued. They had become satisfied that Mr. Lincoln was a noble, kind-hearted, generous man, from whom they had little to fear; but when he was assassinated, and Mr. Johnson took his place, they remembered Mr. Johnson's declarations in the Senate of the United States before the war, his own treatment during the war by the secession party, and his declarations after he came to Washington as the Vice President of the United States, in one or more speeches, but especially in a speech in which he declared that treason was a crime which must be punished, they felt exceedingly apprehensive for the security of their property, as well as for the security of their lives; and a more humble, unpretending set of gentlemen I never saw than they were at that time. But from the time that Mr. Johnson commenced his indiscriminate system of pardoning all who made application, and from impositions which I have no doubt were practiced upon Mr. Johnson in pardoning the worst class of secessionists among the first, they became bold, insolent, and defiant; and this was increased to a very large extent by the permission which was immediately after the evacuation of Richmond given by General Patrick, the Democratic copperhead provost marshal of the army of the Potomac, to the original conductors of the public press before the rebellion to reestablish their papers, I believe without restriction or limitation upon any of the proprietors; since which time I think the spirit of disloyalty and disaffection has gone on increasing day by day and hour by hour, until among the leaders generally there is as much disaffection and disloyalty as there was at any time during the war, and a hundredfold more than there was immediately after the evacuation and the surrender of the army. This is the conclusion to which my mind has been brought by the licentiousness of the press and by communications which are made to me from all parts of the State, either verbally or by letter, from the most prominent and reliable Union sources."

And such is the concurrent testimony of a great majority of all the numerous witnesses examined before that committee; the great weight of proof is, that instead of producing quietude, peace, and contentment in the insurrectionary districts, the policy of Mr. Johnson in extending pardons and amnesty almost indiscriminately has had the effect to make the rebels and their friends more defiant and more contemptuous toward the Government.

Mr. President, I have stated that the business of reconstructing the States belongs exclusively to Congress, and not to the Executive; that that is a thing to be done by the exercise of the law-making power only. The President of the United States cannot make laws. He has no power of legislation whatever under the Constitution. On the other hand, the Constitution itself, in its first article, declares emphatically that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives;" leaving no residuum of legislative power to be exercised by any other functionary of the Government, but giving the whole of it, without stint and in the broadest terms, to the two Houses of Congress. Now, I ask, what power has the President by an imperial decree to reconstitute, reconstruct, or rehabilitate, or recreate a State of this Union which for four long years had forfeited its political existence as a State by turning its arms as a community against the United States? What had become of these State powers during these four years of war? Mr. Johnson seems to hold that these States were never out of the Union, but always in the Union.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question just there?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the doctrine for which he now contends be true, I wish to ask the honorable Senator this question: after Tennessee had assumed to secede, and after Virginia assumed to secede, if they were out of the Union and not entitled to representation upon this floor, why did he, as a Senator, countenance the presence of the present President of the United States as a Senator on this floor from Tennessee and the Senators from Virginia as representing a State?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, when I first took my seat in this honorable body I found the two Senators from Virginia here already, but I am frank to say, in reply to the question of the honorable Senator from Delaware, that if the question had been put to me, as a Senator, after the secession of Virginia from the Union, or rather after she had taken up arms as a government against the Government of the United States, whether I would admit Senators elected by that State, no matter when, to come into the Congress I should have answered "No."

Mr. SAULSBURY. One other question: was not the honorable Senator a member of this body when my friend on my left [Mr. WILLEY] was admitted to a seat on this floor, and when the late Senator from Virginia, since deceased, was admitted to a seat on this floor, both occurring since the war commenced?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not remember whether I was a member of the body at that time or not.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I refer to Hon. Mr. Bowden.

Mr. HOWARD. I know the precedent had already been fixed by the action of the Senate before I took my seat here. The Senators from Virginia were in their seats, and I think there was a change afterward; but the question never was raised as to the propriety of recognizing the Senators from Virginia. It will be remembered, however, that the government of old Virginia has ever been recognized by the action of Congress. Although, as one of the results of the insurrection in that State, their civil government had become dissolved and destroyed, still there was a government, a government for the whole of Virginia, organized and in activity in western Virginia; and that government was recognized by the Congress as being the legitimate government of the State. I did not feel disposed to disturb the action of Congress on that subject. But I beg to put the question to the honorable Senator whether he objected to it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir; I did.

Mr. HOWARD. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. One other question. The honorable Senator says that the General Government recognized the Legislature which sat at Wheeling as the Legislature of the whole of Virginia. Now, I wish to ask the Senator whether Virginia as a State, as a whole state, before its division into East and West Virginia, had not assumed to secede from the Union, and whether the military power of Virginia was not in possession of a great part of what is now West Virginia.

Mr. HOWARD. I believe the mere historical fact was this: upon the passage of the ordinance of secession, in April, 1861, by the Virginia convention, a new government for the State of Virginia was organized in West Virginia. It was recognized as the government of that State by Congress, and we have ever since recognized that government as the government of Virginia, and recognize it to this day. I believe there has been no interregnum whatever.

Mr. President, I was speaking of the condition of the rebel States during the war. It is often said that it is impossible for a State to get out or to be out of the Union; that these rebel States have always been in the Union; that they have tried to get out of the Union, but cannot get out of the Union; that that has turned out to be physically impossible; and the result, in the minds of some, is that they have always been in the Union and of the Union; that none of their faculties have been lost or impaired by the rebellion, and that on the cessation of the rebellion they are entitled to all the rights and privileges they ever possessed as members of the Union. Now, sir, what was the actual condition of the rebel States during the war is rather a barren question; but I have ever been of the opinion that the rebel States were actually out of the Union from the time they took up arms against the Government down to the time when their armies were surrendered or disbanded.

Mr. COWAN. What was the war for, then?

Mr. HOWARD. I will tell you what the war was for. There is no doubt about this fact, that there was a universal condition of armed hostility on the part of the seceding States against the Government. That is admitted. There is no doubt about the further fact that for four years and more the Government was engaged in armed hostility against these seceding States. I am not going into the question as to what is the foundation of all government, but I say to Senators, and especially to the Senator from Pennsylvania, that in contests between political communities I know of no law higher than physical force. Does he? Will he answer?

Mr. COWAN. I shall be glad to answer at some length, hereafter; but I will give the honorable Senator enough to start on now to carry him through. The several States of the Union are, in my judgment, political communities—

Mr. HOWARD. I beg leave to restate the question in order to avoid wandering.

Mr. COWAN. Then the gentleman does not want an answer.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir; I want an answer. The question which I put to the honorable Senator is this: do you know of any higher law than that of physical force between contending political communities?

Mr. COWAN. I have only to reply that the question in itself is nonsense; there is no sense about it; and nobody could answer it directly as a question supposed to contain a sensible proposition. I know what the gentleman means by the question, and I will answer him at the proper time, or now if he desires it; but I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. HOWARD. I am drawing my remarks to a close. I supposed the honorable Senator would treat my query very much in that way.

Mr. COWAN. If the Senator will allow me I will put it in shape and answer it.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, for four years the contest between these two parties was that of force. For seven years the contest between the colonies and the mother country was a contest of force. The Declaration of Independence was just as unconstitutional an act, when construed in the light of British law, as was any of the ordinances of secession; and still the law which finally gave sanction and enduring solemnity and importance and effect to that immortal Declaration was the law of force; and the civilized world has recognized the independence of the United States as a nation from and after the 4th of July, 1776, although the contest between the parties endured for seven years after that date. Had the same results accrued in the contest between the United States and the seceded States, the Senator from Pennsylvania will not deny that the independence of each of those States would have been recognized as having taken effect from and after the date of the ordinances of secession. For four years these States, in one form or another, either separately or combined, prosecuted a war against the United States for the purpose of upholding their ordinances of secession.

Now, I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, in case they had been successful, would the ordinances of secession have been void? No, sir; they would have been valid, upheld and established by this highest law between contending communities, physical force. So far as communities are concerned, so far as nations are concerned which are at war with each other, the question whether the war is right or wrong is entirely immaterial; and in our case the only question of any importance is, what was the actual condition of the rebel States during the war? Why, sir, they were as independent of the Government of the United States as is the Government of Mexico. We reconquered them, to be sure; but the States which we brought back into the Union, if we did bring back any States as such, were by no means such States as existed before the war. They were different. They were entitled to no other appellation than that of conquered country.

Yes, sir, we have a right to proclaim that they are conquered, as much conquered as ever Gaul or Germany was conquered by the Roman arms; as much conquered as Canada was conquered by the British forces during the Seven Years' war; as much conquered as was the British Government upon this continent in the triumph of our arms—conquered, subjugated. They lay at our feet. They had no legislatures of their own. There was no legislative authority whatever which we either recognized or were bound to recognize as the conqueror. There was no other will that could prevail, or that ought to prevail in the conquered territory but the will of the United States in Congress assembled—the will of the conqueror. It was for us, and for us alone, sitting in the two Houses of Congress to give the law to the conquered, not by any means the væ victis, not a law of vengeance, destruction, or desolation, but a law which should carry out the just purposes and wishes of the American people in regard to the rebel States; a law which in the end should restore them to their original condition and functions as States of the Union; and no Union man here or elsewhere has ever, so far as I know, contemplated anything else but that, ultimately, and within a reasonable time, and in a secure manner, these conquered States shall be brought back into the Union. It is necessarily the work of law, and law arising under the Constitution itself.

It is said that these States have the right of coming back to Congress. I grant it. They have a right to return to their allegiance and to be represented in the two Houses of Congress; but that right does not accrue, and cannot accrue, until the conqueror—the Congress of the United States—has seen that it is consistent with their interests, with the interests of their people, the interest of the whole people of the United States. We hold them to-day not by their own will, not by their willing fealty to the Government, not in virtue of their fidelity to the Constitution; but solely, in my judgment, even to-day, by virtue of this highest law known to communities—physical force. What keeps your provisional governors in their seats to-day? The Federal bayonet. What preserves even old Virginia to-day from a renewal of insurrection? What to-day hinders another conspiracy, the calling together of another southern congress, the election of another southern president, and a general secession of all these States? Is it the friendliness of the rebel communities toward the Government? Is it their love of the Union of the United States and the Constitution? Is it because they respect us? No, sir. If they had the power to-day, and were not resisted or prevented by the bayonet, I tell you that before forty-eight hours you would see combinations, conspiracies, legislative assemblies and conventions assembling together, and you would see these southern people again asserting the right of secession, again setting up for State independence, for independence as a southern confederacy, a new nation upon the face of the earth; and, in my opinion, that is to-day the great object they most cherish at their hearts.

Sir, they look upon themselves as a separate nation; their people cherish a love for a separate nationality; and the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania and the honorable Senator from Connecticut, if they have read as attentively as I have—and I have no doubt they have—ought to be just as well convinced that such would be the result as I am. Sir, it is the bayonet, to-day, that preserves the authority of the Government in the rebel States. Remove your military pressure, take away your Freedmen's Bureau, take away the small fragments of troops that now remain in the southern States and elect as President of the United States a man who does not believe in State coercion—elect another James Buchanan, and you will have, the moment he has entered upon his office, another general secession. Mr. President, for one, I desire to guard against such a contingency, I desire to take security from the conquered; I desire to impose on them some reasonable conditions that shall save me and my posterity, my constituents and my countrymen forever against the recurrence of the evils through which we have just passed; and I say that this great duty, a duty almost too mighty and too weighty for the best wisdom of both Houses of Congress, still pertains to the councils whom the people have constituted in these Halls, not to the President.

Sir, in the month of February, 1865, while Hon. Mr. Collamer occupied the floor, he made use of language so forcible and so clear, upon the power of Congress over the rebel States, that I must again trespass upon the Senate by reading an extract. That gentleman had reflected long, carefully, and profoundly upon this whole subject. We all know the constitution of his mind, its remarkable strength and elasticity, the clearness of his conceptions, and the accuracy of his judgment. He gives us this as the result of his reflections. He says:

"Sir, are there not two sides and two parties to this war? It is the strangest war men ever heard of if it has but one side to it. I take it there are two parties to this war: the several States who have made it on the one side, and the national Government against whom they made it on the other; and I suppose the two parties must participate in the restoration of peace and quietness, and their restoration to their former condition, or a condition where they can perform their functions within the Government, as integral parts of the Union. It is for Congress to say men that state of things exist. Congress is not bound to receive their members or to treat them as being regular, loyal, integral members of this Union because they have succeeded fighting and succeeded military operations, until we have seen a return to loyalty and an obedience to their allegiance and the performance of their fealty, the true restoration of themselves to their former condition of loyalty and obedience; and that must be for Congress to decide."

If this is true, what authority has the President of the United States to decide that momentous question as to the fitness of the population of a rebel State to be reconstructed into a State, and to be represented in Congress? Can he judge of the fitness of those constituencies? Where in the Constitution does he find a warrant for passing such a judgment? Again, Mr. Collamer says:

"Sir, when will, and when ought, Congress to admit these States as being in their normal condition? When they see that they furnish evidence of it."

That is all that Congress is seeking to do now, to obtain the evidence of their fitness for restoration.

"It is not enough that they stop their hostility and are repentant. They should present meet fruits for repentance. They should furnish to us by their actions some evidence that the condition of loyalty and obedience is their true condition again, and Congress must pass upon it; otherwise we have no securities. It is not enough that they lay down their arms. Our courts should be established, our taxes should be gathered, our duties should be collected in those States," &c.

Again:

"The great essential thing now to insist upon, in my judgment, is that Congress shall do nothing which can in any way create a doubt about our power over the subject."

Weighty words, indeed, sir—that Congress should do nothing, even at that time, when the war was raging, calculated to create any doubt about the power of Congress over this whole subject.

"Indeed, it is right to assert at the proper time that we have that power; and how and when and in what manner we shall execute that power is in the discretion of Congress. I do not mean to occupy very much time with that; but one thing I have to say: I believe that when reestablishing the condition of peace with that people, Congress, representing the United States, has power in ending this war as any other war, to get some security for the future. It would be a strange thing if it were not true that this nation, in ending a civil as well as a foreign war, could close it and make peace by securing, if not indemnity for the past, at least some security for future peace. I do not believe that Congress is stripped of that power in relation to this or any other war; and here I do not wish to be understood as undertaking to assert the existence of such a power without some warrant in the Constitution."

And then he proceeds very learnedly and conclusively to show whence he derives the power. Now, Mr. President, as I have stated before, the great issue is, shall Congress decide the question of the right of the rebel States to readmission into this Union as they once were, or shall we tamely permit the President of the United States, without law, without our consent, to take in his own hands this vast mass of legislative power which must necessarily be employed in their full reconstruction? C'est le premier pas qui coute—it is the first step always, that cost, in error.

If we wink at this assumption on the part of the President, good and patriotic man though he be—and I am not disposed to question his patriotism—it will be but setting a precedent for the future, and it is impossible to foresee to what extravagant extent these executive pretensions may be carried. Sir, upon a question so momentous, involving the safety and prosperity for all time of the whole United States, is it not, I ask gentlemen, becoming at least that Congress should maintain a firm, manly, and resolute stand? Call us what you may, Radicals, Black Republicans, Revolutionists, or what not; on this subject we occupy the very breach itself; we occupy the passage-way; we stand as did the three hundred Spartans when their country was invaded by the countless hordes of Persia. For one I propose to occupy this position so long as life shall last, or so long at least as I have the honor of a seat on this floor; and if I shall perish in the feeble resistance which I may be able to make to these executive pretensions; if the Constitution is to be swept away by fervor or fury, and we stripped of the just powers which the people have intrusted to us, I hope that there will be at least one of this Spartan band to survive the destruction, and who may be able to erect, as did the commonwealth of Lacedæmon upon the heights overlooking that famous pass where the three hundred fell, a monument to their courage and patriotism, inscribed with these words of eternal force and duration: "Go, traveler, tell to Lacedæmon that we died here in obedience to her sacred laws." I ask for no prouder monument.

And if there be any persons here or elsewhere who expect to drive me, as a humble member of this body, from the position I have taken; if there be a deluded class, either here or elsewhere, who expect to intimidate Congress, or who aim to intimidate Congress into a compliance with these executive edicts; if we are to have a coup d'état, as has been recommended to the President by more than one of the leading journals of the country published in his interest; if we are to have that policy carried out which has been more than once recommended by a newspaper in this city which is supposed to speak his sentiments and by his authority; if Congress is to be expelled by the point of the bayonet, and rebel Senators and rebel Representatives thrust into these Halls in despite of our votes, I have this to say, not boasting of peculiar personal courage, come on! I ask no favors! The first hand of violence that shall be laid upon a member of this body or the other body will be a signal for such an uprising of the loyal northern masses as shall teach him, whoever he may be, who puts himself at the head of the movement, that the people of the United States have not forgotten they are still a free people, and that they are represented, and intend forever to be represented, by a free American Congress. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I think, in view of the danger which portends and which has been alluded to by the honorable Senator from Michigan, that this is a good time to be brave, and a good time to say stout things; and I am glad that he has availed himself of the opportunity. I am not so well pleased that he has claimed for himself the position of Leonidas and his Spartans in the pass of Thermopylæ, in his fight. There the three hundred stood against an invading horde of foreigners who sought their country. Where is the Senator standing now? Is he standing in the breach? Ay, sir, directly in the breach; but it is in that breach which the American people desire to heal. He stands in that chasm which they would bridge over. He stands in the mouth of that wound which they would close and cicatrize. That is his true position. He stands in the very breach which prevents the Union, the Union for which this war of which he has spoken was undertaken, and for which it was carried through in the manner in which it was carried through.

The Senator alleged that the southern States during the war were out of the Union, and he appealed to me as to whether they were not out of the Union. Admitting for the nonce his postulate, I put the question, what was the war for? That he promised to answer, but that was what he did not answer. It is the answer to that question for which the American people look from that honorable Senator and those with whom he acts. What was the war for? If the ordinances of secession, if the rebellion, if the war, if anything which occurred during that time took the eleven States in question out of the Union, what was the war for? The Union man answers, it was for the purpose of supporting and sustaining and restoring the Union; if they were out, it was to bring them back; if they were not out, it was to keep them in. Has not that been the understanding of the American people, with the exception, perhaps, of a few extremists? Sir, that was the unanimous opinion of the Congress of the United States in July, 1861. That was the almost unanimous, if not the unanimous expression of the opinion of the loyal States as to the object and purpose of the war. Was it false? Did that resolution assert a falsehood, or was it a truth? Did it assert the true intention of the people, or was it a cover for a design which they chose to conceal, and which is only developed now in the face of the people?

I say to the honorable Senator from Michigan that the war was for the Union; it was to save the Union; it was to restore it and to compel the submission of those who desired to dismember the Union to the laws and the Constitution of the country. The honorable Senator is a member of the star-chamber committee of fifteen; he is a member of that committee which carries at its girdle the keys of the Union; he was appointed to inquire into the temper of the southern people; he was appointed to inquire whether the people of those States were fit to be restored to their rights under the Union; and now I say, as I said the other day, if what he says is true, he indorses the Chicago platform. He has established himself upon the platform that the war was a failure; and he flings out broadly, into the faces of American soldiers and American citizens, that instead of restoring to the Union and to the country and to their rights under the Union the people of the South, the war was a failure; and here, in the open face of day, in the presence of the people, he says the southern people are a conquered people, and that we hold them, to use his own language, by the point of the bayonet.

Mr. President, is that so? I do not undertake to take issue with the gentleman upon the fact as to whether the condition of that people be what he represents it to be or not. It is enough for me to know that that is the ground upon which he plants himself here; and I am exceedingly glad that he has so manfully avowed it. The rebellion, then, was successful in that: it took the rebel States out of the Union; it took their people out, as a matter of course, loyal and disloyal, false and true, faithful and unfaithful; and since they have been out, and since the reconquest has been made, if you please to call it so, or since the conclusion of the war, they have remained dehors the Union, and are held as a conquered people. If that is true, say so. We will meet you in the pass of Thermopylæ or at Philippi, if you please.

Mr. HOWARD. We will meet you at both places.

Mr. COWAN. Very well; we will meet you in the physical and in the spiritual. I believe the meeting in one of those cases was physical and the other spiritual.

Now, sir, I might ask here, by what title, by what right, by what authority was the honorable Senator, or anybody else, clothed in this Government to make conquests of his fellow-citizens? Is it because he appeals to what he calls the highest law, the law of force? Does he propose to place himself upon that? He asked me, with an air of great triumph, if I knew of any higher law between contending communities than that of force. Sir, I know of no more stupid, brutal law than that of force. I know that it has to be resorted to, and I know that it is resorted to in the absence of reason, because it has obtained the name of the ultima ratio regum; or, in other words, when kings have no reason, they resort to force. Now, I was about to say, in answer to the Senator's question, but was prevented, that when communities contend, they may submit their differences to a test such as this, and then the Constitution and the laws are the highest law, and force has no place.

Mr. HOWARD. Then the use of force is unconstitutional?

Mr. COWAN. Not at all. It was perfectly constitutional and perfectly right with a just purpose in view, but perfectly unconstitutional, perfectly wrong, and without a single apology, if the end and aim and object was that which is avowed by the Senator from Michigan to-day. If the object was to compel the southern people—

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President—

Mr. COWAN. I beg the honorable Senator's pardon. I will give him a chance to say anything he pleases at the proper time.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the Senator will not misrepresent me, as he declines to yield the floor.

Mr. COWAN. If the purpose was to compel the southern people to fulfill their constitutional obligations, and to obey the laws of the Union, then we had a perfect right to do it. Our right was as perfect as that of the sheriff when he compels the felon to surrender to him, and based upon precisely the same ground. If, on the other hand, the war was for the purpose of conquering those people, holding them as our vassals, treating them as serfs and slaves, subject to the domination of one half of the Union, then, I say, it was an outrage upon all right, all authority, and had no warrant anywhere, either in the laws of God or the laws of man; and especially on the part of those who have descended from the signers of the Declaration of Independence, it would have been an atrocity. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) Order must be observed in the galleries.

Mr. COWAN. How did we justify ourselves in the first Revolution? What did we say to the mother country then and there? That every community, that every people had the right to choose their own form of government. I have heard the Declaration of Independence quoted here a thousand times over to establish absurdities which it never was intended to establish; but here is a great historical fact that no man dare deny; and that is, that the American Revolution was based upon the right of a people to govern themselves, and that nobody else had a right derived from heaven. If they had the right, whence did they derive it? From the gentleman's higher law of force? And then talk about standing in the pass of Thermopylæ, and talk about building monuments there!

"They fell devoted, but undying;
The very gale their names seemed sighing;
The waters murmured of their name;
The woods were peopled with their fame;
The silent pillar, lone and grey,
Claimed kindred with their sacred clay."

Why, sir, it is to desecrate that which has been sacred for three thousand years to allude to Thermopylæ in such a connection. What was the struggle of Leonidas? That Greece should govern Persia? No; it was to throw back the tide of the Persians, who insisted, according to this higher law of force, that the king of kings, Xerxes, had a right to govern Greece, had a right to hold its people as a conquered people and its provinces as conquered provinces.

Mr. President, let us look at this question coolly. I ask again, by what warrant did we make this war? Was it because, as the question was put to me the other day, there is such a thing as political dominancy, political sovereignty, by which one people have a right to dominate another people? Who will dare to avow it upon this floor? Our warrant was the Constitution and the laws. We said to the southern people: you bound yourselves, States and people, with us in that Constitution; you assisted in making those laws; and now you refuse to fulfill your obligations; now, you undertake to secede and withdraw yourselves from the operations of the very law that you assisted to make under that Constitution; you provided that the Executive of the nation should swear to support the Constitution; you provided that he should see that the laws were faithfully executed; you provided that those laws should be paramount, that they should be higher than all other laws within their particular constitutional circle; you did all that, and we claim the right to compel you to stand upon them. Sir, we did. We compelled the recusants, we compelled the rebels, we compelled the traitors, if you please, to lay down their arms and yield obedience—to the Senator from Michigan or anybody? Not at all, sir. It was not by any especial virtue of his or mine; it was not on account of any superiority that we might assume over the southern people that we claimed the right to compel their surrender. We did it in the name of the Constitution and standing under the shadow of the majesty of the law. They surrendered to the law.

Mr. HOWARD. They surrendered to our arms.

Mr. COWAN. They surrendered to the law. Your arms compelled them to surrender to the law, but they surrendered to the law. The honorable Senator is a lawyer, and a good one, I should say, in many of the departments of that profession; and impressed as he is, impregnated as he is all through with the very spirit of the law, the moment that surrender was made the honorable Senator would not have dared to lift his hand to the worst rebel of them all. He would not have been guilty of the impropriety of which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] was the other day, when he said that he would have hanged Jeff. Davis without law. The honorable Senator knows that the man who would do so, the man who would violate the sanctity of the law and take a criminal out of the grasp of the law and execute his individual vengeance upon him, would be a murderer in fact and a murderer in law. The law is supreme over the American people, and it is to the law that we bow. We owe no allegiance to Presidents or to Congresses or to anybody else as the sovereigns in this country, and thank God for it! I hope the day may never come when we, as citizens of this great and free Republic, shall be held to obedience to anything but the law. Do you want to be slaves? Do you want to wear the collar and the harness of a man superior over you? If you do you are unworthy sons of revolutionary sires. I yield me to the law, but I yield to no man and no body of men; and without desiring to boast at all, I will make my boast there; I will never submit to wearing the collar and the harness of any man. I am willing to pay my obeisance humbly to the law. I am willing to yield to its requirements, even when I believe it to be unconstitutional; but I will obey the law and never obey the behests of any single man or body of men unless they are enforced upon me and I cannot resist it.

The honorable Senator set out by trying to show that Mr. Lincoln's plan of reconstruction was not President Johnson's plan of reconstruction. That was his object. He proposed to set that question entirely at rest, and I can state to you in a very few words how nearly he came to it. President Johnson, in his last annual message, declared that it was for each House of Congress to determine for itself upon the admission of members of Congress from the rebellious States. That was his phrase; and that was all. Nobody pretends that President Johnson ever undertook to say that we should admit this man or that man or the other man, or that we should reject this one or the other one. Even the honorable Senator himself did not pretend it. What did he say? He gave a legal opinion in that respect. Was it a good opinion or was it a bad one? What does the Constitution provide in that case? Does the Constitution provide that this Senate shall determine who shall be members of the Senate and who shall not, or does it confer that power jointly upon the Senate and the House? It is very expressive on that subject. It is about as clear as it can be made. The Constitution confers the power upon each House separately. Then the Senator read Mr. Lincoln's opinion on that point, and Mr. Lincoln's phrase was the "respective Houses." What does that mean? Does that mean the Houses jointly or the Houses separately. I should not think it would require a very close or accurate criticism to determine that. There is the whole of it.

Now, Mr. President a very brief statement will set all this matter right. The States are corporations; they are legal persons, having no actual physical existence, but existing in contemplation of law for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of the trust, and the citizens of the several States are corporators; and in one of its aspects, and in this aspect, a State may be contemplated precisely as you contemplate a bank or a railroad or any other corporation. The officers of these corporations, the officers of rebel States, and a certain number of the corporators, if you please—I am not here disposed to quarrel as to the number or to dispute as to the number; that can be talked of hereafter—undertook to pervert the purpose of the corporation, undertook to carry the corporation bodily away from the original intent and purpose to which it was bound by the Constitution and the laws. What was the duty of the United States under these circumstances? Was it not their bounden duty to see that the citizens, the corporators, even if there were not more than a dozen of them faithful, should not be deprived of their franchise, and that this corporation should not be carried away without their will and consent? I say that if there was one man from the rebel States who came up and protested against this perversion of the State corporate authorities and being carried away by secession, the United States Government would have been bound to listen to him and to rescue him and restore him to his rights as guaranteed under the Constitution and the laws. Well, sir, that was the view the United States took of it. They took precisely the same view of it that a court of chancery takes of trusts. They were the custodian of the rights of the people, the general custodian; and they interfered that the trusts might be preserved; that the corporation might not be perverted from its original uses? What then? War resulted and the war was successful; resistance ceased. When that happened, there were two ways by which those corporations could be restored. Who could restore them? Gentlemen talk here about Congress restoring them; they talk about the President restoring them; they talk about anybody restoring them. I can say to gentlemen that in this country States are not made by Presidents, States are not made by Congress; State governments are not made by them. Neither the President nor Congress nor anybody else when this war was put down had a right to interfere in the restoration of the corporate rights of the citizens of the southern States. The question was to be referred to them. There were two ways of doing it. One was to allow the corporate officers to continue upon their profession of repentance and coming back within the purview of the original great charter.

Suppose, if you please, that Governor Brown, of Georgia, and the Legislature of Georgia, who had been in rebellion, professed repentance and acknowledged the Government of the Union and their obligations to the Constitution and laws just as before, what would you have done with them? You could do one of two things. You could say, "Very well, that is all right; you may go on just as you are, provided you obey the Constitution and the laws, subject, however, to our right to hang you; we have the right to hang you if we choose to enforce it, but that is a question we will not decide now; in the mean time we will hold it in abeyance over your head, and you can go on and play Governor and Legislature." That was one way, and the President had a perfect right to do that. Nobody could quarrel with him if he had chosen to take that course.

On the other hand, the President had the perfect right to say to these men, "You have been engaged in rebellion; you have been in complicity with treason and unfaithful to the trust committed to you by your people; you are set aside, your office is vacated." What then? What would a court say in such a case, and I address some who have been judges? The court then appoint somebody to support the trust until the corporators meet together and elect for themselves.

Mr. HOWE. Let me ask the Senator where the President gets the authority to set aside the Governors and Legislatures of States.

Mr. COWAN. I should think that a man who had the power to do a thing indirectly would have power to do it directly.

Mr. HOWE. I ask the question where the President gets that power.

Mr. COWAN. I will tell you where he gets it. He gets it as the supreme Executive of the nation. He gets it by virtue of the warrant which the American people gave him to go down there and to suppress the rebellion, and to take all that he found in armed resistance to it. Had he not that power?

Mr. HOWE. He had the power to suppress the armed forces engaged in the rebellion; but where did he get the power to depose the Governor and the Legislature of a State; and judges, and municipal officers?

Mr. COWAN. Precisely from the same source that the constable gets it, precisely from the same source that the sheriff gets it, or the marshal gets it. He gets it under and by virtue of the law. He had the right to drive these people from their places by virtue of that authority.

Mr. HOWE. Then a sheriff, I understand, would have the same right as the President.

Mr. COWAN. Instead of saying to the man, "You must go out of your office," the sheriff could do it by arresting him, and why? Because if the sheriff, who has limited power, allowed the man to go out from his control, he would not be very likely to take him easily again; but the President had all these people in his net, and they could not very readily get out of it.

Mr. HOWE. Well—

Mr. COWAN. I decline to yield further; I do not want any more interpolations. I think everybody will understand me when I get through, and if not, I do not know that I can make myself any plainer.

There is the source of the authority. I do not say that was a better plan than the other plan. I have no quarrel about that. It was within the option of the President to take either of these plans. He had a right to arrest these people; he had a right to allow them to go at large on their parole, or, in other words, he had a right to admit them to bail, if you please, in that behalf; and he had a right to establish officers there to support the trust until the corporators, the citizens of the States, could come back and resume their functions and elect new officers true and faithful to their trust.

Mr. Johnson chose the latter of these courses. Where was the necessity for quarreling with it? Where did the quarrel come from? The southern people did not complain of it. Nobody ever heard Governor Letcher, of Virginia, or Governor Brown, of Georgia, or any other southern man complain of it; but the complaint comes from our side. It comes from some of the people of the North who claim for themselves to be, par excellence, Union men. They are the men who quarrel with the action of the President in this behalf, and they quarreled with Mr. Lincoln from the very outstart upon the same principle. They passed a bill, which, I believe, authorized Mr. Lincoln to do what he was doing, or pretty nearly that, and he pocketed it. That was their support of Mr. Lincoln; and then, just in the thick of the election, in the very thick of the canvass, some of these excessive party men, some of these men who stand by the Union party at all hazards, as long as it has a big majority at its back, issued a protest charging Mr. Lincoln with being a usurper and a tyrant because he had pocketed this bill of theirs which they had passed, showing their plan by which the thing was to be done. I met a Dutchman in my State during that canvass, and he told me he had just been at a Republican convention, and he had heard one of these protestants make a speech, of course in favor of the Republican nominees. "Well," said I, "what did he say?" "Well," he said, "he was very hard on the President for about an hour, and then he got better." That was the kind of speech in which Mr. Lincoln was supported; the fore end of it, about an hour, was taken to abuse him for his usurpation and his tyranny in attempting to sustain and support these southern corporations for the benefit of their citizens; and then the last part of it was a little better, not so bad.

The honorable Senator from Michigan asks triumphantly, apparently—and indeed words seem to have so little meaning here that anything may be asked and nothing may be answered satisfactorily—where has the President power under the Constitution to confer political rights upon anybody? Nobody ever contended that the President conferred political rights upon any one; and I go further, and fling it back into the teeth of the advocates of this doctrine, that Congress cannot confer political rights upon anybody. What right has Congress to confer political rights upon the citizens of States? Thank God, the citizens of States hold their title by a higher one than Congress can confer. They derive their rights from the fact that they are States, free, independent States, bound only by their constitutional obligations. I have heard about as much balderdash here on the subject of State rights as I ever heard in my life; but have the States no rights? Is any man mad enough to pretend that States have lost all their rights because a few citizens claimed a right of secession, which never was a State right, and which, if it is a right, is a right to travel over a bargain you have made, and to break a law which you yourself assisted in the making of. The right of secession which has been claimed as a State right never was a State right; but the right to say who shall wield political power in a State is a State right. States have rights to make their own laws for the purpose of administering justice between their own citizens, and this General Government has no right to interfere in any way. States have their rights under the Constitution just as well as the General Government has rights over the States under the Constitution.

Then I say the President never pretended that he could confer political rights upon either the rebel States or the loyal States, or upon the people of one or the other; but what he did pretend to do was to stand over these people while they regained their lost rights, rights which they had lost in this war of rebellion; rights which had been in abeyance in that storm which swept over the country. He stood there the faithful guardian of the public weal, in order that they might come back and regain that which had been attempted to be taken from them.

Was that conferring political rights? What did the rebellion destroy? Did it destroy the States? Did it destroy the rights of the people as States? Did it repeal the Constitution? Did it repeal the laws? If it did not, then what did it do? If it had succeeded, as the gentleman says, it might have done all that; but it would have succeeded not in virtue of law but in spite of it. It would have succeeded as a revolution, not as a legal right of secession. Then the suppression of the rebellion, if we are honest, if we are true, if we intend to stand upon the ground upon which we started out, restored the statu quo ante bellum. That is all. It just brought everything to the place of divergence, to the point of departure. What has the President done? Attempted to bring it back there.

This Government has three departments, an executive, a legislative, and a judicial. These three departments are distinct and independent of each other; coordinate. The President, the Executive of this Government, acknowledges the relations of these States to the Union. The Supreme Court of the United States, the highest judicial tribunal of the land, the other day opened its dockets and recognized the relations of these States and their citizens to the Union. The third department, Congress, has refused. Why? Because the honorable Senator from Michigan and certain other honorable Senators say it is not safe to admit them. Although in the bitterest war that ever was waged, in the greatest conflict of arms that the modern world at least has witnessed, we have been their vanquishers, we have compelled them to submission; although we have a population three times as many as theirs, and a representation two or three times as great as theirs, it is not safe to admit them! Would it not have been much more prudent to have taken Democratic advice at the outstart, if that is so? The Democrats said, "Why make war? Do not make war; if you do you will embroil and you will embitter this contest so that it never will be safe to admit them." Why did we make war? Because we believed that? Not at all. We made the war because we believed that men were governed by common sense, that they were actuated by motives of common interest, and that it would be perfectly safe to admit them the moment the rebellion was put down. That is why we made the war, and that is why we avowed the purpose. But times have changed, the tables are turned. Now, that party which was foremost in making the war, foremost in declaring its purpose, is foremost to declare that the war was a failure and that this thing cannot be done, and avows here openly again upon the floor of the Senate, and by a member of that committee who has a right to know, who has taken the testimony and selected the witnesses, I have no doubt, to prove it, that that people are utterly unfit to be restored to their rights, and that it is utterly unsafe that they should come back into the Union. Now, sir, if that is true, that is the most formidable declaration of disunion that I have ever heard; and that establishes disunion as a fact. I think no man I know of is mad enough to suppose that you can maintain a Union at the point of the bayonet. The honorable Senator from Michigan does not pretend that that is union. That may be conquest, but it is not union.

He has adopted another very strange theory. He says that in the committee of fifteen it has been shown beyond all peradventure that the constituencies of these men are disloyal; whether the men themselves are loyal or disloyal, whether they be traitors or whether they be true, is of no consequence; their constituencies are inherently and essentially disloyal; and then, although he talks of non sequiturs, he turns around and triumphantly asks, what are they here in Congress for but to carry out the treasonable will of their constituents? If ever there was a non sequitur in the world, that is one. I care not whether my constituents be treasonable or not treasonable, I am no there to commit treason for them. No man is bound to yield to any such unlawful desire or further any such unlawful design of his constituents as that would involve.

The honorable Senator has spoken of the Secretary of State. Sir, I should think the patriotism of that man ought not to be impugned here. I think common decency, common respect for the character of a man whose history belongs to the world and to this age, who is known in both hemispheres, and sympathy even for the wounds that disfigure him, ought to entitle him at least in this Senate to a fair consideration, and that he should not be subjected here to misrepresentation and to the imputation of improper motives. It so happens that the honorable Secretary of State, whether wisely as the Senator from Michigan or unwisely according to the lights that he may have before him, holds that the President is right in this matter. Hon. William H. Seward, a name, I venture to say, as high and as proud as any that will grace the Valhalla of American heroes in the future, agrees with the President; and William H. Seward disagrees with the honorable Senator from Michigan.

And then Thermopylae is invoked, Leonidas and his Spartans are told into the pass, and the honorable Senator from Michigan is there in front of them! What for? To oppose Mr. Seward and Mr. Seward's perfect rehabilitation.

Mr. President, the American people are not going to be frightened out of their propriety about that. I think, and I believe it cannot be disputed, that if there is one voice in this land potential upon this question, potential for prudence, potential for moderation, potential for humanity generally, it is the voice of William H. Seward, and as many of your new recruits, as many of your new zealots as you can hatch out of the hot-bed of these turbulent times may come here and attempt to assail his motives and his designs, the American people, nevertheless, will remember him, and abide his counsel, or I am very much mistaken.

William H. Seward has given evidence, evidence such I may say as none of these modern zealots have given—he has given it as well as the President of the United States—that he is in favor of the country, and the whole country; that he is in favor of the freedom of the people, the whole people, not simply the freedom of the negro, but the freedom of the whole people; that he is in favor of giving to the American people their rights, and they can very readily believe that he will not adopt the conquering theory of the honorable Senator from Michigan. No man has ever heard him cry væ victis.

Mr. President, this theme is exhaustless; this subject has no limits, it can have none save in the Constitution and the laws. There is no reconstruction, there is no plan of reconstruction except that which is involved in obedience of the laws; and the man who supposes there is a hope of it is, in my judgment, still more mistaken than the man who now asserts that the Union is gone, and gone irreparably, from the hearts of the southern people. In either event this doctrine is disunion: in either event this doctrine shuts the door of hope.

Mr. President, I do not believe, I cannot believe, I will not believe now, standing over the graves of two or three hundred thousand American citizens fallen in the strife of the Union, that there can be no Union. What conceivable, what possible interest has any man to disseminate this doctrine among our people? Why is it that men go about from day to day trumpeting the unfitness of the southern people for a Union, and yet calling themselves Union men? Who has made the people of the North believe that this breach has been so widened, that this gulf is so impassable, that we never can be friends again with our southern brothers? Who is it that does it? Are they Union men, I ask? In the case of a quarrel between two men, what kind of a union friend would he be who would go from the one to the other and say, "He hates you, he hates you in the very innermost recesses of his heart," and then go to the other and say, "He would stab you behind if he had a chance?" Would that beto make union, reconciliation, between these parties? And who does this thing? It is not the President who does it. It is not Mr. Seward who does it. It is not the Army who does it. It is not the Navy who does it. Who does do it? I will tell you, Mr. President, it is a faction in power here, tasting the sweets of power, enjoying its exercise, and they tell you that these people are unfit to come in; and why? Because, come in as they may, there can be no reconciliation with them. That is disunion again. What was said the other day in the House which sits at the other end of this Capitol? "Without some measure like a reconstruction measure, when we come back again these Halls will be filled with yelling rebels and hissing copperheads." What then is to be done? Usurp, grasp power yourselves, remodel the Constitution, remodel the laws, so that the few, not the many, can hold on to power. We may just as well come to it first as last; that is exactly what it means. Are you afraid the Democrats will get the power? If you are, that is disunion. A man who is afraid of the other party coming in, and who believes that that other party will destroy the Government, is a disunion man, because he believes that which is fatal to the very foundation of the fabric. I do not believe it, and I never did believe it. Much as I might belong to one of the great parties of the country, I never believed that the other would destroy the Government if it came into power. I believed it would not, and that is why I was in favor of this Government. That is the difference between us and most other Governments. In a monarchical form of government the people are not trusted; one party will not trust the other, and they set up an intermediate man and attempt to scaffold him around in such a way as to prevent a collision. We formed this Government upon the basis that either of the great parties of the country was safe to intrust it with.

You say that if the Union is restored and you give the people of the South their rights they will come in and they will join the Democrats, and then the Democrats will have a majority over the Republicans. Suppose it be so; I am perfectly willing, if we save the Union. I will execute a release of all my right for office, not only to-day, but in all time to come, if anybody will just insure the Union peace and harmony. I trust everybody would. I think there is no man so infatuated, personally and apart from his party ties and party connections, but would be willing to do the same thing. I do not believe a word of it, and I tell you that if the southern States were represented here to-morrow and came back and joined themselves with the Democrats of the North, they would meet with just the same resistance precisely from them that they now meet from the Republicans if they should attempt any further secession; and why? Just because it is as much the interest of one party in the North as it is the interest of the other party to preserve the Union, and nobody but a man who is desirous of making mischief and desirous of fomenting discord would ever take any other view of it. They may have different plans and different policies, but the great end and object of both is to preserve the Government, and what is more and what is better, to preserve themselves and their fortunes and their families, and to preserve a prospect for their children.

I am a Republican; and I am a Republican because I believe that; and I would as soon undertake to commit personal suicide or any other kind of suicide as to go out and preach among my fellow-citizens that one half of them were utterly diabolical and utterly corrupt, and desirous of overturning the whole of this fair fabric of liberty under which we lived so long and so happily. What is it but a proclamation of political suicide? I do not believe a word of it; and however much I might lament the contingency of a party opposed to me getting into power, however much I might suppose it would affect in a small way the interests of my State or of my section, yet I am willing to bow to the behests of the people in that behalf. I await the action of their constitutional majority expressed through the constitutional forms; and the man who is unwilling to do that and unwilling to trust it is a secessionist, and belongs to precisely the same school of secession as that which flourished in 1860. That was secession. Had anybody invaded the rights of secessionists? Had anybody trenched upon the rights of the southern States? No; but the secessionists said, "Although you have elected your President by constitutional means and through the medium of a constitutional majority, yet we have a right to anticipate you." Anticipate what? Anticipate what the honorable Senator from Michigan anticipates and what every man who has no faith in the country and no faith in its institutions apprehends. "We anticipate," said they, "that your President will not be a constitutional President; that your party will not be a constitutional party. It has got the Abolitionists in it, and they have said that 'the Constitution is a covenant with death and a league with hell,' and they will abolitionize the whole country; they will destroy slavery; they will do this, that, and the other thing;" and what then? "We will get out before they come." That was secession. They would not trust the Republican party; that was it.

Now, we are told you cannot trust the Democratic party; you cannot trust either of the parties with the southern fraction of the Union in its place in the legislative Halls of the country. What are we going to do? Instead of standing upon the Constitution and the laws, for which we made the war, and standing there honestly, as brave men should, we have now a scheme to make a new Constitution and new laws. Is not this the same thing precisely that the secessionists said in the winter of 1861? Did they not say we must have new constitutions, we must have new laws, we must have the Constitution amended here, and the Constitution amended there? Why? Because they apprehended difficulties. Now, in the process of time, in the revolutions of the wheel of fortune, the very extreme northern radical party find themselves in the position of the secessionists, distrusting the Constitution, distrusting the law, distrusting the people, apprehending some difficulty; and that is to be mended by new constitutions and new laws and new guarantees. That is the word, I believe. That is a very fashionable word now.

Mr. President, how absurd is all this. Suppose that we pass these bills requiring new guarantees and imposing new conditions. Of course, as they do not now exist in the Constitution and in the laws, they are to be proposed to the southern States for their acceptance, and if you make a proposal to any one for his acceptance, in that is involved the right that he has to refuse, if he chooses. I put it to honorable Senators, suppose to-day you make your proposal to South Carolina to accept your new Constitution and your new series of laws, and suppose she refuses. What then? What are you going to do? Suppose the whole eleven refuse; what then? How are you going to make them do it? I agree, if they will all take up guns and attempt to shoot you, you might take up a whole parcel of guns and shoot a great many of them, and compel them to lay down their guns; but you cannot make them accept your proposition. Then, if you cannot compel it except by war, and you cannot compel it by war, unless they make war by way of resistance, what are you going to do? Just nothing. Then you have your trouble for your pains, and you will enjoy the delightful satisfaction of being backed down and backed out by those whom you proclaim to be conquered people, and whom you proclaim, upon the floor of the Senate, you hold by the point of the bayonet.

Sir, self-respect for this Government, self-respect for the American people, self-respect for our institutions and laws all forbid it. We have no terms to offer, we ought to have no proposals to make, except this: obey the Constitution and the laws. That we can compel them to do, but you cannot compel them to adopt new propositions and give new guarantees; and I should say that we have no right to do it, unless this Government is to be entirely changed in its nature, in the nature of its machinery, and in the rights which are to be conferred upon it; and if it is, in God's name, why not let us know it? If there is to be no such thing as State rights, if this is to be a consolidated Government, an actual de facto Government, administering the laws and justice among the people as the State governments now administer them, why not bring in that proposition and let us see it, let us meet it? If, however, it is to be such a Government as the one we have been proud of so long, let us preserve it; and instead of trying to patch it and mend it and change it and pervert it for a mere temporary political purpose, let us all stand by it proudly and strongly, and hand it down to our children with the same injunction with which we received it from our fathers, and then we shall have fulfilled our duties and we shall have performed the functions of American citizens.

The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois; and the question has been ordered to be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

SEC. 1. And be it further enacted, That no person exercising or performing, or undertaking to exercise or perform, the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall before confirmation by the Senate receive any salary or compensation for his services, unless such person be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has happened by death, resignation, or expiration of term, during the recess of the Senate and since its last adjournment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wade—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Guthrie, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Grimes, Hendricks, Kirkwood, Williams, Wright, and Yates—10.

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. NORTON. I desire to call up Senate bill No. 263, to authorize the Winona and St. Peter's Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Mississippi river and to establish a post route.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. That bill will create some discussion, and the hour is rather late, and there are some nominations that I think ought to be confirmed to-night.

Mr. NORTON. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, this bill has been reported from the committee with some amendments. It is quite short, and I do not think it will involve any discussion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is hardly a proper hour to take up a railroad bill.

Mr. NORTON. It is a short bill, and will involve no discussion, I think.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot withdraw my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 14, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented to the Senate a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana on the subject of a territorial library, setting forth that they have learned from reliable information that an appropriation was made by Congress for a territorial library for Montana, and that the library was purchased and put in charge of a Government official appointed for that Territory, and that, although that official has arrived in the Territory and departed from it again, the library has not come to hand; and they therefore ask the action of Congress in the premises. The memorial was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a resolution of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana, protesting against the proposed division of that Territory; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. WADE presented the petition of Mrs. Sarah E. Brewer, praying for an extra pension in consequence of the loss of her husband and two sons in the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WADE also presented a memorial of many colored persons, praying Congress to enact a law by which all able-bodied loyal male citizens over eighteen and under forty-five years of age shall be drilled and inspected in each judicial district of the rebellious States once in three months without regard to color or race, that life, liberty, and property may be made secure; also, praying Congress to enact a law by which no naturalized citizen of the United States who has levied war against the Government shall be permitted to occupy any position under the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the memorial of Commander B. M. Dove, protesting against the action of the Naval advisory board, and praying to be restored to his proper rank in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I present a memorial from citizens residing in and near the village of Tabor, county of Fremont, Iowa, who represent that they have approved the decision of Congress not to receive any persons as representatives of the States recently in rebellion until Congress shall declare such States entitled to representation, and asking that no one of those States be declared entitled to representation until impartial suffrage is secured to all its loyal citizens. I ask the reference of this memorial to the joint committee of fifteen on reconstruction.

It was so referred.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented the petition of the Franklin Institution for Savings of Providence, Rhode Island, and the petition of Providence County Savings Bank of the town of North Providence, praying that savings banks having no capital, and whose banking is confined to receiving deposits and loaning the same for the benefit of depositors only, and which are now subject to a duty of five per cent., may be exempted by law from paying any further internal revenue tax; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADE presented a memorial of voters and property holders in Alexandria city and county, Virginia, praying that that city and county may be reannexed to the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONNESS presented the petition of Martha A. Estill, administratrix of the estate of James M. Estill, praying for the payment of a balance claimed to be due for beef furnished to the United States Indian commissioner in the years 1851 and 1852, in the State of California, to supply an expedition to the Klamath country to settle difficulties with the Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the petition of William A. Phillips, late commanding officer of the Indian brigade, and others, praying that bounty may be allowed to the first, second, and third Indian regiments under the act of July 22, 1861, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 87) to provide for the payment of bounty to certain Indian regiments; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. CONNESS, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) for the relief of Ambrose L. Goodrich and Nathan Cornish for carrying the United States mail from Boise City to Idaho City, in the Territory of Idaho, reported it with an amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 89) to provide for the payment of claim of Martha A. Estill, administratrix of the estate of James M. Estill, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

RECOMMITTAL OF A REPORT.

Mr. NYE. I move, by the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to recommit the report that was made in the case of Frederick Vincent, administrator of James Le Caze, late of the firm of Le Caze & Mallett, for the payment of money advanced during the revolutionary war, to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

COURTS IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. HARRIS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 310) to change the place of holding the courts of the United States for the northern district of Mississippi, to report it back without amendment, and I ask that the bill may be considered now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which provides that the district courts of the United States for the northern district of Mississippi now required to be held at the town of Pontotoc shall hereafter be held at the town of Oxford.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to know from the Senator from New York the reason for this proposed change.

Mr. HARRIS. The place for holding the courts for the northern district of Mississippi is now Pontotoc, which is a dilapidated town, inaccessible, with no railroads running through it, and with no convenience for holding a court there. It is proposed to change it to some town on the railroad, a convenient place where the courts can be accommodated. It is the desire of the new district judge that this change should be made.

The bill was passed.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to offer, for the purpose of amendment to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 78) reported by the committee of fifteen, the proposition which I now submit. It defines what is meant by "citizens," in the first article of the proposed constitutional amendment, and strikes out the third section as reported by the committee.

I also desire to offer, as a substitute for the two bills reported by the committee, a bill embodying both of those bills in one; and providing, further, that when the constitutional amendment, as I propose to change it, shall have been adopted by the requisite majority, and any State lately in insurrection shall have consented to the conditions named in the bill, that State may be admitted, with an alternative offering them, as I proposed before, with a slight limitation, amnesty for an extension of suffrage by themselves in their State constitutions. I propose, in other words, to give them the alternative of enfranchising or disfranchising—of disfranchising as proposed by the committee, or of enfranchising and receiving amnesty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the bills and joint resolution to which the Senator proposes to offer amendments, are not now before the Senate; but this will be regarded by the Chair as notice that the Senator will, when these questions come up, propose the amendments which he has now submitted.

Mr. STEWART. I desire now simply to have an order for their printing.

The proposed amendments were received informally, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ORPHANS' FAIR.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 88) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of certain lumber for the fair for the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home; and there being no objection, it was read three times and passed. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to grant the use of lumber, not demanded by the Department for immediate use, for the erection of temporary buildings in the city of Washington for the national fair for the benefit of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home.

LAW LIBRARY OF J. L. PETIGRU.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 79) to authorize the purchase, for the Library of Congress, of the law library of the late James L. Petigru, of South Carolina, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Joint Committee on the Library to contract with the heirs of the late James Louis Petigru for the transfer of the law library left by him to the Library of Congress; and to appropriate the sum of $3,000 to carry into effect the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to hear an explanation of this resolution. I do not know why this library should be bought. There may be a good reason for it; if so, I should like to hear it.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, it is a collection of books amounting to nearly sixteen hundred volumes, collected by the late James L. Petigru, of South Carolina. There is a need for more books in the Law Library; they are especially required for the use of the Court of Claims, which makes very heavy drafts upon the present Library, so that when the Supreme Court and Congress are both in session it is very difficult to get books from the Law Library to supply the demand made. There are a great many calls upon it, and very often books required by parties in Congress are in use by parties employed in the Supreme Court.

The possession of these books would be of great value to the Library, and that is one reason why we sought to make this purchase. The purchase has been urged upon us by a great many individuals for another reason. It has been thought by a great many very desirable that the United States should own the library formerly possessed by Judge Petigru. I never had the advantage of a personal acquaintance with Judge Petigru, but I believe it is known to very many members of this Senate and to the country at large that Judge Petigru was, in his lifetime, not the one, but almost the only one friend which the United States had in the city of Charleston holding the social position that he did. I hear it said on all hands that through all the difficulties which have occurred between the State of South Carolina and the United States Judge Petigru has uniformly been found on the side of the United States; that while almost everybody about him proved disloyal, he was uniformly found loyal; and I have seen testimony, not open to controversy, that at different times during the history of the Government, he rendered most signal services to the United States. I have seen a letter from a former President of the United States testifying to the fact that during his Administration—I refer to the Administration of Mr. Fillmore—Mr. Petigru was the only man he could find, of sufficient attainments, who would venture to take the office of district attorney of the United States in that district.

Moved by these considerations, a great many gentlemen have urged upon us the propriety of putting the library collected by him on the shelves of the Congressional Library. The purchase is not a very large one. It has been reported that Judge Petigru died in impoverished circumstances; that he left his widow nearly destitute. The money to be paid for the purchase of this library would be of essential help to her in her old age, and I am informed that it is really all that she has to maintain herself during the remainder of her life, which cannot be very much protracted. I hope, therefore, there will be no objection to making this purchase.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to inquire how much it is proposed to give for this library.

Mr. HOWE. The price is not to exceed $5,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was consulted with reference to this proposition privately before it was acted upon in committee, and I gave my opinion very decidedly against it. I was not present when it was considered in the Committee on the Library, and therefore I do not feel bound by anything that was done there, because I gave no opinion in committee on the subject. Had I been there, I should have opposed the measure. I admit the merits of Mr. Petigru. He was unquestionably a good Union man, a very distinguished man, a very true man to the Union; a very independent man, who incurred risks on account of his Union sentiments; and so far I recognize his merits; but, sir, my objection to this resolution is twofold. In the first place, because a man remained true to his duty, whatever might be the circumstances under which he remained true and under which he was situated, living in the southern States, where, to be sure, it required a great deal of virtue, I do not think it would be safe to recognize the principle that therefore, because he had happened to be an eminent man, we are to provide for the support of his widow or family in any way. There were a great many people in the South who were not in eminent positions who made as great sacrifices, because they sacrificed all they had, being poor persons, not eminent persons, not distinguished persons, but having an equal degree of public virtue, who have remained true to the Union, and who have lost all. I do not see the propriety, unless you mean to go through with it and apply it to all, of picking out one particular person, because he happened to be more eminent and more distinguished than the others, and making provision for the support of his family, he being in civil life, and rendering no active service, but simply remaining true to his duty and refusing to concur in the rebellion. The precedent would be a bad one. I recognize no more merit in him than I would in a humbler person, one of less distinction, perhaps of none, but yet who sacrificed all he had rather than desert the country to which his allegiance was due; and I see no reason why, if we begin this, we should not go through with it. I regard this proposition as simply a mode of doing indirectly what we could not constitutionally and properly do directly.

In the next place, we know nothing about this library. If it is worth $5,000 it will sell for that; but unquestionably it is just like other lawyers' libraries—a library that probably cost him $5,000, but would sell for very little. It is perfectly well known that law-books which cost a man five dollars originally may, in the course of time, be bought very readily at auction for half a dollar or a dollar. It is very difficult for many of them to be sold at all. A library that is picked up by a lawyer in the course of practice in a great many years is really of but very little money value. New books have taken the place of old ones; new editions have taken the place of old ones; and the older editions are really good for nothing in a money point of view, except as waste paper, at the end of the time when the lawyer terminates his business. That is the case with my library. It is not very valuable, but it cost me some money; it would not sell for the sixth part of what I gave for it; and that is the case with all the libraries of old lawyers. We know nothing about the value of this library. No inquiry has been made on the subject. That is probably the character of it; it is the character of the library of every lawyer who has taken the trouble to acquire one that I ever saw. They are of but little money value. They were of value to the individual who owned them while he lived, because he was accustomed to the books, and they served him in place of others.

In the next place, this being a miscellaneous library of that sort, picked up in that way, it can clearly be of no value to us. It would not be fit to put into the Congressional Library, and probably would not be worth the room it would take in the Law Library. We unquestionably have different copies of all the books we own. It is not pretended that these volumes are rare ones or of the best editions; and it would only be lumbering the shelves probably with mere waste paper if we had them.

This is, then, merely an indirect way of giving $5,000 to this widow for what is really of no value to us, what we do not want, and should consider of no value, perhaps, if we had; books that would not be purchased by us from other persons to put into the Library, either the Law Library or any other. I disapprove of the principle of the thing, and I especially disapprove of the way in which it is done. If we have any power to do it, let us do it directly, and give her $5,000, rather than attempt to do a thing of this description. That it is brought to us, and we are asked to give this money for it, only proves that it is perfectly well known that the works are not worth anything of any consequence to be sold in any other way.

On these grounds I think the proposition is a very improper one. We cannot begin to support the families of persons in the southern States or elsewhere, however eminent they may have been, who simply remained true to their duty and died poor. We have no proof whatever that Mr. Petigru suffered anything or lost any property particularly on account of the difficulties that occurred. I believe, as he was a very old man, a very eminent man, and a non-combatant, the general understanding and agreement was that he was to be let alone. I have not heard of any outrages being practiced upon him or upon his family in any way; and with regard to his family themselves, his children are not all very loyal persons. Some of them may be. One of them, at any rate, I have good reason to believe is not so. I dare say the widow is a very estimable woman; but taking it on the whole I think the thing is very improper, bad as a precedent, founded on no principle, and the way in which it is done is a mere sham. I do not like it in any shape and shall vote against it.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am sorry to hear the Senator from Maine say that he will vote against this proposition. It is true he was not in the committee when this matter was considered; but the proposition received the assent of every member of the committee who was present, and I was in hopes it would receive his assent, though I had not an opportunity of consulting him about it. I hope the Senator will at least reconsider his opposition, so far as to concede that this is not a sham way of doing anything. It is a real, actual, bona fide way of asking the Congress of the United States to appropriate a sum not exceeding $5,000 to purchase these books, this library. I do not discover any sham in that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do you know anything about its value?

Mr. HOWE. I never have seen the library. I have seen a catalogue of the books. I have seen appraisals put upon them by book men in New York. They differ in their estimates. They value them at from $3,000 to $5,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Did they see the books?

Mr. HOWE. I do not know whether they have seen the books or not. It was supposed by the committee that $5,000 would be the full value of the library. I think it was the disposition of the committee to pay the full value of the library; it is my disposition. We could get along without these books. The Library does not ache for them. If it did, we could get them in other quarters. I concede all that; and I confess that my desire was stimulated to make this purchase by what I had known of the political relations and conduct of the former owner of the library. I do not propose to the Senate to make a direct appropriation to reward Mr. Petigru for his fidelity to the Government under which he lived and whose protection he enjoyed. That is not my purpose. But if that man, who was true while he lived, when almost everything about him was false to the core, left anything of value to this Government which it is desirable to us to own, I do think the fact that he was true, the fact that the purchase of that value would be a benefit to her whom he may fairly be supposed to have loved better than anything else on earth—that fact, I say, seems to me not a sham, but a real additional reason why we should make the purchase.

The reasons why we should make the purchase are, first, that it will supply not a sham but an actual want in the Library; second, that it will give us value for the money we appropriate; third, that it will furnish relief to the wife of one who while he lived the Government had great reason to be grateful to. It furnishes no precedent whatever that will be of any danger. It furnishes simply a precedent in which we purchase property that we want.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator what proof there is that we want it.

Mr. HOWE. Well, Mr. President, the Librarian who has charge of the Congressional Library did say to the committee that it would be of great convenience; it was composed in the main of a class of works which were very convenient for reference in the practice of the Court of Claims, and would relieve the books now on the shelves very much of the demands made by those practicing in that court.

That is the evidence upon which I made the remark that we needed it. It is not a precedent which calls upon us to vote a bounty or a gratuity to every one who under adverse circumstances shall have been true to the Government of the United States. No such thing is proposed, and I must deprecate the remark thrown in by the Senator from Maine that not all the family of the late Judge Petigru are loyal or have been loyal to the Government. I never have heard any imputation upon the loyalty of his widow. It is for her benefit, and her benefit alone, as I understand, that the money which is proposed to be paid for this library is to go. If his children were less faithful than he, one or all of them, it is enough to say that they are not to be benefited in any way by this purchase, or I am greatly misinformed.

I must say, Mr. President, in conclusion, that I do think it is well enough for the Government of the United States to show a little gratitude for any exhibition of distinguished fidelity. I can myself subscribe to the truth of what the Senator from Maine has said, that his fidelity is no more to be commended than that of a person less distinguished in social life than himself, less eminent in position than himself, and yet I am not sure that it is entirely correct as he states it. I think I can understand that the temptations thrown about a man in Judge Petigru's position, that the inducements to him to be untrue and unfaithful to the Government, might be stronger than those around a person less eminent than himself; and if so, he is to be distinguished and commended for his fidelity in proportion to the temptations he had to go astray. Without entering at large upon the merits of Judge Petigru, for I am in no position and in no mood to attempt any eulogy upon him, if the Senate do not feel any gratitude I cannot invoke any or create any. If they do feel any disposition to be grateful for such services as he rendered, here is an opportunity to show the gratitude of the Senate in as cheap a way as gratitude was ever exhibited to a man in the world. You can do it without much cost to yourselves, and I think, under the circumstances, you had better do it.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the honorable chairman of the committee if there is any catalogue of the books.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir. There was a catalogue shown to the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. They are all old editions, are they not?

Mr. HOWE. The editions were not given upon the catalogue.

Mr. JOHNSON. If they are old editions, as I am rather fearful they are, they are comparatively worth little or nothing. Their places are occupied by new editions with additional notes. No one thinks now of buying the older editions, what may be called the classical law-books. I would ask the honorable chairman also to whom the money is to be paid.

Mr. HOWE. To the widow.

Mr. JOHNSON. It says "the heirs." Who are the heirs?

Mr. HOWE. It was intended to be made to the widow.

Mr. JOHNSON. She certainly cannot be entitled to the whole.

Mr. GRIMES. The resolution does not propose to buy them.

Mr. JOHNSON. It authorizes the committee to contract with the heirs.

Mr. GRIMES. Not to purchase but to "transfer" the library.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no proof whatever in regard to it. The catalogue was sent to New York. It is an old lawyer's law library. The Senator from Maryland and I know very well that they are worth very little.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have some reason to know. I was unfortunate at one time to lose the whole of my own, and I had to buy a library, and I purchased Mr. Wirt's law library, more recent than this, and I think I gave for the whole of the library he had $3,000.

Mr. HOWE. How large a library?

Mr. JOHNSON. Four thousand or five thousand volumes. I know he kept his library full up to the day of his death, was in the habit of buying all the books, and all the editions I got from his estate were good editions; and I only gave $3,000. I am satisfied it was twice as large a library as Mr. Petigru's. Although Mr. Petigru was one of the most eminent men at the bar, he was so situated for the last twenty years, I think, that he was not buying modern books. I believe there was a law library in Charleston where he resided, and I suppose he used that. It is a very common thing now in all the cities for the courts to have a library of their own, or for the bar to have a library to which all resort; and there are very few lawyers who keep up with the books; and I rather fear it will be found that that was the case with Mr. Petigru.

No man in the Senate could be more anxious to show respect for his name than myself. I think the last letter he wrote he addressed to me, and I published it after his death in the Intelligencer, in which he regretted what his State had done, her determination to secede, and spoke with all the love and devotion to the Union that any of us could feel, and stated that he really had hoped, as he was living when the Constitution was adopted, that he should not die after the Union formed by the Constitution was at an end. As far, therefore, as personal motive could animate any member of this Senate—and I am sure every member of the Senate is willing to do all he can to show respect for the memory of a man like that—I should be influenced, but I cannot agree to buy a library like this on the same ground on which I would give $5,000 to the family.

Mr. HOWE. If the yeas and nays can be withdrawn I should like to have the resolution laid over. I see the purchase is to be made of the heirs.

Mr. CLARK. It can be laid over without withdrawing the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOWE. Let it lie over; it will have to be amended I see.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. HOWE. Perhaps the vote ordering the resolution to be engrossed for a third reading ought to be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In order to amend it, it would be necessary to reconsider that vote. The Chair will put that motion to reconsider now if the Senator makes it.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is now moved that the further consideration of the joint resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to submit a motion that my colleague, Senator ANTHONY, be granted leave of absence for one week.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to granting the leave, but I wish to know what is the effect of it. It seems to be a new habit which has sprung up recently, or else an old habit revived.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It is, as I understand, a simple courtesy of the Senate. That is all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection if it has no other effect.

Mr. SPRAGUE. That is my understanding.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed, without amendment, the bill (S. No. 310) to change the place of holding the courts of the United States for the northern district of Mississippi.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 66) relative to the courts and post office of New York city, and the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 397) to authorize the coinage of five-cent pieces.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 511) imposing a duty on live animals;

A bill (H. R. No. 567) to amend an act to establish the grade of vice admiral in the United States Navy; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 133) relative to the attempted assassination of the Emperor of Russia.

BRIDGE AT WINONA.

Mr. NORTON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 263.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 263) to authorize the Winona and St. Peters Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Mississippi river, and to establish a post route, which had been reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with amendments.

The first amendment was at the end of section one to insert the following words:

And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, the cause may be tried before the district court of the United States of any State in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section two, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any bridge built under the provisions of this act shall be built as a draw-bridge, with a pivot or other form of draw, and with a span over the main channel of the river, as understood at the time of the construction of the bridge, of not less than one hundred feet in length on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw; and one of the next adjoining spans shall not be less than two hundred and twenty feet in length: Provided, That said pivot draw shall be constructed at an accessible and navigable point in the river, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river, as near as practicable: And provided also, That said draw shall always be opened promptly, upon reasonable signal, for the passage of boats whose construction may not at the time permit of their passing under the permanent spans of said bridge, except that said draw shall not be required to be opened when engines or trains are passing over said bridge, or when passenger trains are due; but in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in the opening of said draw after the passage of such engines or trains.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any bridge built under the provisions of this act may, at the option of the company building the same, be built as a draw-bridge, with a pivot or other form of draw, or with unbroken and continuous spans: Provided, That if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, it shall not be of less elevation in any case than fifty feet above extreme high-water mark as understood at the point of location, to the bottom chord of the bridge, nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than two hundred and fifty feet in length, and the span over the main channel of the river shall be three hundred feet in length, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river: And provided also, That if any bridge built under this act shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the same shall be constructed as a pivot draw-bridge with a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point, and with spans of not less than one hundred and sixty feet in length in the clear between piers on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw, and the next adjoining spans to the draw shall not be less than two hundred and fifty feet; and said spans shall not be less than thirty feet above low-water mark, and not less than ten above extreme high-water mark, measuring to the bottom chord of the bridge, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river: And provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats, whose construction shall not be such as to admit of their passage under the permanent spans of said bridge, except when trains are passing over the same; but in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in opening the said draws after the passage of trains.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to inquire of the gentleman who has this bill in charge whether the description of the draw and spans of the bridge is the same in this amendment as was inserted in the bill allowing the construction of bridges at Quincy and Hannibal.

Mr. RAMSEY. This bill was considered by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, who had the other bridge bills in charge; and it is similar to the one we passed a few days since. The bill, however, is in charge of my colleague.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The same width of draw?

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The same height above high-water mark?

Mr. RAMSEY. The same height and the same span.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not know that I have any objection to the amendment, but I wish to ask my honorable friend from Minnesota to let this bill lie over till to-morrow. I wish to have an opportunity to look into it. It is a matter that deeply concerns the interests of Wisconsin and some of the great thoroughfares of that State. It may be that I shall be compelled, after an examination, to offer an amendment to allow the building of a bridge also at La Crosse, across the river. I shall not make any objection to this amendment if it provides for the same sized spans which were required in the bill for bridges at Hannibal and Quincy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee, to strike out the second section of the bill and insert a substitute in lieu thereof, which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now ask that this bill be postponed until to-morrow; and I make a motion to that effect. I have not had, and I do not know that my colleague has had, an opportunity to look carefully into this matter. It very much affects Wisconsin. We will at the earliest opportunity consult in relation to it and look into the bill, and as I have already stated we may perhaps desire to submit the amendment to which I have referred.

Mr. NORTON. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not persist in his motion to postpone the bill, certainly not with a view to offer an amendment providing for the building of a bridge at La Crosse. That is an entirely separate bridge connecting separate and distinct roads. There will be certainly no objection on our part to the passage of a separate bill for the building of a bridge at La Crosse, but it seems to me there can be no propriety or necessity for adding it as an amendment to this bill. This bill is reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with the same provisions as to details, the draw, and other matters of construction, that were contained in the bill passed a short time since for the building of a bridge at Quincy. I hope the Senator will not insist on his motion. If he desires the construction of a bridge at La Crosse, we certainly shall make no objection to a bill for that purpose.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state to my honorable friend from Minnesota that I have not given very much attention to this subject, but it has been stated to me that the State of Wisconsin, when application was made to the Legislature, refused to grant to a company the right to build a bridge at the point which is referred to in this bill. At the present time there is no railroad in Wisconsin which reaches the Mississippi river at this point. The great railroad which reaches across our State, the most northern road, reaches the river at La Crosse. Opposite the Mississippi river at La Crosse, as I understand, a railroad is already in progress which now extends, I think, into Minnesota some twenty or thirty miles from the river, and there is the point where two railroads would communicate if they had a bridge. But at this point, Winona, there is, as I understand, only a road, commenced at Winona running westward into the State of Minnesota. There is not yet any railroad in Wisconsin reaching the river opposite to Winona.

Mr. HENDERSON. How far is that from La Crosse?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. About forty miles above La Crosse.

Mr. HOWE. Twenty-nine miles.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. By the river I think it is forty miles; perhaps in a direct line it is not more than twenty-nine. I hope my friend from Minnesota will consent to let this bill go over. I have no disposition to delay or prevent action upon it, but I desire that my colleague and myself shall have an opportunity to look into it, which, I confess, I have not as yet had the opportunity to do.

Mr. NORTON. I have no objection to the bill going over, as the unfinished business, so that it can come up to-morrow. It is very important that this bill should pass, for the reason that the company who ask for the privilege of building this bridge propose to build the road on the east side of the river. There are now some seventy miles of road running west of the river, but there is a distance of about twenty-eight miles to build on the east side of the river, which they propose to build this summer, and it is important that they should have the authority to erect this bridge. If the bill can go over so that it can come up to-morrow as the unfinished business, I shall not object.

Mr. SUMNER. I will make a motion which will allow the bill now pending to go over, substituting another for the consideration of the Senate. I move that the Senate now postpone the pending and all other orders, and proceed with the consideration of House bill No. 11. I think we can finish that to-day, if we take it up.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to take up a bill that is very important, and I appeal to the Senator to allow me to do so. It is a bill to prevent smuggling, which it is important should be considered as soon as possible.

Mr. SUMNER. I know the importance of the Senator's bill, but I submit that we ought not to enter upon that until we have disposed of this little bill; it is a very short bill.

Mr. MORRILL. As the Senator has not the special charge of the bill which he moves to take up, I cannot appeal to him; but I had a conversation this morning with the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who has the special charge of it, and obtained his consent, I thought, to proceed now with the bill to which I have referred and in which he is vastly more interested than I am. It is a bill that ought to be considered. It is a bill to prevent smuggling. The public service is suffering, I am told, for the want of it.

Mr. SUMNER. I think we can dispose of the other bill to-day.

Mr. MORRILL. I think it very likely you can, but we can dispose of this also. The Senator's bill has passed the other House, and only needs the consideration of the Senate, while this bill has received the consideration of neither House. It is very much demanded, I am told, by the Treasury Department. It is a bill that has occupied a good deal of the time of the Department and of the committee, and certainly needs the consideration of this body at the present time. I thought I had the consent of the honorable chairman of the committee who takes an interest in the Senator's bill, to proceed with this. I suggest to the Senator that we can vote upon that bill at almost any time, and then it will be concluded, while this bill is in its incipency and requires the action of both bodies. I hope my friend will allow this bill to be taken up.

Mr. SUMNER. I am in favor of the bill which the Senator has in charge, but I understand he is not in favor of the bill which I now move to take up.

Mr. MORRILL. Not exactly.

Mr. SUMNER. Therefore we are not on a perfect equality. I am disposed to be more liberal to him than he is to me. It seems to me, therefore, the Senator rather takes an unfair advantage in pressing against me a bill which he knows I am in favor of when he himself is against the bill that I wish to have considered. I think, as we have had the bill which I move to take up under consideration so many days, we had better take it up to-day and finish it, and make an end of it.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not think you ought to antagonize that bill against this.

Mr. SUMNER. I know you are against the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I will try the question, and if the Senate say so, very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 11) to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States.

Mr. GRIMES. Do I understand that the two bills now antagonized against each other are the Camden and Amboy bill, proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, and the bill that comes from the Treasury Department to prevent smuggling on the frontier?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. Then, those in favor of the bill from the Treasury Department will vote "nay."

Mr. SUMNER. Oh, no; that is not so; I am in favor of that bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The motion is to postpone the Mississippi bridge bill, and the Senator from Massachusetts moves to take up this Camden and Amboy bill, and the Senator from Maine moves to take up the bill to prevent smuggling. Now, cannot the question be divided, and let it be taken first on the motion to postpone, and then on the motion to take up? I ask for a division of the question, so that the vote may first be had on postponing the Mississippi bridge bill; and then the question will arise which we will take up, the Camden and Amboy bill or the bill to prevent smuggling.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope my friend from Massachusetts will withdraw his motion for the present and let us pass this bill for the prevention of smuggling. It is an important bill and will excite no discussion and will not occupy much time; and then I will vote with the Senator to take up his bill. I do not want to vote against him; and I hope he will take this course. The bill of the Senator from Maine will not occupy much time, and it is public business that ought to be attended to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The suggestion that the motion be divided, in the opinion of the Chair cannot be granted, inasmuch as the question is not one that can be divided. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts was to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of a given bill. The motion is not susceptible of division, in the opinion of the Chair, in the manner in which it now comes before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. At the suggestion of a friend of the bill that I wish to bring forward, following his suggestion, somewhat against my own judgment, I withdraw my motion; but I wish it understood that I shall renew it hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his motion, and the question now is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to postpone the consideration of the bill before the Senate to authorize the building of a bridge across the Mississippi until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 222, further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on Commerce will be read.

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senate will indulge me, I will make a general statement in regard to this bill, as perhaps I ought to do before the amendments are acted upon. This measure was prepared at the Treasury Department; and though the details are pretty extensive, the changes in the law are not very radical, and perhaps they will all be comprehended in a general statement that the provisions are intended to alter the several statutes bearing upon the question of smuggling, from 1791 down to the present time. Most of those statutes are not embodied in this act, and it does not profess to be a revision of that system, but is amendatory of the law touching the general subject of the acts to prevent smuggling, and there are sundry new provisions. These new provisions apply chiefly to the northern, north-eastern, and northwestern frontiers, and are suggested by the relations which have sprung up in a few years past between the British Provinces on this continent and that region of our country.

The bill does not seek to change particularly in any way the officers of the customs. I am not aware that it adds new officers or that it in any way directly changes the compensation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does it not abolish some?

Mr. MORRILL. I think not.

Mr. JOHNSON. I so understand its reading.

Mr. MORRILL. I believe there is no authority to abolish any officers except in a contingency. The main feature of the bill is to amend the statutes to prevent smuggling, according to the experience of the Treasury Department, to render them more efficient, and to add such additional sections as have been suggested by the exigencies of the times. These are the chief features of the bill, and I believe all the details will be found to fall under this general statement. The several sections and amendments thereto, having reference to the old statutes, statutes which are not new, very nearly explain themselves, so that I do not feel called upon to make any extended explanation of the sections in detail. I shall be glad to explain any section to which my attention may be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendments reported by the Committee on Commerce in their order.

The Secretary read the first amendment, which was in section two, line five, to strike out "an officer" and insert "a collector, naval officer, or surveyor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line nine, to strike out the word "other" before "envelope."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line eighteen, to strike out the word "implied," and insert the word "engaged."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line nineteen, after the word "violation," to strike out the remainder of the section, in the following words:

And the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power, from time to time, to appoint such agents of the Treasury Department as, in his opinion, the exigencies of the revenue service may require, who shall be entitled to such reasonable compensation as he shall prescribe; and the twenty-seventh section of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships and vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," approved February 18, 1793, and the sixty-eighth and seventieth sections of the act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 2, 1799, are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line ten, to strike out the word "other" before the word "envelope."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line twenty-five, after the word "concealment," to insert the words "and all the equipage, trappings, and other appurtenances of such beast, team, or vehicle;" so that the clause will read:

And every such vehicle and beast, or either, together with teams or other motive power used in conveying, drawing, or propelling such vehicle, goods, wares, or merchandise, and all other appurtenances, including trunks, envelopes, covers, and all means of concealment, and all the equipage, trappings, and other appurtenances of such beast, team, or vehicle shall be subject to seizure and forfeiture.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line twenty-seven, after the word "forfeiture," to strike out the following words:

In like manner as is now by law, or shall be by this act, provided in regard to such goods, wares, or merchandise.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line eight, after the word "law," to insert "such goods, wares, and merchandise shall be forfeited, and;" so that the section will read:

That if any person shall fraudulently or knowingly import or bring into the United States, or assist in so doing, any goods, wares, or merchandise contrary to law, or shall receive, conceal, buy, sell, or in any manner facilitate the transportation, concealment, or sale of such goods, wares, or merchandise after their importation, knowing the same to have been imported contrary to law, such goods, wares, and merchandise shall be forfeited, and he or she shall, on conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, be fined in any sum not exceeding five thousand dollars nor less than fifty dollars, or be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of such court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line thirteen, after the word "court," to strike out the following words:

And the guilty knowledge of the defendant, when convicted of the fact, shall in all cases be presumed unless he or she prove the contrary.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

And the onus probandi shall lie upon the defendant where probable cause is shown for such prosecution, to be judged of by the court before whom the prosecution is had.

Mr. JOHNSON. It seems to me that this is a departure from all the rules which experience has proved to be just and righteous. The object of the section is to prevent the illegal importation of certain articles of merchandise mentioned in it. I think the Senate had better look at it, for the amendment changes the section very materially. The section provides:

That if any person shall fraudulently or knowingly import or bring into the United States, or assist in so doing, any goods, wares, or merchandise, contrary to law, or shall receive, conceal, buy, sell, or in any manner facilitate the transportation, concealment, or sale of such goods, wares, or merchandise, after their importation, knowing the same to have been imported contrary to law, such goods, wares, and merchandise shall be forfeited.

As the bill originally stood, in the event of a prosecution, it provided that "the guilty knowledge of the defendant when convicted of the fact"—that is to say, when convicted of the fact of receiving, buying, or selling goods that had been improperly imported—"shall in all cases be presumed, unless he or she prove the contrary." That is contrary to all ideas of law.

Mr. MORRILL. That is stricken out.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know that is stricken out. The committee have stricken that out because, in the judgment of the committee, it is liable to objection; but they substitute for it what, according to my view, makes it almost as obnoxious as the passage they propose to strike out. They propose to substitute for it the following:

The onus probandi shall lie upon the defendant where probable cause is shown for such prosecution, to be judged of by the court before whom the prosecution is had.

Now, what is "probable cause" for a prosecution? What must a judge say is probable cause? That the goods have been imported contrary to law by somebody, and secondly, that the man prosecuted has received or bought or sold them. The fact of the illegal importation connected with the fact of the reception or the buying or the selling the judge may consider as sufficient probable cause to believe that the man is guilty, and cast upon him the burden of proving his innocence. I know of no case in which a rule of evidence so harsh as that has been adopted. It is a very good thing to prevent smuggling in order to secure as much revenue as we can; but it is paying very dearly if we accomplish that object by breaking down the landmarks which have heretofore been supposed by all the jurists of the country necessary to protect the individual citizen against an improper prosecution.

Now, it seems to me, it would be better to leave the case to stand upon the rules of evidence applicable to all offenses. Why is it necessary to say in this case, more than in any other case, that the defendant shall have thrown upon him the burden of proving his innocence? In all cases, if there be proof before the jury reasonably tending to the conviction of the offender, because reasonably establishing his guilt of the offense, he is called upon to defend himself. You do not want any additional statute in order to cast upon the offender who may be prosecuted the burden, in a case of that description, of proving his innocence; and the object, therefore, of this provision is to place him in a much worse situation than he is placed in now. Whenever the court, not the jury, shall think that the man is guilty upon the evidence which the prosecution has produced, then a verdict is to be pronounced against him unless he proves his innocence. The judge, therefore, will be bound to tell the jury, "I think—it is perfectly immaterial what you think—that the man is guilty upon the evidence already adduced, and you must find him guilty"—that is the necessary result, provided the law is carried out—"you must find him guilty, unless he, by evidence, assures you that he is not guilty." It seems to me, and I submit it to the honorable member from Maine, that that is going infinitely further than in any country that I know of it has ever been supposed necessary to go where the rights of the individual citizen are regarded at all. We might all be placed in that situation.

Mr. MORRILL. Oh, no; it only applies to smugglers.

Mr. JOHNSON. You might buy goods from them without knowing it. There are a few smugglers, perhaps, on the coast of Maine; I think it very likely that a great deal of the smuggling has been in that neighborhood. My friend might be in Castine and might buy goods that had been improperly smuggled in Castine. Suppose he should be prosecuted. The proof against him would be that the goods had been smuggled in and that he had bought them. That is a very good ground for prosecuting; and the only thing to be proved is, that he did know (in the absence of this legislation) that they were smuggled; but if you adopt this amendment it is not necessary to prove that. They will prove the fact of the illegal importation and the fact of the purchase, and then call upon him to prove that he did not know that they were illegally imported; otherwise he would be subjected to the forfeiture. I do not see the occasion for it. I repeat, that in all cases, no matter what the character of the offense is, if the prosecution produces evidence which, in the judgment of reasonable men, under the direction of the court, tends to criminate the offender, if the jury do their duty, unless it can be explained away, they convict him; but this goes a great way beyond that. It assumes guilt from the mere fact that the party has bought or sold the goods illegally imported, and casts upon him the burden of proving his innocence.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me that the Senator from Maryland exaggerates the character of this proposition. No one knows better than that very experienced lawyer, that questions of what are called the weight of evidence or the onus probandi are ordinary questions of law, that is, there is a certain rule of law which determines that under certain circumstances the onus probandi is on the one party or the other. I take it that that is only what is called common learning; you find it in all the books: that the court must determine in advance where the onus probandi is. Now, if I understand it, this statute undertakes to determine in advance, in certain cases, where the onus probandi shall be. It lays down a rule in that respect. I admit that the rule may seem to be somewhat stringent. I admit, also, that it may be a departure from the common practice. But the question in my mind is, whether when we are dealing with cases like those of smuggling, we are not justified in making the rule more stringent and in departing from what may be the common practice. I therefore bring the question right to that point, and I ask the experienced Senator from Maryland whether in dealing with smuggling, from all our experience, from our knowledge of such cases, from the known habit of smugglers to evade all existing laws and regulations, we are not justified in bringing, if possible, an increased stringency of rule to bear upon them. I must say I think we are. It seems to me that is what this statute precisely does. It makes the rule more stringent against smugglers. The question is whether in making it more stringent against smuggling there is a departure from principle. I have already suggested that it is a most common practice to determine in what cases the onus probandi shall be one way or the other.

Then we come to the next question here: under what circumstances shall the onus probandi be upon the defendant? It is where probable cause is shown for such prosecution. I presume that I do not err when I say that it is not a phrase of the common law. Probable cause is not strictly a phrase of the common law. It is a phrase of the ancient Roman jurisprudence, and derived from the ancient Roman jurisprudence.

Mr. JOHNSON. From the prize law and the admiralty law.

Mr. SUMNER. Is not the admiralty law derived from the Roman jurisprudence?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. It is a phrase of the ancient Roman jurisprudence, derived from that, entering into the jurisprudence of all continental Europe, and all that portion of our own jurisprudence which is dependent upon the ancient Roman jurisprudence, the admiralty law, as the Senator from Maryland suggests, and also in England the law administered in consistorial courts. Now, in the Roman law, to go back to that, we find that the term probable cause plays an immense part. There is not a term in Roman jurisprudence, I presume, more important than that. Where a party could show "probable cause" for anything that he did it was a justification. I presume one could not err under the law of nations if he said that a public ship overhauling a merchantman on the ocean, having probable cause to suspect that the ship was not what it purported to be; then the very fact of probable cause under such circumstances would be a sufficient defense; so important has the rule of probable cause, in the original Roman jurisprudence, and in those different countries who derived their jurisprudence from ancient Rome, been regarded.

Now, as I understand it, this phrase is imported into our statutes; it is not unknown in them before. Of course it occurs constantly in our revenue statutes, but there again, I take it, it is derived from this same original source. Now, it is proposed to declare that where probable cause is shown for a prosecution, the burden of proof shall be changed. As I have said, by that jurisprudence from which the phrase is derived, where probable cause is shown, it is a defense for any authorities in any seizure they make. They do not err. If the seizure be a ship, or if it be a man, or if it be any article of property, there is no mistake if the Government shows probable cause; and so, on the other hand, if there is probable cause to believe a man to be guilty, the burden of evidence under that jurisprudence absolutely changes and he has got to bring forward his evidence in order to overthrow that probable cause.

And now, to give a practical application to all this, it seems to me that in this clause there is simply an attempt, and I must say it seems to me a proper attempt, to give an increased stringency to the law for the repression of smuggling, by making the showing of probable cause the occasion for a change of the onus probandi. I do not think there will be any mistake if we shall adopt it.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Massachusetts has said, perhaps, in defense of this proposition all that need be said, except that I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is not a new provision, and then it seems to me that on the question of the burden of proof it is not that departure which the Senator from Maryland seems to think. It simply puts the burden of proof on the party only when the court shall say under the facts adduced that the burden of proof ought to lie on him. That is all it says. How does that differ in principle from the case of larceny? Where the goods are found in the possession of the party charged, the burden of proof is on him to explain. Suppose he does not explain. The court would tell the jury undoubtedly in such a case that he having been in possession of the goods, it is his duty to explain the charge of having come wrongfully by them; they are lost; they are found on him; now if he fails to explain, the court would say to the jury in such a case as that the burden of proof is on him, he must explain to your satisfaction, and failing to do it, the implication is one of guilt.

Nowhere this section sets out certain facts: "any person who shall fraudulently or knowingly import" &c., going on to state the facts under which certain things may be done, "knowing the same to have been imported contrary to law," &c., shall be subject to a penalty. The law provides that he may do that thing properly; he may do it legally and properly; and if he is charged with doing it wrongfully, and the facts appear, the facts are presented to the court, so that in the judgment of the court the burden of proof ought to be on him, then precisely in this case, as in the case where a man is charged with larceny, the court may say that the burden of proof is on him and they may instruct the jury against him. The burden of proof lies there under the authority of this statute, unless he vindicates himself. The only difference in the world is that we apply it here to a transaction which of itself is legal under the statute except for the guilty intent; and when the facts, in the judgment of the court, authorize an inference of his guilt, then he is to stand precisely on the general principle in criminal proceedings.

But this statute is not new; it has existed since 1799 substantially. I will read the provisions of the act from which I suppose this provision was taken. It is the act of 1799, chapter twenty-two, seventy-first section. That section concludes as follows:

"But the onus probandi shall lie on the claimant only where probable cause is shown for such prosecution, to be adjudged of by the court before whom the prosecution is held."

Mr. JOHNSON. That applies to property.

Mr. MORRILL. There is no difference between that provision and this, except that in the statute of 1799 it applies to property; property was proceeded against there, and now this is a proceeding against the person. The principle is precisely the same. It seems to me that in principle it is not so objectionable as is supposed by the Senator from Maryland, and then in practice I am sure that any other rule would be found to be extremely mischievous.

Mr. HOWE. I was not able to agree with the committee upon this amendment, and since listening to the remarks of the Senator from Maryland I am no nearer agreeing with them than I was before. I think if the impropriety of this proposed amendment could be demonstrated, the Senator from Maryland has demonstrated it. There are two ways in which this amendment may be regarded. If you look at the literal import of the words proposed to be inserted here, it seems to me it provides what nobody in the world would agree to. I am entirely agreed that the words proposed to be struck out should be struck out; so far I accede to the amendment; but as to inserting the words proposed to be inserted, I am utterly opposed to it.

The fact to be tried is a single one. It is not the selling of imported goods contrary to law, or the buying of goods which have been imported contrary to law. These are not crimes, not made so, not regarded so by the section. The offense here provided for is the selling or buying imported goods with a knowledge that they were imported in violation of the law. It is doing these things, with knowledge of the illegal character of the act. That is what the section is driving at. That is what it is proposed to punish. The cause upon which the defendant is arraigned is, for instance, the purchasing of goods, or the concealing of goods, or the buying of goods, knowing them to have been imported contrary to the law. This amendment proposes to say that the burden of proof shall lie on the defendant in case the judge says there is probable cause for the prosecution. What burden of proof?

Mr. BUCKALEW. It does not tell what.

Mr. HOWE. If you look at the words it would be the burden of proving the complaint. If the judge should say that the district attorney had probable cause for commencing the prosecution, when he gets so far that he can say that, then he must say "now the burden of proof is upon the defendant to establish the complaint to maintain the indictment." I think that is the literal meaning of the amendment; but it probably is not the meaning which the committee intended to give it. But, in the most favorable view you can take of it, it is dividing a single issue into two propositions and submitting one of them to the court and reserving the other to the jury. The court is to say, when so much of the case has been proved as that, if not explained or not controverted by the defendant, the jury must find a verdict of guilty. That much of the issue is left to the court, and the rest of it is reserved for the jury. The court says when the prima facie case is made out. The jury is left to say when the prima facie case is rebutted.

The fact of possession is a circumstance always proper to be submitted to the tribunal to establish the guilt, whether of importing or buying with knowledge that the goods were imported contrary to law; it is a circumstance going to show guilt; it is proper to be submitted to the jury; but it is proper for the jury to say what weight should be given to that circumstance as to every other circumstance. If that is the only circumstance which is proved in the case, the court cannot help but say that there was probable cause for a prosecution; but when the court says that, rings his bell, and says "here is probable cause for the prosecution," then he says in effect to the jury "now you must from this time forward in the trial of the cause hold this man guilty until he, taking the burden of proof upon himself, satisfies you by his own evidence, by his own efforts, by what he shall marshal before you in the nature of proof, that he did not know anything about it; until he shows this negative you must assume the affirmative," the affirmative being that he did know. That rests upon the allegation of the indictment.

Any circumstance, therefore, which shall induce the court to say that the district attorney was not to blame for commencing the prosecution, that he had probable cause for commencing the prosecution, any circumstance that enables the court to say that the district attorney is not guilty, calls upon the defendant in fact to prove that he is not guilty. I think this is a very great advance upon any rule of evidence that I ever heard of in the trial of criminal causes. The Senator from Massachusetts says we may be justified in adopting more stringent rules in these cases. I think smuggling is a very bad thing and ought to be put down; but I do not know that smuggling is a greater crime than burglary, or than murder, or than treason. This is a rule of evidence, I take it, we should not tolerate in the trial of either of those crimes, and I do not know why we should tolerate it in trying the crime of smuggling.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, there is very great force indeed in the observations which have been submitted by the honorable Senator from Maryland in opposition to this amendment of the committee as it stands now, and inasmuch as I was not able to be present in the committee when this bill was considered, I venture to offer an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee, which I think will relieve it of the objections made by the Senator from Maryland, and will put it precisely upon the footing of the act of the 2d of March, 1799, which is in force to-day on this subject, and which has been found in the courts of the United States to be absolutely indispensable in cases of the seizure of smuggled goods. The amendment which I propose is to insert after the word "probandi" the words "in cases of seizure," and in the same line to strike out the word "defendant" and insert the word "claimant," so that the amendment, if adopted, will cause the section to read "and the onus probandi in cases of seizure shall lie upon the claimant where probable cause is shown for such prosecution," &c.

The act of 1799, which may be called the constitutional basis of all our revenue and importation laws, provides, in the seventy-first section, the following rule of evidence in causes of this nature:

"In actions, suits, or informations to be brought where any seizure may be made pursuant to this act, if the property be claimed by any person, in every such case the onus probandi shall lie upon such claimant."

And in a succeeding part of the section:

"But the onus probandi shall lie on the claimant only where probable cause is shown for such prosecution to be adjudged of by the court before whom the prosecution is had."

It is well known by everybody who has had any experience in the prosecution or defense of these seizure causes that the most which the Government, in ninety-nine cases in a hundred, can do is to prove the unlawful importation presumptively; that is, to prove the fact that the particular goods in question have been introduced into the United States without the payment of duty; and then, pursuant to the act of 1799, it is the duty of the court to call upon the defendant to show a reasonable ground of excuse or exculpation against the prima facie presumption which the illegal importation without the payment of duty ought justly to raise.

It has been found in practice—and in my knowledge within the short period of my acquaintance with legal affairs, it has been practiced constantly—that a clause of the description which I now name has not been only useful but indispensable to the Government, without being in the least degree prejudicial and injurious to any just claimant who has not really and truly intended to evade the laws providing the revenue. Therefore it appears to me that if we adopt the amendment which I have suggested, and leave it on the basis of the act of 1799, we shall put the law in a position where nobody can reasonably find fault with it.

Mr. JOHNSON. With due deference to my friend from Maine and my friend from Vermont, I think they misapprehend the act of 1799 altogether, if they suppose that the principle contained in that act in the section referred to justifies such a provision as is the one now before the Senate. The act of 1799 in the section referred to, which is, I suppose, the only one in the law supposed to bear at all on the subject before the Senate, provides for two classes of cases. The first is, that if any officer seizing goods is sued he may give the act in evidence to show the authority under which he was acting. Where he is sued or molested for anything that he does by virtue of the act, in defense of such suit the provision is that he may give in evidence under the general issue this act and the special matter that he may be able to submit. In order to protect the officer against improper suits by persons who may find fault with what the officer is doing, it gives to the officer, who becomes the defendant in such suits of course, in the event that the plaintiff fails, double costs; and then it provides—

"And in actions, suits, or informations to be brought, where any seizure shall be made pursuant to this act, if the property be claimed by any person, in every such case the onus probandi shall lie upon such claimant."

What is that? The officer seizes goods and he is sued in an action of replevin or any possessory action, or he is sued in an action of trover; and then the law provides, as it has a clear right to provide—such was the law before—that in such a case as that, the claimant being plaintiff is to make out his own case. He is to prove that the goods were his, and he is to prove that they were not improperly imported. The officer, being authorized expressly by the terms of the act to rely upon the act and upon special matter in his defense, is in possession of the goods, and he is sued by the alleged owner to recover the goods or in damages; and in such case as that the statute declares that the party suing, the alleged claimant, shall make out his case. There is no doubt about that, and the latter part of the section to which my friend from Maine adverted is intended merely as an explanation of that part which I have just read. It says this:

"But the onus probandi shall lie on the claimant only where probable cause is shown for such prosecution."

That is for the benefit of the claimant. If the claimant sues and the defendant does not show probable cause, he is not compelled to prove anything; but if the defendant does show that there was probable cause for the seizure, then the onus probandi is cast upon the claimant. But that is not this case. Here is a prosecution against a person for a penalty. He may be confined and imprisoned under the provisions of this act. Now, what says the statute? Prove all that the Government need prove; prove the importation; prove the buying or the selling; prove the possession by the defendant who is prosecuted of the goods proved to have been imported; and then he is guilty—not a matter to be left to the jury, but so far the whole matter is with the court. If the court is satisfied that the case as it stands upon the evidence offered on the part of the prosecution presents a probable cause of guilt, then it is made the duty of the court to tell the jury "the case now stands in that situation that there must be a verdict of guilty unless the defendant satisfies you of his innocence." I say that that is contrary to anything to be found in the books, as far as my recollection goes.

The honorable member from Massachusetts said very properly that the term "probable cause" is not so familiar to common-law lawyers as to those familiar with the Roman law. He seemed to suppose that that phrase was not known to the common law. In that I think he is mistaken. Those words are in our statutes; they are familiar in cases of prize and in all cases of admiralty.

Mr. SUMNER. Under the Roman law.

Mr. JOHNSON. If a party seizes a vessel during war, or seizes her under the revenue acts, and he is sued by the alleged owner, who proves to be the real owner, he escapes personal responsibility by proving to the satisfaction of the judge that he had probable cause for the seizure; and the certificate of that probable cause is a defense in any action which may be brought forward by the owner of the goods to recover damages sustained by him in consequence of the seizure. That is for the protection of the officers of the Government, and is a wise provision. They would be very unwilling to capture vessels as prizes of war, or to seize them for an alleged violation of the revenue acts if they were to be responsible on the contingency that it should turn that the vessel was not prize of war or if there was no ground for the seizure. But that is not this case, nor anything like it. Under the desire to prevent smuggling—an object that we all have at heart—it is proposed by this bill, as I think, to change all the rules of evidence. The honorable member says that the judge is in the habit frequently of stating in the trial of cases before him upon whom is the burden of proof cast. That is true; but does he say that to the jury in a criminal case? Has he any right in a criminal case to tell the jury, "In my opinion the man is guilty?" In a civil case, if the judge thinks, upon the evidence, that the case as it stands in point of law casts upon the defendant the burden of proving his defense, or that it stands in such a situation that it casts on the plaintiff the burden, changes the onus, he tells the jury so; but that is a question of law which may be carried up to the courts above, and his mistake corrected if he happens to make a mistake. This, however, cannot be carried up; there is no review of this; the judgment of the judge below is conclusive in the sense that it cannot be reviewed, and it is conclusive upon the action of the jury. If I understand this section, it is put there for the very purpose of being conclusive. It is to tell the jury virtually, "The man is guilty unless he satisfies you that he is innocent."

Mr. EDMUNDS. With all respect, sir, I cannot help thinking that my friend from Maryland is the person who misapprehends the scope of this clause of the seventy-first section of the act of 1799 rather than myself. The language which operates upon this subject is "actions, suits, or informations." The term "informations," as used in this act against property where any seizure is made pursuant to the act, is a technical term perfectly well known to the law and to lawyers. It is what is in the admiralty practice, in the cases of seizure in rem, called a libel of information; but in the more condensed language of the statute it is simply termed an information. When goods are seized by a customs officer for a breach of the revenue laws an information is filed against them; and if any party fails to come forward and claim the goods they are condemned without any hearing at all upon the mere seizure. If any person comes forward, according to the rules of the court, and makes oath that he is the owner of the goods, he is then entitled to enter his claim; and the term "claimant" is a technical term perfectly well understood by everybody who practices in those courts as indicating, not the plaintiff in an action at common law, not the defendant in an action of trover or trespass, but the party in a court of admiralty who, in a proceeding in rem, comes upon the record as making a formal claim to the property.

My conclusion, therefore, is that these provisions of the act of 1799 respecting the onus probandi in cases of seizure being upon the claimant, are provisions which by the very letter as well as the spirit of the act apply to prosecutions against the property itself where a claimant, technically and legally known as such, appears in court and claims the property. In those cases, if I correctly understand the act of 1799, probable cause having been made out on the part of the prosecution, the onus probandi is then turned over to the claimant who asks that the property may be delivered to him, to explain the circumstances under which he introduced it.

Now, what is "probable cause?" It is very difficult to define the distinction between the meaning of the term "probable cause" and the meaning of the term "prima facie evidence." It would puzzle anybody except a Philadelphia lawyer to make any sensible and satisfactory distinction between these two terms. Then in a case of property—I leave aside, for a moment, entirely that part of it which relates to condemnation and fine as to the person—is it too hard to say to a claimant who comes into court and asks that property may be delivered up to him, prima facie evidence having been brought forward on the part of the Government that the property is justly subject to forfeiture, "You shall not be entitled to receive it out of court again until you bring forward some proof to meet this prima facie or probable evidence which has been adduced against you?" In my judgment it certainly is not.

Then the question is whether this bill which we have under consideration goes beyond the act of 1799; and I may say, indeed, before I come to that, that my experience on the border in the practice in the circuit and district courts of the United States, presided over by Judge Smalley and Judge Nelson, has been precisely in accordance with the construction which I put upon the act of 1799. When I began, not many years ago, in those courts, I was quite as restive with my common-law education about this notion of the onus probandi being upon the party whose goods were seized as anybody could be; I did not like it; my clients did not like it, for I generally appeared for the claimants, not being district attorney; but the inviolable practice in that district (and I have no doubt in the southern district of New York, where very large numbers of these cases occur) has been, as a matter of course, without debate, to apply the provisions which I have read from the act of 1799 to every cause of prosecution against property under the revenue acts; and probable cause being shown, to then call upon the defendant to overcome it if he could.

Now, to come to the act which we have in question; this fourth section provides for two descriptions of things: one is the forfeiture of merchandise which may be illegally imported, and the other is the punishment of the person who shall be guilty of the illegal and fraudulent importation. So far as the application of this rule of evidence to a case of distinct prosecution against a person by which he may be deprived of his liberty is concerned, I entirely agree to what has been said by the Senator from Maryland that it is going beyond what the law has been hitherto and is going beyond the just principles which ought to furnish security in cases where liberty is involved; but when you limit it, as my amendment proposes to limit it, to cases of seizure of goods provided for in that section, and to cases where a party voluntarily appears in court and claims the property, then it appears to me that it is not asking too much to require such a claimant, probable cause having been made out against the property, to introduce some proof in order to authorize the court to give it up to him. In most cases, in all cases of admiralty seizure, of maritime jurisdiction, that is not a question for a jury at all; it is only in cases of municipal seizure that a jury has anything to do with it; so that with the amendment which I have had the honor to submit it appears to me that we are only standing exactly upon the theory and practice under the act of 1799.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I feel a little interest in this bill as I live on the northwestern frontier where there is more or less of the business of smuggling, and I know that there is a necessity for stringent legislation upon that subject. I believe that this amendment which is proposed by the Committee on Commerce to this bill is not objectionable, and I am not very certain that the bill as it originally stood would be too strong in its application to cases of this description. To import goods into the United States is a lawful business, though goods may be imported contrary to law, and in that respect the business of importation stands upon a different footing, as it appears to me, from other kinds of business to which reference has been made during this discussion for illustration. Larceny is not a lawful business, burglary is not a lawful business, arson is not a lawful business; but the importation of goods is a lawful business, and therefore there is greater difficulty in detecting a violation of law in that business than under other circumstances that have been suggested by those who object to this amendment. This amendment, as I understand it, where probable cause appears for a prosecution, transfers the onus probandi to the defendant. I do not think that this provision contravenes the provisions of law applicable to criminal prosecutions in other cases as has been suggested. Now, where a man is prosecuted for larceny and has possession of the stolen goods within a reasonable time after the commission of the crime, that time is presumptive evidence of his guilt, and it becomes necessary for him to explain that possession and rebut the presumption which arises from that fact. Where goods have been imported contrary to law, and they are found soon after their importation in a man's possession, this amendment simply requires him to explain that possession and show how he came to have in his hands goods that had been imported contrary to law.

Mr. CLARK. Suppose the Senator should turn his attention to the case of a man who has counterfeit money in his possession, which is an offense where there is an intent to pass it, would it be quite just to impose the burden of proof on the man who happened to have the money? A man may buy an article which has been imported contrary to law, not knowing it, in the same way that he may have a counterfeit bill and not know it. The law does not impose upon the man having the counterfeit bill the onus of the proof showing that he did not know that it was counterfeit. It is a case more analogous to this than the one put by the Senator, I think.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think not, because the case which I put is the case where a man is found in the possession of goods to which he has no right by law, and in this case the man is found in the possession of goods to which he has no right by law, so that the cases, as it seems to me, are analogous cases.

Upon the northwestern frontier it is customary for persons to go on board vessels at Victoria and come around to Portland with trunks and packages, and to violate the revenue laws in that way; and when a prosecution is commenced against the master of the vessel, although the fact of the importation contrary to law is established as a general rule, the defense that he makes is that he was ignorant of the fact that the goods were brought upon his vessel or that they were brought into the port of Portland contrary to the law. Now, if the law be that the fact that he has imported those goods in violation of the law is probable cause of prosecution, and he understands it to be the law, then it will make him diligent, and when goods are brought on board his vessel he will see to it that they are goods that can be transported, or on which the duties are paid, and that they are not brought into the ports of the United States contrary to law.

In that respect I think this provision will be of advantage. It will make it necessary for masters and those who have the management of ships to be more diligent to prevent smuggling. Trunks of opium, for instance, are taken on ships at Victoria and brought to Portland. When the master of the vessel is prosecuted for smuggling, the fact that a trunk filled with opium has been brought from a British port to an American port contrary to law is undeniable, but the master undertakes to defend himself upon the ground that he was ignorant, that he did not know that there were such goods on board his vessel, and if he is inattentive to his duties he may successfully make that defense; but if, when the fact is established that he has imported these goods contrary to law, he is then compelled to show that he did not know that the goods were on board the ship, it seems to me that he will be more diligent and take more pains to see that the laws of the country are maintained in this respect.

It seems to me that to declare that when probable cause for the prosecution is established the onus probandi shall be on the defendant, is not a proposition that is objectionable as urged by gentlemen who oppose it, and that in cases of this description it is absolutely necessary. Possession of the goods by the man who transports them or by any person after they are transported is probable cause if the goods are found in his possession within a reasonable time. That constitutes probable cause; and what does the court say to the jury when a man is prosecuted for smuggling or prosecuted for assisting in smuggling and the fact appears to the court and jury that these goods after their arrival at the port were in the possession of the individual prosecuted? Now, the court say "the possession of these goods at this time, within a short time after they arrive in the port, is probable cause." If a long time elapsed, their possession would not amount to probable cause, as in a case of larceny; but if the goods that are smuggled into the port are found soon after in the possession of an individual who is prosecuted for a violation of this law, the court would say to the jury, "Gentlemen, this fact that the goods were in the possession of this man is probable cause for the prosecution, and it is necessary that he should explain this possession and show that it is consistent with his innocence."

That is all, it seems to me, that this provision amounts to, and it is not an unreasonable provision; and I think that, considering the difficulties in maintaining prosecutions for violations of this law and the various arts and expedients that are resorted to by men engaged in this business, this is not a rule too stringent and it will be found to operate well in practice.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, if the illustrations given by the honorable Senator from Oregon were to be taken as an exemplification of how this section was to be applied, I should hesitate very much before I should vote for the proposed amendment. The honorable Senator says that the captains of ships and the owners of ships must be made responsible when they bring goods into the country which are contraband goods, which are dutiable, but upon which the duties have not been paid; that they must be subject to punishment. I think he gives us an illustration that would, in the cases to which he calls our attention, prohibit all trade whatever. I submit to the Senator himself, in regard to the ships trading between Oregon and the British port of Victoria, in British Columbia, and between that port and the ports of California, that it is simply impossible for the captains of those vessels to know the contents of every trunk that comes on board. How can it be done? Must a captain demand that every trunk and every package shall be opened before it goes on his ship? I apprehend not; and yet if a trunk is found to contain opium when it arrives at Portland in Oregon, or San Francisco in California, in possession of a passenger without the knowledge of the captain, it being impossible for him to know, he having exercised all the vigilance possible—

Mr. JOHNSON. In a passenger's private baggage?

Mr. CONNESS. In his private baggage I am speaking of. His ship is at stake; although his ship may not be forfeited by the law, he knows that he will be subject to continuous and expensive prosecutions and litigations with all the diligence that he can exercise; and incited by these consequences, he is yet to be held responsible. I think it would be the interest of every man to put his money into something else than into American ships under such circumstances.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator will allow me to say that is not my position. I simply say that he ought to be responsible unless he can show that he was ignorant of the fact, and therefore innocent. When the master of a vessel imports goods into the United States contrary to law, the onus of proving his innocence ought to be upon the master, in my opinion.

Mr. CONNESS. Does the Senator not use a term not exactly the best there, when he speaks of the master of a vessel importing goods? The master of a vessel commands the ship. The cargo is taken on board. The cargo consists of goods imported by merchants in Portland or in San Francisco. They are the importers. They know the contents of the cargo. The captain cannot possibly know; he is not the importer in any sense as I understand it. He simply commands the ship and sees that his ship is safe from port to port. It is true that the law holds him not to be in complicity with the violation of the revenue laws, and that is right. But if he have no such complicity at all, why shall you construct a law that shall hold him for knowing the contents of every private package brought on board of his ship? If that were the effect of this amendment I could not vote for it; but I do not so understand the amendment. I may misunderstand it, but if that be its effect I think it ought not to be adopted. All that the laws of the United States can hold our ship-masters and ship-owners to is the honest exercise of all the vigilance that they can employ to prevent smuggling. When they have yielded that much, they should certainly not be held responsible further than that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the amendment of the committee to insert after the word "probandi" the words "in cases of seizure," and to strike out the word "defendant" and insert the word "claimant;" so that the amendment will read:

And the onus probandi in cases of seizure shall lie upon the claimant where probable cause is shown for such prosecution, to be judged of by the court before whom the prosecution is had.

Mr. HOWE. It strikes me that that changes the character of the proposed amendment entirely. It provides for a proceeding in rem while the committee's amendment has reference to a proceeding in personam.

Mr. MORRILL. So far as the burden of proof is concerned, it is precisely in harmony with the act of 1799.

Mr. HOWE. It changes the character of the whole section. It is a provision which has nothing to do with the residue of the section. The section then will read that if a man buys goods illegally imported, knowing them to be illegally imported, he shall be fined and imprisoned, and the burden of proving something shall lie upon the claimant, if probable cause is shown.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, has forgotten, I fear, the amendment which has already been adopted in the eighth line of this section, which declares, as a consequence of this illegal importation, knowing it to be an illegal importation, the goods, wares, and merchandise shall be forfeited. It is to that part of the section that this second amendment will apply, if my amendment be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment as amended.

Mr. MORRILL. Take the yeas and nays in the Senate; let us get on with the bill.

Mr. HOWE. Very well.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment was in section seven, line three, after the word "days" to insert the words "after the facts shall come to their knowledge;" in line four, to strike out the words "seizure may be made or forfeiture," and to insert "fine or personal;" in line twelve, to strike out the words, "in addition to proceedings for forfeiture of any property which may be seized, he," and to insert the words "such district attorney;" in line sixteen, before the word "personal," to insert the words "fines and;" in line seventeen, to strike out the words "such district attorney;" in line eighteen, to insert the word "he" before the word "shall;" in line twenty, after the word "instituted," to insert "in which case he shall report the facts to the Secretary of the Treasury for his direction;" in line twenty-one, to insert the words "fines and" before the word "personal;" in line twenty-nine, to strike out the word "his" and to insert "such collectors," and also to insert the word "or" before the word "penalty;" and in line thirty to strike out the words "or forfeiture" before the word "imposed;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the several collectors of customs to report within ten days after the facts shall come to their knowledge to the district attorney of the district in which any fine or personal penalty may be incurred for the violation of any law of the United States relating to the revenue, a statement of all the facts and circumstances of the case within their knowledge, together with the names of the witnesses, and which may come to their knowledge from time to time, stating the provisions of the law believed to be violated, and on which a reliance may be had for a condemnation or conviction; and such district attorney shall cause suit and prosecution to be commenced and prosecuted without delay for the fines and personal penalties by law in such case provided, unless upon inquiry and examination he shall decide that a conviction cannot probably be obtained, or that the exercise of public justice does not require that a suit or prosecution should be instituted; in which case he shall report the facts to the Secretary of the Treasury for his direction, and for expenses incurred and services rendered in prosecutions for such fines and personal penalties the district attorney shall receive such allowance as the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem just and reasonable, upon the certificate of the Judge before whom such prosecution was had; and if any collector shall in any case fail to report to the proper district attorney, as prescribed in this section, such collector's share of any fine or penalty imposed or incurred in such case shall be forfeited to the United States, and the same shall be awarded to such persons as may make complaint and prosecute the same to conviction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eight, line two, after the word "where" to insert the words "a vessel or;" in line four to strike out the word "the" and insert the word "such" before the word "vessel," and after the word "vessel" to strike out the words "of which he is so the owner, master, or manager;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That in any case where a vessel or the owner, master, or manager of a vessel shall be subject to a penalty for a violation of the revenue laws of the United States, such vessel shall be held for the payment of such penalty, and may be seized and proceeded against summarily, by libel, to recover such penalty, in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ten, line ten, to insert the words "without reasonable excuse" before the word "neglect;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That every officer or other person authorized to make searches and seizures by this act shall, at the time of executing any of the powers conferred upon him by this act, make known, upon being questioned, his character as an officer or agent of the customs or Government, and shall have authority to demand of any person within the distance of three miles to assist him in making any arrest, search, or seizure authorized by this act, where such assistance may be necessary; and if such person shall without reasonable excuse neglect or refuse so to assist, upon proper demand, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall forfeit a sum not exceeding two hundred dollars, nor less than five dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eleven, line three, after the word "act" to insert "or any other act relating to the customs, or the registering, enrolling, or licensing of vessels, now in force;" and in line twelve to strike out the word "respectable" and insert "competent;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That in all cases of seizure of property subject to forfeiture for any of the causes named in this act, or any other act relating to the customs, or the registering, enrolling, or licensing of vessels now in force, when, in the opinion of the collector or other principal officer of the revenue making such seizure, the value of the property so seized shall not exceed $500, he shall cause a list and particular description of the property so seized to be prepared in duplicate, and an appraisal of the same to be made by two sworn appraisers under the revenue laws, if there are such appraisers at or near the place of seizure; but if there are no such appraisers then by two competent and disinterested citizens of the United States, to be selected by him for that purpose, residing at or near the place of seizure, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section twelve, line twenty-six, after the word "sale" to insert "from time to time," and at the end of line twenty-seven to add "in all;" so that the proviso to the section will read:

Provided, That the collector shall have power to adjourn such sale from time to time for a period not exceeding thirty days in all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirteen, line five, after the word "restoration" to strike out the word "and" and to insert the words "of the."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section fifteen, line seven, to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$500;" so that it will read:

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That whenever seizure shall be made of any property which, in the opinion of the appraisers, shall be liable to perish or waste, or to be greatly reduced in value by keeping, or cannot be kept without great disproportionate expense, whether such seizure consist of live animals, or goods, wares, or merchandise, and when the property thus seized shall not exceed $500 in value, and when no claim shall have been interposed therefor as is hereinbefore provided, the said appraisers, if requested by the collector or principal officer making the seizure at the time when such appraisal is made, shall certify on oath in their appraisal their belief that the property seized is liable to speedy deterioration or that the expenses of its keeping will largely reduce the net proceeds of the sale, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the sixteenth section, in the following words:

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That whenever any seizure shall be made under this act, and the appraised value of the property seized shall not exceed $500, the collector of customs may at his own risk deliver the same for safe keeping to any person, upon such person executing to such collector a bond, with good sureties, in a penal sum double such appraised value, conditioned that he will redeliver to such collector, in as good condition as when delivered to him, and free of expense or charges, such property on demand, to answer to any proceedings pending or to be instituted for a condemnation thereof; and such collector shall proceed and make advertisement as is hereinbefore provided the same as if such property had remained in his possession; and if such property shall not be forthcoming to be sold at the time and place appointed for the sale thereof, said collector shall account for such appraised value of the property as though the same had been sold, and the obligors in said bond shall be liable thereon to said collector for said appraised value and all expenses attending the seizure and other proceedings.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seventeen, line two, after the word "Treasury," to strike out the words, "shall have authority to remit, in whole or in part, and upon such terms as he shall judge proper, all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, not exceeding $1,000 in value, incurred or accruing from any infraction of the revenue laws, and he;" in line six to strike out the word "also;" and in line seven to insert the word "fines" before the word "penalties;" and after the word "penalties" to insert the words "and forfeitures;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have authority to ascertain the facts upon all applications for remission of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred or accruing under the revenue laws, where the amount in question does not exceed $1,000, in such manner and under such regulations as he may deem proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of the seventeenth section the following:

And he may thereupon remit or mitigate such fines, penalties, or forfeitures if in his opinion the same shall have been incurred without willful negligence or any intention of fraud.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the nineteenth section, as follows:

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be taken to abridge or limit any forfeiture, penalty, fine, liability, or remedy provided for or existing under any law now in force.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section twenty, line five, to insert the word "triplicate" before the word "invoice."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section twenty-one, as follows:

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That whenever any collector or other officer of the customs entitled to a distributive share of the proceeds of any goods, wares, merchandise, or other property, which have been seized for an alleged violation of the revenue laws and appraised, shall consider such appraisal too low he may submit a full statement of the case, in writing, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who may, if, from a consideration of the facts set forth in such statement, he deems it to be for the interest of the revenue, direct that a second appraisal of such goods, wares, merchandise, or other property, or any portion thereof, shall be made, and may make such regulations relating thereto as he may deem proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section twenty-two, line fifteen, to strike out the words "forfeit and" before the word "pay," and also to strike out the word "penalty," and insert the words "tonnage duty;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That if any goods, wares, or merchandise shall, at any port or place in the United States on the northern, northeastern, or northwestern frontiers thereof, be laden upon any vessel belonging wholly or in part to a subject or subjects of a foreign country or countries, and shall be taken thence to a foreign port or place to be reladen and reshipped to any other port or place in the United States on said frontiers, either by the same or any other vessel, foreign or American, with intent to evade the provisions of the fourth section of "the act concerning the navigation of the United States," approved March 1, 1817, the said goods, wares, and merchandise shall, on their arrival at such last-named port or place, be seized and forfeited to the United States, and the vessel shall pay a tonnage duty of fifty cents per ton on her admeasurement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section twenty-three, line three, after the word "States," to insert the word "plying;" and in line seven to strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That all steam tug-boats, not of the United States, found and employed in towing documented vessels of the United States plying from one port or place in the same to another, shall forfeit and pay the sum of fifty cents per ton on the admeasurement of every such vessel so towed by them, respectively, as aforesaid, which sum may be recovered by way of libel or suit.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section twenty-four, line twenty-eight, to strike out the words "and in addition," and to insert "or said master, or other person, having charge of such vessel;" and in line thirty-one, after the word "years," to strike out the words "or both;" so that the clause will read:

But if it shall be found that the quantity or quantities of such articles or any part thereof so reported are excessive, it shall be lawful for the collector or other officer of the customs to estimate the amount of duty on such excess, which shall be forthwith paid by said master or other person having charge of said vessel, on pain of forfeiting a sum of not less than $100 nor more than four times the value of such excess, or said master, or other person, having charge of such vessel shall be liable to imprisonment for a term of not less than three months nor more than two years, at the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I do not know that I have any objection to this twenty-fourth section, but I call attention to the fact that so far as goods denominated "sea stores," purchased by vessels trading or passing from one port to another, are concerned, they are to be hereafter free from duty. So much of the revenue laws as have reference to the imposition of duty on those goods are to be abolished. They are to be purchased in foreign countries and are to be free from taxation under our revenue system, and thus that portion of commerce is to be relieved from the burden that other trades are required to submit to. I simply desire to say that it is another inroad, as I understand it.

Mr. MORRILL. Oh, no; this is no inroad; it is a restriction, not a license. They do not pay now for sea stores, and this is to prevent a practice which has grown up on the frontiers of purchasing large quantities of sea stores.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I am very glad to hear that that is the fact.

The next amendment was in section twenty-five, line seven, after the word "States," to insert "under the laws of the United States;" and in line seven, after the word "States," to insert "or a vessel intended to be employed in such trade;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That the equipments, and any part thereof, (including boats,) purchased for, or the expenses of repairs made in a foreign country upon, a vessel enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States to engage in the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, or a vessel intended to be employed in such trade, shall, on the first arrival of such vessel in any port of the United States, be liable to entry and the payment of an ad valorem duty of fifty per cent. on the cost thereof in such foreign country, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section twenty-six, line two, to insert the word "registry" before the word "enrollment;" and to strike out the word "and" and to insert the word "or" before the word "license;" and in line three, after the word "granted," to insert the words "in lieu thereof;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That if any certificate of registry, enrollment, or license, or other record or document granted in lieu thereof to any vessel, shall be knowingly or fraudulently obtained or used for any vessel not entitled to the benefit thereof, such vessel with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be liable to forfeiture.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section twenty-eight, line two, after the word "merchandise," to strike out the words "of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States;" in line fifteen, to strike out the word "the" and insert the word "and" before the word "pay;" in line sixteen, to strike out "twenty" and insert "one hundred;" and in line seventeen, to strike out "one" and insert "five;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 28. And be it further enacted, That no goods, wares, or merchandise taken from any port or place in the United States, on the northern, northeastern, or northwestern frontiers thereof, to a port or place in another collection district of the United States on said frontiers in any ship or vessel, otherwise than by sea, shall be unladen or delivered from such ship or vessel within the United States but in open day, that is to say, between the rising and setting of the sun, except by special license from the collector or other principal officer of the port for the purpose, nor at any time without a permit from such collector or other principal officer for such unloading or delivery. And the owner or owners of every vessel whose master or manager shall neglect to comply with the provisions of this section, shall forfeit and pay to the United States a sum not less than $100 nor more than $500: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, from time to time, to make such regulations as to him shall seem necessary and expedient for unloading at and clearance from any port or place on said frontiers of ships or vessels at night.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty, line five, after the word "two," to insert the word "of;" and in line eight to insert the word "of" before the word "the."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty-one, line two, after the words "hereby is," to strike out the following words:

Authorized to abolish the office of collector and that of surveyor of customs, or either, in any collection district, the net annual revenue of which does not now or at any time hereafter shall not exceed the sum of $10,000, and to connect such district with an adjoining district, if, in his opinion, it would be to the advantage of the public service or revenue, or to assign the duties of the office to a deputy collector or other officer; and the said Secretary is hereby further.

So that the section will read:

SEC. 31. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized, whenever he shall think it advantageous to the public service or revenue, to abolish or suspend the offices of naval officer, surveyor of customs, or any other subordinate office in any collection district of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty-one, line fourteen, after the words "United States" to insert the following words:

Except in those enumerated in section nine of the act of May 7, 1822, and the amendment thereto, by the act of April 9, 1864, and the port of San Francisco.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like the honorable member from Maine to explain that exception. I do not understand it.

Mr. MORRILL. It will be seen that the Secretary of the Treasury has authority by this section to abolish certain naval officers, surveyors, &c., except in the cases specified in a certain act, and those cases are those that apply to Portland, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, New Orleans, and San Francisco. The offices at those places are deemed important; the other offices are not deemed important. It was not thought advisable to give this power over the officers at those important places, but at other ports where they are unimportant to the public service we give the Secretary this power.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am satisfied.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty-one, line twenty, to strike out the word "district" and insert the word "customs;" so that the clause will read:

And to assign the duties of the office of surveyor or any other subordinate offices so abolished or suspended to a deputy collector or inspector of the customs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section thirty-two in the following words:

SEC. 32. And be it further enacted, That no collector, deputy collector, auditor, cashier, disbursing clerk, or other officer or employé of the customs, whose duty it shall be to make payments on account of the salary or wages of any inspector, appraiser, examiner, weigher, gauger, or other employé of the customs or internal revenue, shall make any payment to any such officer or other person connected with the customs or internal revenue on account of any salary or wages due to him or her by reason of any services rendered by him or her, unless such inspector, appraiser, examiner, weigher, gauger, or other employé shall have made and subscribed an oath that during the period for which he or she is to receive pay on account of his or her salary or wages, he or she has not received or accepted any money, either as a loan or otherwise, or any gratuity, reward, pay, or compensation of any name, nature, or description whatsoever, nor any promises for the same, either directly or indirectly, nor purchased from any importer, (if affiant is connected with the customs, or "manufacturer," if affiant is connected with the internal revenue service,) consignee, agent, or custom-house broker, any goods, wares, or merchandise at less than regular retail market prices therefor, or placed himself or herself under any official obligations to any such importer, (or manufacturer, as the case may be,) consignee, agent, or custom-house broker in any way whatever, nor has any such payment, loan, gratuity, reward, present of any wines or liquors of any kind, cigars, nor any other goods, wares, or merchandise been received or accepted, or such purchase made or obligations incurred by any member of his or her family, or by any friend or friends for him or her or his or her family, from or to any importer, custom-house broker, or any other person whomsoever, for or on account of any official services rendered or to be rendered by him or her during the period for which he or she is to receive such payment, without duly paying over or delivering the same to the collector and reporting the name of donor. And any person who shall willfully and falsely take and subscribe said oath shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment at hard labor for a period of not less than two years and not to exceed ten years, and shall thereafter be disqualified from holding any office of trust or profit under the United States.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 32. And be it further enacted, That no officer or clerk whose duty it shall be to make payments on account of the salary or wages of any officer or person employed in connection with the customs or the internal revenue service shall make any payment to any officer or person so employed on account of services rendered, or of salary, unless such officer or person so to be paid shall have made and subscribed an oath that, during the period for which he or she is to receive pay for salary or services rendered, neither he nor she, nor any member of his or her family, has received, either personally or by the intervention of another party, any money or compensation of any description whatever, nor any promises for the same, either directly or indirectly, for services rendered or to be rendered, or acts performed or to be performed, in connection with the customs or internal revenue, nor purchased, for like services or acts, from any importer, (if affiant is connected with the customs,) or manufacturer, (if affiant is connected with the internal revenue service,) consignee, agent, or custom-house broker, or other person whomsoever, any goods, wares, or merchandise, at less than regular retail market prices therefor. And any person who shall willfully and falsely take and subscribe said oath, and being duly convicted thereof, shall be subjected to the penalties and disabilities by law prescribed for the punishment of willful and corrupt perjury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty-three, line one, after the word "all," to strike out the following words:

Goods, wares, merchandise, or property of any kind seized under the provisions of this act or any other law of the United States relating to the customs, shall, unless otherwise provided for by law, be placed and remain in the custody of the collector or other principal officer of the customs of the district in which the seizure shall be made, to abide adjudication by the proper tribunal or other disposition according to law; and the.

So that the section will read:

SEC. 33. And be it further enacted, That all proceedings in regard to fines, penalties, and forfeitures by virtue of this act and not herein prescribed, shall be the same as are now provided by law in like cases; and all such fines, penalties, and forfeitures shall, after deducting all proper costs and charges, be disposed of and applied as provided for in the ninety-first section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 2, 1799.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the honorable member from Maine what is the object of striking that out. It provides that the goods seized shall remain in the possession of the collector. The provision seems to me to be a very wholesome one, and unless it is substantially covered by existing laws, one that ought to be adopted. It provides that the goods seized shall remain in the custody of the officer, to abide the decision of the court. That the committee propose to strike out. I should like to know from the member from Maine what are the reasons for striking it out.

Mr. MORRILL. My recollection of it is that it is stricken out because it does not happen to be relevant to this section, and is provided for in another section of the bill.

Mr. CLARK. We had better negative the amendment now, and that fact can be ascertained when the bill comes in the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to that course being taken.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in section thirty-three, line seventeen, after the word "when" to insert the word "any" and to strike out the letter "s" in the word "officers;" in line nineteen to strike out the word "make" and insert the words "furnish information to the collector leading to a;" in line twenty to strike out the final "s" in the word "seizures," and also to strike out the word "they" and insert "he;" and after the word "distribution" in line twenty-one to insert the words "with such collector, naval officer, or surveyor;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That when any officer of the customs, other than the collector, naval officer, or surveyor, shall furnish information to the collector leading to a seizure, he shall be entitled to an equal share of the distribution with such collector, naval officer, or surveyor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of section thirty-four the words "or steamboat inspector."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the thirty-fifth section, in the following words:

Sec. 35. And be it further enacted, That in all cases in which the fees and emoluments received by any collector or other principal officer of the customs are, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, insufficient to afford a reasonable compensation for the services of such officer, after payment out of the same of reasonable incidental expenses of the office, the said Secretary may direct that so much of the said incidental expenses as shall seem to him to be just, shall be paid out of the appropriation for paying the expenses of collecting the revenue; and the said Secretary shall have the same power in regard to incidental expenses which have heretofore been incurred, and which have not been settled and paid into the Treasury; and all fees paid into the Treasury by custom officers shall be placed to the credit of the fund for defraying expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty-seven, line one, to insert the word "any" before the word "person," and in line two to strike out the word "whatever;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 37. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, directly or indirectly, at any time make or offer to make to any officer of the revenue, or to any other person or persons authorized by this act to make searches or seizures, any gratuity or present of money, or other thing of value, or give or offer any bribe or reward, of whatever nature, with intent to influence or induce such officer or other person or persons to do any act in violation of his or her or their official duty, or to refrain from doing anything which, under the law, it is or shall be his or her or their duty to do, every person so offending shall be liable to indictment, as for a high crime and misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction for the trial of crimes and misdemeanors, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding three times the amount so offered, promised, or given, and imprisoned in a penitentiary not exceeding three years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section forty, line three, after the word "bushels" to strike out the words, "may, at the discretion of the collector," and to insert the word "shall;" and in line four, after the word "measuring" to strike out the words "in which case" and insert the word "and;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 40. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of estimating the duties on importations of grain, the number of bushels shall be ascertained by weight instead of measuring; and sixty pounds of wheat, fifty-six pounds of corn, fifty-six pounds of rye, forty-eight pounds of barley, thirty-two pounds of oats, sixty pounds of peas, and forty-two pounds of buckwheat, avoirdupois weight, shall respectively be estimated as a bushel.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section forty-one, line eight, to strike out the word "the" and insert the word "any" before the word "district," and after the word "judge" to insert the words, "of the United States;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 41. And be it further enacted, That in order to facilitate the execution of the provisions of the seventh section of the act entitled "An act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, to provide for the more certain and speedy collection of claims in favor of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, relative to the seizure of "invoices, books, and papers," any district judge of the United States may hereafter issue his warrant or warrants and direct the same to any collector or collectors of the customs in whose respective districts any such invoices, books, or papers may be thought to be.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the forty-second section, as follows:

Sec. 42. And be it further enacted, That section eleven of the act of March 3, 1863, last above mentioned, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows, to wit: that there shall be taxed and paid to district attorneys two per cent. upon all moneys collected or realized in any suit or proceeding conducted by them respectively, in which the United States are a party, excepting cases of prize of war. The act in relation to costs, approved February 26, 1853, shall not apply to such allowances; and the said section eleven is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section forty-three, line eight, to strike out the word "removed" and to insert "subject to be removed," and in line nine to insert the word "to" before the word "forfeit;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 43. And be it further enacted, That if any collector of the customs, or other officer or agent, shall neglect or refuse to comply with the provisions of the first section of the act entitled "An act requiring all moneys receivable from customs and from all other sources to be paid immediately into the Treasury, without abatement or reduction, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1849, he shall be subject to be removed from office and to forfeit to the United States any share or part of the moneys withheld to which he might otherwise be entitled.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to know from the Senator having the bill in charge why the neglect or refusal to comply with the act referred to in this section should not lead to a removal at once instead of leaving it dependent on the Secretary whether he will remove or not where an officer has clearly violated his duty.

Mr. MORRILL. We leave that to be judged of by the Secretary.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know you do. It is a very important provision as the law stands. The United States heretofore have lost an immense deal of money by moneys being retained by officers to meet possible suits against them. It is not necessary to mention names, but they have lost an immense deal of money in that way. In order to guard against that, a law was passed several years ago making it the duty of the officer, although threatened with suit, where moneys are paid under protest for duties alleged to be improperly exacted, to pay the money over to the Treasury at once. And if the suits terminated against him, then the Government paid it.

Mr. MORRILL. Suppose he had a good excuse.

Mr. JOHNSON. What excuse can he have for not paying the money over? The provision in this section is that "if any collector of the customs, or other officer or agent, shall neglect or refuse to comply with the first section of the act"—that is the act that makes it an imperative duty upon them, a duty found necessary by the losses which the Government sustained, to pay the money over at once—"he shall be removed from his office." I cannot imagine what possible excuse there can be for not paying the money over, and if there be no excuse it is to be of itself conclusive as to his removal. Instead of that, if this amendment should be adopted, it is left discretionary with the Secretary to remove or not to remove.

Mr. MORRILL. He is liable to removal, of course, without any provision of law. He is entirely within the power of the President or the Secretary of the Treasury unless we should succeed in limiting the power of appointment or removal, which seems somewhat unlikely at present. The provision is but a qualified provision. He is always within the power of the Secretary. It is made imperative in the bill as introduced that he shall be removed upon the happening of a certain contingency, which can never be made absolutely certain. The very title of the act referred to shows that there is to be a discretion—"An act requiring all moneys receivable from customs and from all other sources to be paid immediately into the Treasury, without abatement or reduction, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1849. The idea of the committee was that an officer might be acting very honestly and very properly, and believe that he had paid over everything that he had in his hands, and it might turn out upon a settlement that i. e. had money in his hands which he ought to have paid over. We supposed that instead of making the removal upon any assumed contingency absolute, the interests of the Government would certainly be protected if the Legislature fixed that as one of the causes which should subject an officer to removal. That is the only reason for the committee's adoption of this phrase.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is another objection to it. There ought to be, besides the liability to removal, some mode by which he could be compelled by a proceeding to pay over the money he had withheld.

Mr. MORRILL. That may be done under his bond.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is very doubtful whether this amendment would not change the meaning of the bond. If we adopt the amendment the committee propose, in case a collector or other officer, who has received money for the Government, does not pay it over, he may not be removed unless the authorities think proper to remove him, and may not forfeit anything. It makes, therefore, the liability to forfeiture to the United States depend upon the discretion of the superior officer. I think that is contrary to what has been the practice all along.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section forty-five, line seven, after the word "shall" to insert the words "upon conviction thereof before the district court of his district;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 45. And be it further enacted, That if any collector of the customs, supervising or local inspector of steamboats, or other officer, shall neglect or refuse to make any of the returns or reports which he is required to make at stated times by any act of Congress or regulation of the Treasury Department, other than his accounts, within the time prescribed by such act or regulation, he shall, upon conviction thereof before the district court of his district, forfeit and pay, for the use of the United States, any sum not less than $100 nor more than $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section forty-six, line four, after the word "five" to strike out the following words:

And all of the third section, excepting the second and last provisos thereof, of the act entitled "An act to provide for the support of the Military Academy of the United States for the year 1838, and for other purposes," approved July 7, 1838.

So that the section will read:

Sec. 46. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act for the more effectual recovery of debts due from individuals to the United States," approved March 3, 1795; and the act entitled "An act to extend for a longer period the several acts now in force for the relief of insolvent debtors of the United States," approved May 27, 1840, &c., be, and the same are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section forty-six, line twenty-seven, after the word "nine," to strike out the following words:

And the fifth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1841," approved March 3, 1841.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section forty-seven, in the following words:

Sec. 47. And be it further enacted, That this act may be cited by the name of "the customs protective act of 1866."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has occurred to me that there is a serious difference in the provisions which the second and third sections of this bill make in respect to the forfeitures which shall be applied to water craft and land craft. By the second section the custom officers are authorized to stop and examine vessels; and by the term "vessels" is meant every description of machine by which transportation by water is to be effected; but it does not provide, in case any contraband goods are found on board, that there shall be any forfeiture of the vessel; and that is in harmony with the existing law on the subject. In the case of a foreign sea-going vessel arriving at one of the Atlantic ports, if the master fails to deliver in a true manifest, the articles which are not mentioned in the manifest are forfeited, but not the vessel, and the captain is subjected to a fine. But the third section provides for the search and examination of land craft, if I may use that term—railroad cars, engines, express-wagons, whatever it may be—and then proceeds to provide that if contraband goods are found on board, the vehicle, that is, the railway train or the express-wagon or whatever it may be, shall be subject to forfeiture. It appears to me there is no such inherent distinction between carriage by land and carriage by water as to authorize us to allow a vessel which brings in contraband goods to go free and at the same time to condemn a railroad train which should do precisely the same thing. I call the attention of the committee to it because it is possible they have some explanation which will satisfy myself and other Senators on this point. It appears to me that there ought to be a reasonable approximation to uniformity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) Does the Senator propose an amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not.

Mr. MORRILL. I had an impression that the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Vermont was provided for in another section of the bill, but I am not certain that it is not provided for in the law as it stands, of which this is amendatory; and if so then it need not be provided for here. There have been several other suggestions of amendment made, and if it be the pleasure of the Senate I should be glad to have the bill lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You had better have the amendments made in committee concurred in in the Senate, and then let it go over.

Mr. MORRILL. Is the bill in the Senate or in Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to have the bill reported to the Senate, and such amendments as are not objected to concurred in, and then I should like to have the bill lie over until to-morrow for further consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the Senate in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. The question will be taken on the amendments collectively, unless some Senator desires a separate vote.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to have a separate vote on the amendment in the third line of the seventh section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be excepted.

Mr. HOWE. I desire a separate vote on the last amendment to the fourth section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be reserved.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for a separate vote upon the amendment striking out the nineteenth section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be reserved.

Mr. HENDERSON. Some amendments have been made in the latter part of the thirty-third section which I think the Senator having charge of the bill had better look over. If those amendments are concurred in now we may not be able to amend the section hereafter. I will therefore ask that the amendments to the proviso of the thirty-third section be excepted, and in the meantime the Senator from Maine can look into them.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to have all the amendments in that section reserved, and also section thirty-five.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those amendments will be excepted. The question now is on concurring in the remainder of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The remainder of the amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine now moves that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to have it made the special order for one o'clock if there be no objection.

Mr. CLARK. It will come up as the unfinished business.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well then; I will not make the motion to postpone, but let it come up as the unfinished business to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 14, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories for bills on leave and joint resolutions, to be referred to appropriate committees, and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

RECONSTRUCTION REPORT.

Mr. LE BLOND. I offer the following concurrent resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the report of Major General J. B. Steedman and Brigadier General J. F. Fullerton, dated May 7, 1866, be, and the same is hereby, ordered to be incorporated in and published with the testimony taken by the joint committee on reconstruction, together with such other reports as they may from time to time make in pursuance of the commission under which they are acting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Must not this resolution, being presented under this call, be referred to a committee?

The SPEAKER. It must, under the rule.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then I withdraw the resolution.

CANAL COMPANY IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. HIGBY introduced an act granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the Sierra Nevada and Contra Costa Irrigation and Canal Company in the State of California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BRIGADIER GENERAL GEORGE WRIGHT.

Mr. BIDWELL introduced a bill for the relief of the representatives of the late Brigadier General George Wright, United States Army; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUEBLO LANDS.

Mr. BIDWELL also introduced a bill to quiet the title to the Pueblo lands of the town of Santa Barbara; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MAIL STEAMSHIPS ON THE PACIFIC.

Mr. BIDWELL introduced a bill to authorize ocean mail steamship service between the United States and the Sandwich Islands; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

TELEGRAPH LINE AT THE WEST.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," approved July 2, 1864; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. DONNELLY introduced a bill to amend an act donating public land to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agricultural and mechanic arts, approved July 2, 1862; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CONSOLIDATION OF INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill for the consolidation of the Indian tribes, and to establish civil government in the Indian territories; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the next business in order, to call the States and Territories for resolutions, commencing with the State of Pennsylvania, where the call rested last Monday, proceeding in the inverse order.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

Mr. WILLIAMS offered the following resolution, and demanded the previous question thereon:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so altering the law as to abrogate the tenure of office at the pleasure of the appointing power, wherever the same now exists, and to make all official trusts determinable at times certain, subject only to the condition of good behavior, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. LE BLOND. If I understand it, this resolution embraces the principle which was added to the Post Office bill in the Senate. If so I intend to move to lay it on the table.

The SPEAKER. It is only a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. LE BLOND. Very well.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. STEVENS introduced the following joint resolution; which was read a first and second time:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That an additional Secretary of the Navy shall be appointed whose commission shall expire at the end of six months from the 1st day of June next.

Mr. STEVENS. I will merely state that it is necessary to send a Secretary of the Navy abroad, and during the time that he is abroad it is necessary that another should be appointed. I call the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish the gentleman would explain the necessity for the passage of this resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. The Department find it necessary to send a Secretary abroad on account of some examination of navies and navy-yards in foreign countries, and by the peculiar law appointing an Assistant Secretary of the Navy, different from the others, in the absence or sickness of the head of the bureau the Assistant Secretary becomes the Secretary of the Navy pro tempore. It is necessary, therefore, to have one on the spot. I have limited the duration of the term to six months, so that under no circumstances shall it exceed the time when the man who is sent abroad shall return.

Mr. SPALDING. Allow me to say a word. I understood some time ago that the present Assistant Secretary of the Navy proposed to resign, and it was said that he had sent in his resignation. And now I understand that he proposes a tour to Europe, and that for his accommodation, he holding the office and receiving the pay of first Assistant Secretary of the Navy, we are called upon to make a second Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. STEVENS. I have stated what the head of the Department said. I know nothing more. He has not the time to go, and it was thought proper to have another appointed. I trust the gentleman will not object to it. It is but for six months.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope this House will hesitate before it gives its—

Mr. STEVENS. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I want to hear that joint resolution read again. I wish to know if this provides for another Assistant Secretary of the Navy in addition to the one who is to travel.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I hope the joint resolution will not be passed.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to the joint resolution being referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I move to lay the joint resolution upon the table.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope it will go to the Committee on Naval Affairs by common consent.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Well, I withdraw my motion.

The joint resolution was then referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PIKE. I ask that the Committee on Naval Affairs have leave to report at any time.

Mr. SPALDING. I object; and I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred, and also move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE MEMPHIS RIOT.

Mr. STEVENS introduced the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed by the Speaker, whose duty it shall be to proceed, without unnecessary delay, to Memphis, in the State of Tennessee, to make an investigation into all matters connected with the recent bloody riots in that city, which began on the 1st instant, and particularly to inquire into the origin, progress, and termination of the riotous proceedings, the names of the parties engaged in it, the acts of atrocity perpetrated, the number of killed and wounded, the amount and character of the property destroyed, and report all the facts to the House; and the Sergeant-at-Arms or his deputy, and the stenographer of the House, are directed to accompany said committee; and that all the expenses of this investigation be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. The said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and examine witnesses under oath.

Mr. CHANLER. It seems to me that this is a matter which belongs to the executive department of the Government. At the same time, I do not wish to object to action being taken by the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] offers the resolution; it is now before the House, and he calls the previous question upon it.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I desire to move an amendment to the resolution, so that it shall extend to transactions at Chattanooga, where a few citizens were murdered.

Mr. STEVENS. Let the proposed amendment be read.

The amendment proposed by Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, was read, as follows:

Whereas it is publicly reported and believed that lately at Chattanooga and Memphis many inoffensive citizens of the United States were murdered, and that the portions of the Army of the United States at those points are seriously compromised in respect to good conduct in both cases: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to inquire into and report to this House what was the conduct of the United States officers and troops in reference to the cases mentioned, and to inform this House whether the country may rely upon the Army to aid in the protection of the rights of the people, and what legislation is necessary, if any; and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is scarcely germane to the pending resolution.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CHANLER. Inasmuch as I know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, with his usual skill, will carry this measure in spite of all opposition, I ask him to enlarge the powers of the committee, so that the inquiry shall extend to an examination of circumstances of a similar character whereby the lives of American citizens, including American troops, have been put in jeopardy by the Indians.

Mr. STEVENS. I should be very glad to accommodate the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.] But his proposition covers so much ground that I am afraid one committee will not be able to conclude the investigation. I will very cheerfully vote for any resolution to send the member who chooses to move it on such an investigation. At present, I must call the previous question.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] for one moment. I know he is a universal philanthropist, and has heretofore extended his philanthropy over all the colored race. Why not extend it over all those who have suffered any violence or wrong? Why not include the recent murder in Pennsylvania—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call the gentleman to order; the previous question has been called.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 22, not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, DeFrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburt, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kuykendall, Ladin, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Stevens, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Bergen, Chanler, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Kerr, Latham, LeBlond, Niblack, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Strouse, Taber, and Trimble—22.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Barker, Beaman, Boyer, Brandegee, Buckland, Bundy, Cof-froth, Culver, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eliot, Farquhar, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Hill, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McCullough, McIndoe, McKuer, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Nicholson, Noel, O'Neill, Phelps, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stillwell, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Wentworth, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—74.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to say at this time that I hope I will be excused from serving on the select committee just ordered, as the distance is rather further than I can conveniently travel.

APPROVAL OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. CHANLER submitted the following resolutions, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That the independent, patriotic, and constitutional course of the President of the United States, in seeking to protect by the veto power the rights of the people of this Union against the wicked and revolutionary acts of a few malignant and mischievous men meets with the approval of this House and deserves the cordial support of all loyal citizens of the United States.

Resolved, That this House believes the Freedmen's Bureau unnecessary and unconstitutional, and hereby directs the chairman of the committee having charge of that bureau to bring in a bill to repeal all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is that there is an insolent attack upon Congress contained in the first resolution moved by the member from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] for which he deserves to be dealt with by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot rule these resolutions out of order upon the ground stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] It is a question for the House to determine whether the resolutions are unworthy the members of this House.

Mr. SCHENCK. It seems to me—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] will suspend until the Chair shall have concluded his statement.

The argument of the gentleman from Ohio goes to the votes of members as to whether they will agree or disagree to the resolution. It does not touch the question of parliamentary law.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is it in order to move that the resolutions be rejected?

The SPEAKER. The question of agreeing or disagreeing to the resolution will determine that. If the resolution is not agreed to it is rejected.

Mr. STEVENS. I raise the question of reception.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the forty-first rule, under which the question of reception is raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

The Clerk read as follows:

"When any motion or proposition is made, the question, 'Will the House now consider it?' shall not be put unless it is demanded by some member or deemed necessary by the Speaker."

Mr. ROGERS. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. It is not yet before the House.

The question was upon considering the resolution at this time.

Mr. CHANLER. Upon that question I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 19, nays 84, not voting 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bergen, Chanler, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Kerr, LeBlond, Niblack, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, and Trimble—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, DeFrees, Deming, Donnelly, Dumont, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburt, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Spaulding, Stevens, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—84.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Barker, Beaman, Bidwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Buckland, Cof-froth, Culver, Davis, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farquhar, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Hill, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McCullough, McIndoe, McKuer, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Nicholson, Noel, O'Neill, Phelps, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rousseau, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stillwell, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Wentworth, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—80.

So the House refused to consider the resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege, I believe, would not be in order at this time.

The SPEAKER. Not until the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. SCHENCK. I give notice, then, that so soon as I can have the opportunity I shall move a vote of censure upon the member from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.]

Mr. CHANLER. I would like to offer a resolution censuring the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK;] but I suppose, as his party is in the majority, it would be a useless proceeding.

Mr. Speaker, I have another resolution which I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from New York offering another resolution?

Several MEMBERS objected.

TAX ON NOTES OF STATE BANKS.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing in whole or in part the tax imposed by law on the circulating notes of State banks after July 1, 1866; and that said committee have leave to report at any time by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object to that part of the resolution which proposes that the committee shall have leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. It will require unanimous consent for the adoption of that.

Mr. DAVIS. I modify the resolution by striking out the words "at any time."

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

On agreeing to the resolution, there were—ayes 35, noes 30; no quorum voting.

Mr. ELDRIDGE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 45, nays 63, not voting 75; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barker, Bergen, Bundy, Chanler, Conkling, Darling, Davis, Dawson, Defrees, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Hart, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Kerr, Kuykendall, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Marshall, Mercier, Miller, Morrill, Niblack, Pike, Ritter, Rogers, Schenck, Shaanklin, Sitgreaves, Stevens, Strouse, Taber, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—45.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Cobb, Cook, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Garfield, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Henderson, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Marston, McKee, Moorhead, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Platts, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Smith, Spaulding, Stilwell, Van Aernam, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Walker, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—63.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boyer, Brandegee, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cof-froth, Cullom, Culver, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Edwin H. Hubbell, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Ketcham, Latham, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, McCullough, McIndoe, McKuer, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Nicholson, Noell, O'Neill, Phelps, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rousseau, Seofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Starr, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Wentworth, Winfield, and Wright—75.

So the resolution was not agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 567) to amend an act to establish the grade of vice admiral in the United States Navy;

An act (H. R. No. 511) imposing a duty on live animals; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 133) relative to the attempted assassination of the Emperor of Russia.

OHIO CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee of Elections, submitted a report in the case of Follett against Delano, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That Hon. Columbus Delano is entitled to the seat occupied by him in this House as a Representative from the thirteenth district of Ohio in the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

The report was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed a bill and joint resolution of the House of the following titles with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1867, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 130) carrying into effect the bill to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy.

Also, that the Senate had passed a joint resolution and bills of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 88) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of certain lumber for a fair of a Soldiers' and Sailors' Home;

An act (S. No. 127) for the relief of Jonathan W. Gordon, late major in the eleventh regiment of infantry; and

An act (S. No. 310) to change the place of holding the courts of the United States for the northern district of Mississippi.

CENSURE OF A MEMBER.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a question of privilege, and submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That JOHN W. CHANLER, a Representative from the seventh district of the State of New York, by presenting this day a resolution to be considered by this House in the following terms: "Resolved, That the independent, patriotic, and constitutional course of the President of the United States, in seeking to protect by the veto power the rights of the people of this Union against the wicked and revolutionary acts of a few malignant and mischievous men, meets with the approval of this House and deserves the cordial support of all loyal citizens of the United States," has thereby attempted a gross insult to the House, and is hereby censured therefor.

Mr. Speaker, I ought perhaps to have proposed a resolution of expulsion, but did not, simply because I doubted whether the member from New York was capable of comprehending fully the offensiveness of the language used in his resolution.

I have also, it will be observed, described his insult as being not offered to the House but attempted, that being about as far, I think, as he was able to go.

Mr. ROGERS. I think the other side had better expel him as they hardly have members enough over there.

Mr. SCHENCK. The occurrence was so recent there is no necessity for argument, and I therefore demand the previous question.

Mr. FINCK. It is too late to introduce the resolution; it ought to have been done at the moment; other business has intervened.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will refer to the rule he will find it refers to words spoken in debate.

Mr. CHANLER. I hope the point of order will be withdrawn. I do not seek any technical protection.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the resolution reflect on any person?

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman does not comprehend it I cannot enlighten him.

Mr. ROGERS. It names no members of Congress.

Mr. LE BLOND. I appeal to my colleague not to insist on the call for the previous question; to let the resolution be printed, and lie over for consideration and discussion.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is no possible discussion to my mind which can make this language clearer than it is. It is a gross attempt at a gross insult, which only falls harmless because of the incompetency of the member from New York.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. CHANLER. Is the member accused to have no hearing?

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order, the previous question having been seconded.

Mr. DARLING. I hope my colleague will be allowed to be heard.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table; and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose it is perfectly proper for me to make a remark.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order after the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not propose any debate.

Mr. LE BLOND. The gentleman has cut off debate himself.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. ROSS. Is it in order to refer it to the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SCHENCK. I was about to say, by unanimous consent, that I would have no objection to the gentleman, who is named in the resolution, occupying any time he wishes, but I want no debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, withdraw it.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] is entitled to speak, by the consent of the House.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, what object lies behind the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] it is impossible for me or this House to discern. What motive actuated myself in presenting that resolution I alone know; and for him to assume and to declare in the form of a resolution that the words which I have presented to this House constitute an insult to the House; for him to make that assertion puts the charge of offering the insult upon himself. If he feels the sting, let him suffer. I am not called upon to retract one word, and not one word will I retract. What I meant I will not reveal, for the reason that the words of that resolution are so plain and simple that no politically honest man, who believes in the right of free speech and of free debate, and who respects the privileges of this House, will for one moment consider exceptionable, or fail to understand as having a general political meaning. If I did mean to insult this House it would be a presumption far beyond any merit that I have ever assumed to have.

When the veto of the President of the United States fell upon this House like a thunderbolt he may have insulted this House. He may be so charged by the partisans of those who moved to sustain the previous question, and had he been a member of either body of Congress he would have been expelled for expressing the opinions contained in his veto, as he is now threatened with assassination, as he is now threatened with impeachment, and as he has to meet the hostility of the whole body of men organized as a majority on this floor. But that I should have the good fortune, through the mischievous malignity of any member of the House, by a resolution of censure, to be placed in a position of champion of the President for sustaining the policy of the Administration as displayed by the acts of the Executive, I am too proud to feel for one moment regret, although utterly unworthy of the honor. I meant not to thrust myself into a prominence so invidious, and into a position which I do not deem myself called upon to take, or capable to maintain. The responsibility of that position belongs to those who elected the Chief Magistrate. And if, because of the conscientious discharge of his duty, he is assailed here by those who elected him, and defended here by those who had naught to do with his election, I cannot see the reason, logic, or political sequence in any form that will make a member reprehensible for rising in his seat and presenting a resolution as I have, admitted by the Presiding Officer of this House to be in order, and to be subject only to the action of the House. Sir, that any member should be held accountable and liable to censure for such action is a compliment, and as such I accept it.

And, sir, what have been the precedents offered by that side of the House in the treatment of public opinion as expressed by the Opposition? What course has been pursued with regard to the humble few who claim the right on this floor of opposing encroachments made by the majority upon the Constitution, as we honestly believe? Is there any language that can be found in Billingsgate or Hudibras, any low term of political reproach, any indecent slang, any hateful anathema, that is not made use of toward the minority here day after day, and put upon the wings of the press and carried to every quarter of this country?

Sir, is this done by one who is spotless or free from the reproach which he would apply to the humblest member on this side? Who is insulted when a Representative on this side is branded as unworthy? That member? No, sir. This House? No, sir; but the people—the people whom we represent; the constituency for whose interest we come here and in whose behalf we speak and vote. And if the people that I represent deem, as I believe they do, that the course of mischievous men has interfered with the wise, constitutional policy of the President, I will declare it, day by day and hour by hour, though all the forces of the opposite party here concentrated were to seek by every rule allowed by the practice of the House to stop my speech. What care I for the paper resolutions of any political organization in any political body, if I here conscientiously discharge my duties as a Representative? And I claim, in that capacity, to stand without reproach. I have never given a vote here or raised my voice in debate here without keeping within the rules and regulations of the House. What mistakes may be made in the impetuosity of debate, in the eagerness to fulfill our duty toward our constituents is aside from the motives with which we may be actuated. But no act of mine has ever cast reproach upon the constituency I represent, and no act of the member from Ohio can cast infamy on me. As to any personal rebuke which may fall upon myself, I look upon it as too ridiculous to need serious consideration. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that my resolution was not allowed to take the usual course without involving me in these personalities. I wish to say in regard to the resolution that it is as harmless a resolution as was ever introduced into this House.

The resolution only meets the line of argument which the majority on this floor have advanced from time to time by condensing what I deem a fitting reply in a few words. That is all there is in the resolution. Such resolutions are often presented. Why this stringent cord drawn around this particular resolution? Why the bow-string and the knot here? Why this lash which has driven the majority here to vote with such unanimity?

Do you suppose that your lash can reach any man on this side of the House? If you do, you are very much mistaken. The action of the few men who control this Congress and this Government is subject to very strict criticism; it is worthy of denunciation; it is worthy of the loudest anathemas; and as a Representative on this floor, had I the power of eloquence, I should seek to crush the majority by all the stinging and searching arguments which their own acts offer me.

We are few in numbers here, but not as few as the peculiar body which controls the action of both branches of Congress, contrary to the established rules and practice of American legislation. And because we oppose the action of this select committee and declare that it shall not hold us responsible, those of us who offer resolutions of this character are held up as worthy of censure.

Now, what have these few constituting this committee done? Have they offered to this body one single reason for their course, one argument for their report, or introduced one legislative act which will enable the Executive, in the discharge of his public duties, to use the powers which the Constitution gives him to save the people. That, sir, is the select few, that is the body of men against whom that resolution was hurled, those and the people who support it; against those few in comparison with the great body of the people outside of this House who support the action of that select committee.

Gentlemen seem to think that because they hold seats here in the majority they rule this country. They think that the powers which have descended upon them from the hands of the people, according to the forms of the Constitution, give them unlimited control for all time to come. They think that the great plea of necessity under which, during the turmoils of war, they controlled the acts of the Government is valid now, and gives them the right to carry on a system of government they then established, a system peculiar in itself, opposed to the Constitution, and pronounced by an Executive chosen by themselves to be unconstitutional. Your term of office is limited, and the power you exercise is limited, and its end is near.

So much for that portion of the resolution. I have not at any time addressed the House upon that select committee, because it was like talking to the idle wind or firing at the insensible rock.

Now, with regard to the second part of the resolution—

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CHANLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask the gentleman if in his resolution he intended to malign the majority of this House or any portion of that majority.

Mr. CHANLER. Not at all. There is not a word in the resolution that applies to any organization or set of men whatever. I drew up that resolution with special view to avoid any such inference, and the Speaker, in his ruling, most justly remarked that it was a question for the action of the House. If I had insulted the body over which he presides, is he not competent, and has he not always shown a prompt readiness to do so, to check the consideration of the resolution at the very start? Of course I meant no personality whatever, and nothing but a malignant feeling on his part could have prompted the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and I thank the other gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] for directing that question to me. I did not deem it necessary for me to make such an avowal, for there is nothing in the resolution that calls for a motion of censure.

Now, sir, I wish that the true motives which actuated me in this case should not be misunderstood. I do not wish to delay the House, or to disturb or interrupt the proceedings before it. But it is due to this House and to myself that they should understand that there is a potent power and an admirable use in a minority. A minority of one man, if he is conscientious in the discharge of his duties, is as able a check upon improper parliamentary proceedings as a minority of fifty or of any number. Now, if the constituency which I represent upon this floor is to be turned upon and censured by the majority for saying what it thinks through its agent, why in the name of reason do you invite them to send a Representative here? If the majority of this House are to show this thin-skinned sensitiveness to the utterances of truths, how is there to be any minority worthy of that name in the system of American government? Are we, because we differ from them to cringe, and gather thrift by fawning?

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] yield for a question?

Mr. CHANLER. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to read to the gentleman from New York a portion of one of the resolutions, and then ask him in good faith what he means by that portion of it:

Resolved, That the independent, patriotic, and constitutional course of the President of the United States in seeking to protect by the veto power the rights of the people of this Union against the wicked and revolutionary acts of a few malignant and mischievous men, &c.

Now, I desire to ask the gentleman from New York to whom he refers by the expression, "a few malignant and mischievous men," against whose "wicked and revolutionary acts" the "President of the United States is seeking to protect by the veto power the rights of the people of this Union."

Mr. CHANLER. Every malignant and malicious individual, [laughter,] collectively, connected with this Government or any other, who attempts to interfere with the President's power to protect the people, without regard to race or color, particularly the light brown.

Mr. DAWES. I wish the gentleman to answer me directly whether he meant by his resolution to refer to the majority of Congress who voted for the acts which the President has vetoed. Will he state whether he did or did not intend to include that majority or any portion of them?

Mr. CHANLER. In just so much as they did interfere with the rights of the people.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman whether he intended to include them.

Mr. CHANLER. No more and no less than I have stated. I have already made my declaration, in answer to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] that I meant nothing whatever in the form of insult or personality as applied to this House or any member. It was a "glittering generality;" that is all.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman answer one more question?

Mr. CHANLER. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman please to state to the House in what manner it is possible to include anybody else than the members of the House and of the Senate who voted for the acts against which he says the President is defending the people by the exercise of his veto power?

Mr. CHANLER. I allude to those who influence the men on the other side. I allude to those to whom the majority in Congress are responsible. I allude to those mischievous and malignant men who, using the pulpit for fuming revolutionary and wicked doctrines, have roused the people to acts of incendiarism and bloodshed. I mean all those infamous and wicked men who, for political purposes, have perverted every avenue to honor that they may gain wealth and position. Is the gentleman satisfied? Does the language apply to him? Does the galled jade wince, or does he feel that his withers are unwrung?

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman has no objection to answering one more question, will he be kind enough to state to the House whose acts the President vetoed?

Mr. CHANLER. He can veto only the acts of Congress. The President, acting as President, can by his veto power strike only the acts of Congress. Every one must see that the gentleman's question is utterly useless. But what I mean is, that in these vetoes the President has struck broader and deeper than any act of Congress. He has roused in the hearts of the American people throughout this whole country a hope that had almost ceased to exist. He has struck a forcible blow against what I deem a most dangerous combination against the welfare of the country. I did not mean to say that any man on this floor is any more incendiary or revolutionary in his conduct than myself. Gentlemen on the other side daily indulge in charges against gentlemen on this side, calling them traitors, &c.; and am I to be called to account because I reply in a general assertion which touches no individual?

Am I to be arraigned here by a system of cross-questions because as a member I have said what I think?

Mr. DAWES. I perceive the gentleman does not understand my question; it is my fault, I presume. If he will allow me, I will again state it. I desire to understand fully what the gentleman meant by the language of his resolution; for my vote on the motion to censure him will depend entirely upon what he meant to do, not the propriety of what he did do. If a man does as well as he knows how to do, I do not propose to censure him.

I did not ask the gentleman what the President could veto; but inasmuch as he said the President was defending the people against the "revolutionary and wicked" acts of certain "malignant and mischievous" men, I asked him whether the President did veto any other acts than the acts of this House and the Senate.

Mr. CHANLER. Yes, sir; he vetoed every act of outrage that has been committed in this country. By the exercise of the veto power he showed himself an independent man—a man who looked to the Constitution for the warrant of his power.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CHANLER. I decline to yield further. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to do with the President of the United States. He was elected by one constituency and I by another. I am no there to defend him, and the gentleman knows it. It is asking a pigny to defend a giant when it is proposed to bring me into the arena to defend the President of the United States.

Sir, the President stands before you to-day as a giant, and there is no David in your ranks to bring him down. I do not presume to be his defender. I do not claim to be your superiors, but I do claim to be your equals, and I am not over proud of it either.

There is nothing more hostile to my inclinations and more at variance with the intention I had when this resolution was offered than the personality which has grown out of this debate. I hope my friends [turning to the Democratic members] are satisfied that while I boldly announced in the resolution what I believed true, I as boldly have maintained it in the foregoing remarks. I retract not one word. I accept the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] as the suggestion of a friend. It enabled me to remove all impression that the resolution was meant to be obnoxious. I will answer no more questions. I mean no wrong, and I will suffer no wrong. I care not for the persecution of the malignant member from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK], or for the political censure of the majority of the Republican party in or out of this House. If by my defiance I could drive your party from this Hall I would do so. If by my vote I could crush you, I would do so, and put the whole party, with your leader, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS], into that political hell surrounded by bayonets, referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] in his argument on Thursday last.

Now, vote upon this resolution of censure.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] does not press the motion to lay upon the table, as the gentleman from New York prefers a direct vote on the resolution.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution, on which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 30, not voting 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Broomwell, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, Deming, Eckley, Garfield, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Julian, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McKee, Mercour, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Spalding, Stevens, Van Aernam, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Bergen, Darling, Davis, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Hogan, James K. Hubbell, Kerr, Laffin, Le Blond, Marshall, Niblack, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Smith, Strouse, Taber, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Ward, and Henry D. Washburn—30.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Beaman, Boyer, Brandegee, Buckland, Chanler, Coffroth, Conkling, Culver, Defrees, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farguhar, Ferry, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Hill, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, Marvin, McCullough, Melndoe, McKuer, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Nicholson, Noel, O'Neill, Phelps, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Starr, Stilwell, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Wentworth, Whaley, Windom, Winfield, and Wright—81.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON THE MEMPHIS RIOT.

The SPEAKER announced the following as the select committee on the Memphis riot ordered this morning: Messrs. WASHBURNE of Illinois, BOUTWELL of Massachusetts, and LE BLOND of Ohio.

FIVE-CENT PIECE.

On motion of Mr. KASSON, the House took from the Speaker's table House bill No. 397, to authorize the coinage of a five-cent piece, and concurred in the amendment of the Senate thereto.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK POST OFFICE, ETC.

On motion of Mr. DARLING, the House took up and concurred in the Senate amendments to House joint resolution No. 66, relative to the courts and post office of New York city.

TAXING SPANIAL BANKS.

Mr. BLAINE, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas, by reason of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, stock of national banks is made subject to the same rate of taxation with other property by State and municipal authority: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of removing all taxes levied by the national Government on said banks, except the half per cent. per annum on the average amount of their deposits.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the motion by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM JOSLIN.

Mr. HOLMES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of William Joslin, of Vermont; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GEORGE R. FRANK.

On motion of Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of George R. Frank, copies being left.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FERRY asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. BEAMAN, for ten days.

Mr. PRICE asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. GRINNELL, for ten days.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, the amendments to the Post Office appropriation bill by the Senate were taken up from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 310, to change the place of holding the courts of the United States for the northern district of Mississippi for action at the present time.

The bill was read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I desire to state that when the vote was taken on Thursday last on the proposed amendment to the Constitution I was unavoidably absent. Had I been here I would have voted for it.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I notice in the proceedings as reported in the Globe that I am recorded as not voting on the motion ordering the main question. I was here and voted.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be allowed to record my vote on the constitutional amendment.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done.

Mr. DENISON. I would have voted against it had I been here.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in reply to a resolution of the House of the 10th ultimo, in regard to artificial limbs furnished to soldiers at the expense of the Government; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

TAX BILL.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being a bill of the House (No. 513) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof.

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. JENCKES, to strike out the following proviso on page 22, on which debate was exhausted:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to fix such additional rates of compensation to be made to assessors and assistant assessors in cases where a collection district embraces more than a single congressional district, and to assessors and assistant assessors, revenue agents, and inspectors in Louisiana, Georgia, South Carolina, Alabama, Florida, Texas, Arkansas, North Carolina, Mississippi, Tennessee, Missouri, California, and Oregon, and the Territories, as may appear to him to be just and equitable, in consequence of the greater cost of living and traveling in those States and Territories, and as may, in his judgment, be necessary to secure the services of competent officers; but the rates of compensation thus allowed shall not exceed the rates paid to similar officers in such States and Territories respectively.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by striking out "Missouri."

Mr. Chairman, I have made inquiry at the Department and I find that this proviso is indispensable if we would collect any tax in the States and Territories mentioned. In a large portion of the State of Louisiana, and also in Tennessee, especially around Memphis and Nashville, it is utterly impossible to obtain men who are competent to discharge these duties without the payment of a little more salary than the law now allows. If the assistant assessors are paid five dollars a day, as they have been for some time, I believe, it will not increase the expenses of the internal revenue department to any large amount, but in various portions of those States which are not yet reconstructed, if we would obtain any revenue, it is absolutely indispensable to allow for a small increase of pay; and as we heard from the gentleman from California [Mr. HENRY] the other day, it always has been necessary there to have a provision of this kind in order that we may collect taxes there, for they pay higher rates of wages there than we do on the Atlantic coast.

I trust the gentleman from Rhode Island will be content with the amendment I propose and will not insist on striking out the proviso. In Missouri, I believe, there are officers now appointed in all the congressional districts, and it may be possible, although somewhat inconvenient, to get along in that State without this increase of pay.

Mr. JENCKES. I should be better contented if the gentleman would extend this power over the whole United States and not restrict it as he proposes. This proviso gives the Secretary power to regulate the compensation of these officers in thirteen States and all the Territories. The inequalities in compensation arising out of the inequalities in service are as great in the States omitted as they can be in the States enumerated; and if the Secretary is to have the power of fixing the salaries of these officers in this large number of States and in all the Territories, why not extend the power to all the States and all the congressional districts?

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman desires an answer, I will say to him that, of course, we do not expect that this will be more than a temporary provision. Congress will meet again next December, and it is hoped that by that time we may be able to strike out a large part of the proviso, but until these States are in a better condition than they now are, it seems to me eminently proper that the proviso should remain.

Mr. JENCKES. This proviso is not clear enough. It says "the rates of compensation thus allowed shall not exceed the rates paid to similar officers in such States and Territories respectively."

That does not seem to me to be a clear limitation. If the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] representing the Committee of Ways and Means, will move a distinct limitation of these rates of compensation, that they shall not exceed in any State a certain sum, either per diem or of annual compensation, it might obviate to a great extent the objection I make to this proviso.

Mr. MORRILL. How does the gentleman propose to amend it?

Mr. JENCKES. I propose no amendment; I ask the gentleman to fix a rate, either per diem or of annual compensation. Under this proviso, where these officers are paid an annual compensation, the Secretary may fix it at ten or twenty thousand dollars.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall have no objection to the gentleman's amendment if he will offer one to meet that difficulty.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask the gentleman who has had this subject under consideration to move a distinct limitation of pay, and then I will withdraw all objection to the proviso.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to insert in the proviso, after the word "California," the word "Nevada."

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order. There are two amendments already pending.

The question was taken on Mr. MORRILL's amendment to strike out the word "Missouri;" and it was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move now to amend the proviso by striking out the words "but the rates of compensation thus allowed shall not exceed the rates paid to similar officers in such States and Territories respectively," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "the sum of $5,000 per annum."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to insert the word "Nevada" after the word "California."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out the word "four," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "five," before the words "dollars for every day actually employed in collecting lists," &c.; also to strike out the words:

And other assistant assessors, when employed outside of the town in which they reside, in addition to the compensation now allowed by law, shall, during such time so employed, receive one dollar per day.

That portion of the paragraph will then read:

And there shall be allowed and paid to each assistant assessor four dollars for every day actually employed in collecting lists and making valuations, the number of days necessary for that purpose to be certified by the assessor, and three dollars for every hundred persons assessed contained in the tax list, as completed and delivered by him to the assessor, and twenty-five cents for each permit granted to any tobacco, snuff, or cigar manufacturer; and the several assistant assessors in cities of more than ten thousand inhabitants shall be allowed, in the settlement of their accounts, a sum not exceeding $300 per annum for office rent; but no account for such rent shall be allowed or paid until it shall have been verified in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall require, and shall have been audited and approved by the proper officer of the Treasury Department.

If this amendment shall be adopted, it will give the assistant assessors, during the time in which they are engaged in performing the duties of their offices, the sum of five dollars a day. The provision as it now stands is that they shall have four dollars a day, and one dollar additional for each day they are performing duties outside of the town in which they reside.

A great deal of complaint has been found in my own district, in regard to the pay of assistant assessors; and a great many petitions have been presented asking Congress to increase their compensation. It is certainly the poorest-paid office, for the responsibility devolving upon the person who holds it, of all the offices under the Government. Although the provision here proposed may be sufficient in the cities, where the assessors are living at their homes, and where the duties of their offices keep them employed every day in the year, I am sure it will be unjust in its operation upon assistant assessors who live in the rural districts.

Now the proposition to give them a dollar a day extra for each day they are engaged in the duties of their office outside of the town in which they reside does not really provide what is just for these men. When these men, in a county like my own, are called upon to go out of the town in which they reside to perform the duties of their office, having no railroad communications to accommodate them, they are obliged to take a conveyance, either their own or one hired. And if they hire a conveyance, the price they will be compelled to pay for it will be equal to at least the half of the five dollars a day which they shall receive.

Now, I think that justice should be done to these officers. They are very important officers of the Government, and should be well enough paid to prevent there being any inducement held out to them either to do wrong or to neglect the duties imposed upon them. If my amendment is adopted, they will receive five dollars a day during the time they are engaged in the duties of their office, whether at home or elsewhere. The addition of one dollar a day for services in adjacent towns of the district by no means meets the additional expenses the officers are obliged to incur in procuring conveyances.

I think my amendment is a just one, and I hope it will meet with no opposition from my friend, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. DARLING. I think another amendment could be made to this paragraph which will give these assistant assessors the additional pay which is deemed necessary for them. It is to strike out the word "for" before the words "office rent" and insert the words "in lieu of;" thus giving them the sum of $300 in lieu of office rent, which they can account for as office rent or for any other necessary purpose.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I think my amendment is preferable.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not rise to oppose the amendment. It was thought by the Committee of Ways and Means that these officers should receive some additional pay, and they proposed it in the shape of an allowance for office rent. The most of them are compelled to have an office, and this sum of $300 would enable the most of them to rent an office or a house sufficiently capacious to accommodate their families and furnish an office. I agree with my colleague [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] that it is necessary for us to have competent, vigilant men for these offices, men of integrity. And I do not object to the proposition in the form in which my colleague has offered it, if the House shall deem it more desirable than the form reported by the committee.

The amendment of Mr. WOODBRIDGE was then agreed to.

Mr. COOK. I move further to amend this paragraph by inserting after the words "and for postage actually paid on letters and documents received or sent, and relating exclusively to official business," the words, "and for money actually paid for publishing the notices required by this act;" so as to pay back to these officers the money they are actually required to pay out for the publication of the notices.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DARLING. I move to amend by striking out in line two hundred and ninety the word "for" before the word "office," and inserting in its place the words "in lieu of;" so that the clause will read as follows:

And the several assistant assessors in cities of more than ten thousand inhabitants shall be allowed, in the settlement of their accounts, a sum not exceeding $300 per annum in lieu of office rent.

This amendment will make the amount definite; and I think it is just and proper. These assistant assessors are very inadequately paid. In the city of New York men of the requisite ability can scarcely be induced to take these places. It is the poorest kind of economy to undertake to execute a law requiring so much official fidelity as this law requires, and at the same time, in consequence of offering paltry compensation, go begging for competent men to accept these offices. Such a system is calculated to invite into these positions a class of men who ought not to hold them.

Mr. SPALDING. This amendment, as I understand, proposes to give to the assistant assessor $300 for office rent whether he hires an office or uses his own dwelling.

Mr. DARLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPALDING. I am in favor of that.

Mr. DARLING. It is just and proper, and there can be no reasonable objection to it. There is necessity for such a provision, not only in the city of New York, but in all other places where talent and efficiency are required in the execution of this law, which demands so much intelligence and fidelity on the part of the assistant assessors. Why, sir, I think it would be proper to give these men a salary of $2,500 or $3,000 per annum. I think that the Government would make money by paying such salaries, because more taxes would be collected and fewer frauds would be committed if the Government would induce the acceptance of these offices by a class of men who are now prevented from taking them because of the paltry compensation paid.

Why, sir, let the Government do as prudent men everywhere do in their business—employ the best talent for the execution of duties requiring talent and fidelity, and pay liberal salaries. The niggardly economy which is urged by many as the proper policy for the Government can only defeat the very object which the Government has in view—the obtaining of the largest amount of revenue. If more attention were given to obtaining officers possessing the requisite qualifications, paying them salaries commensurate with their abilities, our revenue law would be better executed and we should hear less of collusion and fraud and corruption in the administration of the law. I trust, therefore, that the amendment which I have offered will prevail.

Mr. MORRILL. I trust that the amendment will not prevail. There are a great many districts in which the renting of an office is not necessary; yet under this amendment $300 for this item would be paid in all cases. If the amendment should not prevail I shall offer an amendment striking out in line two hundred and eighty-nine the words "a sum" and inserting "such sum as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may approve." I think that this will make the provision more acceptable to the House and perhaps to the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move to amend by striking out in line two hundred and eighty-nine the words "a sum" and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "such sum as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall approve;" so that the clause will read:

And the several assistant assessors in cities of more than ten thousand inhabitants shall be allowed, in the settlement of their accounts, such sum as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall approve, not exceeding $300 per annum for office rent.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move further to amend by inserting after the word "authorized" in line three hundred and ten the following:

Provided further, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, under such regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, after due public notice, receive bids and contract for supplying stationery, blank books and blanks to the assessors, assistant assessors, and collectors in the several collection districts.

Mr. Chairman, all other Departments of the Government, I believe, are now required by law to advertise for bids and contract with the lowest bidder for materials of this sort. There appears to be no reason why this Department should not conform to the same rule.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I move to amend by striking out in lines two hundred and eighty-seven and two hundred and eighty-eight the words "in cities of more than ten thousand inhabitants."

Sir, it is now provided by the second section that in cities of more than ten thousand inhabitants there shall be allowed to the assistant assessor, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, a sum not exceeding $300 per annum for office rent.

I think this distinction is invidious. I happen to reside in probably the smallest but certainly the oldest city in New England, and in my judgment the most respectable one I am acquainted with. [Laughter.] Now, the assistant assessor in my district ought to have an office as much as the assistant assessor in New York. I am not aware why a man living in the oldest city in New England should do duty in his kitchen or in his parlor for the public, instead of having an office for that purpose. I do not know why those who live in populous places are better entitled to have an office than those who live in smaller places. The latter certainly should be allowed some reasonable sum for office rent. If you have a population of nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine under the law you can have no allowance for office rent. It is a distinction in a republican form of government I do not believe in. I believe in every assessor being on an equality in respect to having some place where he can attend to his public duties. If I were an assessor I am quite sure I would not have an office in my house, which, as my castle and that of my family, must be held sacred, but would like to have some place elsewhere as an office. This distinction as to population is wrong. I believe whether the population be nine thousand or three hundred thousand the assessor should have an office in which to do his business.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move the following amendment in line three hundred and twenty-seven:

Amend section twenty-five by adding the following at the end of the section:

Provided further, That in calculating the commissions of assessors and collectors of internal revenue in districts whence cotton or distilled spirits are shipped in bond, to be sold in another district, one half the amount of tax received on the quantity of cotton or spirits so shipped shall be added to the amount on which the commissions of such assessors and collectors are calculated; and a corresponding amount shall be deducted from the amount on which the commissions of the assessors and collectors of the districts to which such cotton or spirits are shipped are calculated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section twenty-six be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following: that in the adjustment of the accounts of assessors and collectors of internal revenue which shall accrue after the 30th of June, 1864, and in the payment of their compensation for services after that date, the fiscal year of the Treasury shall be observed; and where such compensation, or any part of it, shall be by commissions upon assessments or collections, and shall during any year, in consequence of a new appointment, be due to more than one assessor or collector in the same district, such commissions shall be apportioned between such assessors or collectors; but in no case shall a greater amount of the commissions be allowed to two or more assessors or collectors in the same district than is or may be authorized by law to be allowed to one assessor or collector. And the salary and commissions of assessors and collectors heretofore earned and accrued shall be adjusted, allowed, and paid in conformity to the provisions of this section, and not otherwise; but no payment shall be made to assessors or collectors on account of salaries or commissions without the certificate of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that all reports required by law or regulation have been received or that a satisfactory explanation has been rendered to him of the cause of the delay.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask unanimous consent that this paragraph be reserved until after we have come to the part relating to the salaries.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent to go back. I move to amend in the two hundred and thirty-ninth line, so that it will read, "where the receipts of the collection district shall not exceed the sum of $100,000," &c.

Mr. DARLING. I suggest to the gentleman that he insert as follows: "Where the receipts of the collection district shall not exceed $100,000 one per cent." That will carry out the gentleman's idea, and I think will be equitable.

Mr. STEVENS. I modify my amendment as follows:

Strike out, in line two hundred and forty, these words: "Shall exceed $100,000 and," and also the words "in excess of."

Mr. MORRILL. That amendment has already been voted down when moved before by the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. THAYER.]

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

That section twenty-eight be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following: that each of said collectors shall, within twenty days after receiving his annual collection list from the assessors, give notice, by advertisement published in each county in his collection district, in one newspaper printed in such county, if any such there be, or otherwise in some newspaper in any adjacent county, and by notifications to be posted up in at least four public places in each county in his collection district, that the said duties have become due and payable, and state the time and place within said county at which he or his deputy will attend to receive the same, which time shall not be less than ten days after the date of such notification. And if any person shall neglect to pay, as aforesaid, for more than ten days, it shall be the duty of the collector or his deputy to issue to such person a notice, to be left at his dwelling or usual place of business, or be sent by mail, demanding the payment of said duties or taxes, stating the amount thereof, with a fee of twenty cents for the issuing and service of such notice, and with four cents for each mile actually and necessarily traveled in serving the same. And if such persons shall not pay the duties or taxes, and the fee of twenty cents and mileage as aforesaid, within ten days after the service or the sending by mail of such notice, it shall be the duty of the collector or his deputy to collect the said duties or taxes, and fee of twenty cents and mileage, with a penalty of ten per cent. additional upon the amount of duties. And with respect to all such duties or taxes as are not included in the annual lists aforesaid, and all taxes and duties the collection of which is not otherwise provided for in this act, it shall be the duty of each collector, in person or by deputy, to demand payment thereof, in the manner last mentioned, within ten days from and after receiving the list thereof from the assessor, or within twenty days from and after the expiration of the time within which such duty or tax should have been paid; and if the annual or other duties shall not be paid within ten days from and after such demand, therefor, it shall be lawful for such collector or his deputies to proceed to collect the said duties or taxes, with ten per cent. additional thereon, as aforesaid, by distraint and sale of the goods, chattels, or effects, including stocks, securities, and evidences of debt, of the persons delinquent as aforesaid. And in case of distraint it shall be the duty of the officer charged with the collections to make, or cause to be made, an account of the goods, chattels, or effects distrained, a copy of which, signed by the officer making such distraint, shall be left with the owner or possessor of such goods, chattels, or effects, or at his or her dwelling or usual place of business, with some person of suitable age or discretion, if any such can be found, with a note of the sum demanded, and the time and place of sale; and the said officer shall forthwith cause a notification to be published in some newspaper within the county wherein said distraint is made, if there is a newspaper published in said county, or to be publicly posted up at the post office, if there be one within five miles, nearest to the residence of the person whose property shall be distrained, and in not less than two other public places, which notice shall specify the articles distrained, and the time and place for the sale thereof, which time shall not be less than ten nor more than twenty days from the date of such notification, and the place proposed for sale not more than five miles distant from the place of making such distraint. And said sale may be adjourned from time to time by said officer, if he shall think it advisable to do so, but not for a time to exceed in all thirty days. And in any case in which any person, bank, association, company, or corporation, required by law to make return to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall refuse or neglect to make such return within the time specified, the amount of tax or duty shall be estimated by the proper assessor or assistant assessor, and shall be certified by him to the Commissioner. And in all cases in which the person, bank, association, company, or corporation, required by law to make payment of taxes to the Commissioner, shall neglect or refuse to make such payment within the time required, the Commissioner shall certify the amount of tax due by such person, bank, association, or corporation, with all the penalties, additions, and expenses accruing to the collector of the proper district, who shall collect the same by distraint and sale, as in other cases. And the same proceedings may be had to enforce the collection of taxes which have already accrued and which still remain unpaid. And if any person, bank, association, company, or corporation, liable to pay any tax or duty, shall neglect or refuse to pay the same after demand, the amount shall be a lien in favor of the United States from the time it was due until paid, with the interests, penalties, and costs that may accrue in addition thereto, upon all property and rights to property belonging to such person, bank, association, company, or corporation; and the collector, after demand, may levy, or by warrant may authorize a deputy collector to levy upon all property and rights to property belonging to such person, bank, association, company, or corporation, or on which the said lien exists, for the payment of the sum due as aforesaid, with interest and penalty for non-payment, and also of such further sum as shall be sufficient for the fees, costs, and expenses of such levy. And in all cases of sale, as aforesaid, the certificate of such sale shall transfer to the purchaser all right, title, and interest of such delinquent in and to the property sold; and where such property shall consist of stocks, said certificate shall be notice, when received, to any corporation, company, or association of said transfer, and shall be authority to such corporation, company, or association to record the same on their books and records, in the same manner as if transferred or assigned by the person or party holding the same in lieu of any original or prior certificates, which shall be void, whether cancelled or not, and said certificates, where the subject of sale shall be securities or other evidences of debt, shall be good and valid receipts to the person holding the same, as against any person holding, or claiming to hold, possession of such securities or other evidences of debt. And all persons, and officers of companies or corporations, are required, on demand of a collector or deputy collector about to distraint or having distrained on any property and rights of property, to exhibit all books containing, or supposed to contain, evidence or statements relating to the subject or subjects of distraint, or the property or rights of property liable to distraint for the tax so due as aforesaid; Provided, That in any case of distraint for the payment of the duties or taxes aforesaid, the goods, chattels, or effects so distrained shall and may be restored to the owner or possessor if prior to the sale payment of the amount due or tender thereof shall be made to the proper officer charged with the collection of the full amount demanded, together with such fee for levying, and such sum for the necessary and reasonable expense of removing, advertising, and keeping the goods, chattels, or effects so distrained, as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; but in case of non-payment or tender, as aforesaid, the said officer shall proceed to sell the said goods, chattels, or effects at public auction, and shall retain from the proceeds of such sale the amount demandable for the use of the United States, with the necessary and reasonable expenses of distraint and sale, and a commission of five per cent. thereon for his own use, rendering the overplus, if any there be, to the person who may be entitled to receive the same: Provided further, That there shall be exempt from distraint the school-books and apparel necessary for a family; also arms, one cow, fuel to an amount not greater in value than twenty-five dollars; provisions to an amount not greater than fifty dollars; household furniture kept for use, to an amount not greater than three hundred dollars; and books, tools, or implements of a trade or profession to an amount not greater than one hundred dollars.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by adding in line three hundred and eighty, after the word "duties," the words "or taxes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by striking out in lines four hundred and seventy-five and four hundred and seventy-seven the words "or tender thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by striking out lines four hundred and seventy-eight, four hundred and seventy-nine, four hundred and eighty, and four hundred and eighty-one, as follows:

Such fee for levying, and such sum for the necessary and reasonable expense of removing, advertising, and keeping the goods, chattels, or effects so distrained, as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

And inserting in lieu thereof the words "the fee and other charges;" so that the clause will read:

Provided, That in any case of distraint for the payment of the duties or taxes aforesaid, the goods, chattels, or effects so distrained shall and may be restored to the owner or possessor, if prior to the sale payment of the amount due shall be made to the proper officer charged with the collection of the full amount demanded, together with the fee and other charges.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by striking out the words "or tender" in the four hundred and eighty-second line; also, by striking out in the four hundred and eighty-sixth line the words "necessary and reasonable expenses of," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "fee and charges for;" so that the clause will read:

But in case of non-payment, as aforesaid, the said officers shall proceed to sell the said goods, chattels, or effects at public auction, and shall retain from the proceeds of such sale the amount demandable for the use of the United States, with the fee and charges for distraint and sale, and a commission of five per cent. thereon for his own use, rendering the overplus, if any there be, to the person who may be entitled to receive the same.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move further to amend by adding after the word "arms" in line four hundred and ninety-two, the words "for personal use."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to strike out the following in lines three hundred and fifty-eight, three hundred and fifty-nine, and three hundred and sixty:

In one newspaper printed in such county, if any such there be, or otherwise in some newspaper in any adjacent county,

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

In the newspaper of largest circulation printed in such county, if there be any, and if not, then in the newspaper of largest circulation in the nearest adjoining county.

The clause will then read:

That each of said collectors shall, within twenty days after receiving his annual collection list from the assessors, give notice, by advertisement published in each county in his collection district, in the newspaper of largest circulation printed in such county, if there be any, and if not, then in the newspaper of largest circulation in the nearest adjoining county.

The question being put, no quorum voted.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Messrs. ASHLEY, of Ohio, and GARFIELD.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 15; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered that the roll should be called.

The roll was accordingly called; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Latham, Le Blond, Marvin, McClurg, McCullough, McIndoe, McKuer, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Nicholson, Noell, O'Neill, Phelps, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Strouse, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Wentworth, Whaley, Winfield, and Wright.

The committee then rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being bill of the House No. 513, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof, and finding itself without a quorum had directed the roll to be called and the names of the absentees to be reported to the House.

The SPEAKER stated that a quorum having answered to their names, the committee would resume its session.

The committee then resumed its session, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair.)

The question recurred on the amendment moved by Mr. GARFIELD.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I withdraw my demand for tellers.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out in lines four hundred and sixty-eight and four hundred and sixty-nine the words, "or supposed to contain."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to amend by adding to the paragraph, at the end of line four hundred and ninety-seven, the following:

And the officers making the distraint shall summon three disinterested householders of the vicinity, who shall appraise and set apart to the owner the amount of property herein declared to be exempt.

A certain amount of property being declared exempt, I do not see in the bill any means of ascertaining the amount so declared. The owner of the property and the collector perhaps differ as to the value of certain articles that are exempt. It seems to me there should be some umpire to decide the matter.

Mr. MORRILL. I see no objection to the amendment. The whole exemption I regard as a mere matter of form. It is not likely that a case will ever occur where a person liable to any national taxes will not have a greater amount of property than is exempted.

Mr. JENCKES. I suggest instead of the officer making the distraint that he may call upon the assessor of the district to make the appointment of the appraisers.

Mr. MORRILL. That is better.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I accept the modification.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move to strike out the last proviso, as follows:

Provided further, That there shall be exempt from distraint the school-books and apparel necessary for a family; also arms for personal use, one cow, fuel to an amount not greater in value than twenty-five dollars, provisions to an amount not greater than fifty dollars, household furniture kept for use to an amount not greater than three hundred dollars, and books, tools, or implements of a trade or profession to an amount not greater than one hundred dollars.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided further, That there shall be exempt from distraint such property as the tax-payer may select, not exceeding five hundred dollars in value.

The object of my amendment is to give to the tax-payer a choice of property that he may wish to have excepted from distraint. If he wishes to exempt a horse or a hundred dollars' worth of books or any other kind of property, he may do so, having the right of selection for himself.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope it will not be adopted.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 13, noes 47.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, withdrew the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I move to amend by adding after the word "notification," in line three hundred and sixty-six, the following:

And shall send a copy of such notice by mail to each postmaster in the county to be posted up in his office.

Mr. MORRILL. We have already voted down that amendment once or twice before, and I hope it will not be adopted now.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not understand that this amendment has been voted down.

Mr. COOK. I desire to say that this amendment was put in in relation to the notices to be given by the assessors, and now it is simply a question of giving notice when the taxes are to be paid or not giving such notice. The bill provides that notice shall be given by advertisement in one newspaper and at four other public places in the district. A large majority of the tax-payers, under that arrangement, get no notice at all. If this amendment should be adopted a large majority of the tax-payers will get notice.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that a large part of the irritation caused by this tax grows out of the fact that tax-payers are compelled to pay costs through not having received notice. I trust this amendment will be adopted. I insist that it is only a question between giving notice and not giving notice.

Mr. MORRILL. If gentlemen will read the section a little further on they will see that the evil they apprehend cannot possibly occur. This refers to the general notice published in the newspapers. But if the tax-payers neglect to pay after that notice they receive within ten days a personal notice. Certainly gentlemen will not require that they shall receive two personal notices.

Mr. COOK. They have to pay the cost of that subsequent notice.

Mr. CULLOM. I would ask the gentleman from Vermont what particular objection he has to the insertion of this clause. I suppose that the failure of the collector to send notices to the various postmasters would not cheat the Government out of any taxes at all. It is simply a duty enjoined on collectors for the purpose of getting the information among the people who have taxes to pay, so that they may have a further opportunity of being notified of the time when their taxes are to be paid. It is a matter of very little labor and expense, and it will certainly, in the rural districts of the country, enable a great many men to learn that they are called upon to pay their taxes at a particular time, when they would not, perhaps, know it otherwise.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman asks what particular objection I have to the adoption of this amendment. It is this: that it imposes very heavy increased duties upon the assessors, and that it would be necessary for each assistant assessor at least to provide himself with a copy of the Post Office book containing all the post offices in the United States, in order that he might be enabled to send notices to the different post offices in his district. In my own district, for instance, not less than two hundred such notices would be required, and in some of the large districts in the West there would be even more required. Besides, the notices in such places would be never seen or heard of.

Mr. ALLISON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] whose duty it would be to post up these notices which he proposes to send to all the postmasters.

Mr. CULLOM. The postmasters can do it.

Mr. ALLISON. Suppose they do not do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 25, noes 13; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORRILL and CULLOM were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes forty-eight, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. I would like to draw the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who has this bill in charge, to a case of great oppression which has arisen.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. CHANLER. Yes, sir; I have an amendment to offer. I move to insert before the last proviso in this paragraph the following:

And that the assessor of each district shall at stated periods make a full and accurate report over his own signature, duly sworn to before a notary public, of all articles seized and held by him as forfeited for violations of this act by any person or persons, that such report shall specify the names of the owners of the articles so seized, together with the value of the same, and the particular section or sections of this act violated by such person or persons, whereby the said articles were forfeited to the Government; and such reports shall be addressed to the chief of the Bureau of Internal Revenue on the first of every month.

The object of this amendment is simply to authorize and require the assessor of each district to make a report to the chief of the Bureau of Internal Revenue in this city of all articles seized by him as forfeited under the law for violations of the internal revenue act.

Let me state a case that came under my observation, and in reference to which I made application for relief to the head of the bureau, with whom I had a conversation, which has led me to offer this amendment. A livery-stable keeper in good faith hired a horse and wagon to some persons to him unknown. Those persons left the city of New York and went over into the State of New Jersey. On the other side of the river they got possession of some boxes of cigars, not stamped or marked, and began to peddle them. The consequence was they were arrested by the authorities, and the horse and wagon belonging to the citizen of New York were seized and held by the assessor. The case was brought to my notice, and I applied to the bureau for relief. I asked the chief if it was optional for the assessor to seize, hold, and sell that horse and wagon belonging to an innocent party, and there was no redress. The answer of the chief of the bureau, as I understood it, was that there was no redress; and therefore I have offered this amendment.

If gentlemen will give their attention, I will state that they will find that by my amendment the assessor is called upon to make a return monthly to the head of the bureau of the articles seized by him, giving the value of each article and the name of the person from whom it has been seized; and thereby persons whose property has been seized can obtain ready redress, if they are entitled to it, from the only place where the law permits them to obtain relief.

I hope my amendment will meet with the approval of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. MORRILL:] or, if it does not, that he will at least explain that it is not necessary under the law.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not, perhaps, fully understand the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] as I was unable to hear it all when it was read at the Clerk's desk. But so far as I do understand it, I am opposed to it, and hope it will not be adopted, for I think the public notice in the courts where cases of forfeiture are tried is sufficient, and where certainly all the persons who are interested would learn the cause of such forfeiture.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] allow me to ask him if there is any provision in the law regulating the internal revenue to enable the citizen, whose property has been seized by the assessor, to obtain speedy redress from the superior of that officer? As the law now stands, is not the person whose property has been seized completely at the mercy of the assessor? And is it not due to the citizen that he should have some means provided by which his property can be released if he is an innocent party? Does the law provide any such means now? I understand that the gentleman does not know, and still he opposes a good, sound remedy because he individually does not know whether that is the law or not. It certainly cannot injure the law to put into it a provision requiring the assistant assessor in each district to make a monthly report, such as I have indicated, to the chief of the bureau here in Washington, by means of which the citizen can obtain speedy relief if entitled to it.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. CHANLER, and upon a division there were—ayes 17, noes 35; no quorum voting.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being bill of the House No. 513, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled Senate bill No. 310, to change the place of holding the courts of the United States for the northern district of Mississippi; when the Speaker signed the same.

DIRECT TAX IN INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary in reference to the collection of the direct tax in the States lately in rebellion.

PURCHASE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, Senate bill No. 203, entitled "An act to enable the New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company to purchase a certain amount of the public lands not now in the market," was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, submitted a report from the Committee on Territories in response to a resolution of the House, adopted February 26, 1866, asking for information as to the necessity of a clerk for that committee.

The report states that in the judgment of the committee a clerk is necessary for the transaction of their business.

The report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

NAVIGATION OF ILLINOIS RIVER.

Mr. ROSS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to improve the navigation of the Illinois river: which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER asked leave of absence for ten days for Messrs. UPSON and TROWBRIDGE. Leave was granted.

MAIL COMMUNICATION WITH BRAZIL.

Mr. ALLEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to report to this House the conditions of the contract made for the transportation of the mails between the United States and Brazil, and to state whether such conditions have been complied with by the company contracting to perform such service, and whether the steamships employed have been such as were required by the law authorizing the service; also, to state whether the Department has any information of the contract having been assented to and executed by the Brazilian Government, and further directing that no amount of the subsidy be paid unless the contract has been fully complied with on the part of the company and duly assented to by the Brazilian Government, as required by the act authorizing the service.

PASCHAL'S EDITION OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing from George W. Paschal, Esq., his copyright in a limited number of his edition of the Constitution of the United States, with his notes of judicial and legislative decisions thereon, together with the copious index thereto; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. DAVIS moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at fifty minutes after three o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BOUTWELL: The petition of William H. Wood, and others, of Baltimore, Maryland, and Charles C. Sewall, and others, of Medford, Massachusetts, in favor of a Bureau of Education.

By Mr. BROOMALL: The petition of citizens of Delaware county, Pennsylvania, praying for such change in the internal revenue and tariff laws as shall enable the manufacturers of the United States to compete with those of other countries with success.

By Mr. COOK: The petition of citizens of Grundy county, Illinois, for protection for American wool.

By Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio: The petition of Jonathan Palmer, and others, citizens of Clermont county, Ohio, praying for a modification of the tax on common tobacco.

By Mr. DONNELLY: A petition signed by citizens of Alexandria, Douglas county, Minnesota, for the establishment of a new land district in Minnesota, with the office at Alexandria.

By Mr. EGGLESTON: The petition of Colonel H. L. Burnett, and others, citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of a law to equalize bounties to soldiers and sailors and to increase the rate of pensions.

By Mr. HART: The petition of banks and bankers of Rochester, New York, asking for an extension of the time fixed by law for the taxation of ten percent on the circulation of State banks.

By Mr. HIGBY: The memorial of Martha A. Estill, asking the payment of a claim against the Government.

By Mr. HUBBARD, of New York: The petition of numerous citizens of the village of Norwich, in the county of Chenango, New York, for a mail route from said village to the village of Sidney Plains, in the county of Delaware.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania: The petition of citizens of Washington county, Pennsylvania, for an increase of duties on foreign wool.

By Mr. PAINE: The remonstrance of Frank Abbott, and others, citizens of Marquette county, Wisconsin, against the change of the route of a certain land-grant railroad therein named.

By Mr. PERHAM: The petition of James L. Perham, for a pension.

Also, the petition of Mrs. Nancy Bills, for compensation for destruction of property by order of United States officers.

By Mr. ROLLINS: The petition of Stephen Thayer, and 35 others, citizens of New Hampshire, praying for an increase of duty on imported cigars.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 15, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 10th instant, a copy of a letter from D. L. Yulce, formerly chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to the Post Office Department, dated January 9, 1860, inquiring as to the effect of legislative action in increasing the pay of mail contractors, &c., and a copy of the reply of the Postmaster General thereto: which, on motion of Mr. RAMSEY, was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the Senate proceeds with the regular business of the day, I wish to say a word in reference to the report of the committee on reconstruction, or rather the joint resolution which has been passed by the House of Representatives, and is now upon the table of the Senate, reported by that committee. Many inquiries have been made of me by gentlemen as to when I proposed to call up the resolution which has been passed by the other House, for action here. I desire now to state that I have consulted, informally, the members of the reconstruction committee.

on the part of the Senate, and we have come to the conclusion that we shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of that resolution on Monday next; and I beg also to express the hope that when it is taken up we may devote the entire hours of the Senate, with the exception, of course, of the morning hour each day, strictly to the consideration of that business, and with the expectation, or the hope at least, that we shall be able to dispose of it in the course of the week.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator say that he has consulted all the members of the committee?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I consulted all who were present at the time. I did not consult the Senator from Maryland because he was not in his seat. I will now only repeat the hope I before expressed, that we may take up the subject on Monday next and confine ourselves to its consideration, with the idea that we may be able to finish it in the course of next week.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana, praying for the establishment of a branch mint in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana, praying for the alteration and extension of the southern boundary of that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented an address of colored citizens of Chicago, Illinois, dated April 23, 1866, expressive of their gratitude to the Senate and House of Representatives for the passage of the civil rights bill recently vetoed by the President of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON. I present the petition of Mary Good, an aged lady of Baltimore, who states that her daughter, an only child, on whom she depended for support, was killed on or about the 16th of August, 1865, by a shot fired by a sentinel intended to have been aimed at a deserter from the military service of the United States. She states that she was wholly dependent on this daughter, and thinks she has made out a case for the interposition of Congress, either to vote her a small sum of money in gross to support her, she being upward of seventy years of age, or to give her a pension. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I present the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York against the proposed tax of five cents per pound upon cotton. I ask that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance, and inasmuch as the subject is one of very considerable interest at this time, and as this memorial contains some valuable information in relation to the importation of cotton into Liverpool for several years from India, Egypt, and Brazil, I move that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of mechanics and laborers in manufacturing establishments, praying for such an adjustment of the tariff of duties on imports as will afford ample protection to the labor and industry of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of Hopestill Bigelow, praying to be allowed eleven years' back pay, claimed to be due him as a pensioner of the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the petition of H. W. Johnson, president of Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania, asking, in the name of four million freedmen who now call for education, that education which slavery forbade, and in the name of a still larger number of "poor whites," who need that instruction which slavery withheld, and finally in the name of justice, humanity, and religion, asking that free education be secured to all the children of the United States. I do not know that there is any committee of this body to which this petition can be, with any particular propriety, referred, but the Judiciary Committee is that to which all petitions go which have no other natural destination, and I therefore move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. YATES presented a petition of citizens of Illinois, praying for an increase of the duty on importations of foreign wool; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of women of Illinois, praying that universal suffrage and enfranchisement may be granted without regard to sex; which was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. NYE presented the memorial of Richard Chinery, praying for compensation for beef cattle furnished for the use of destitute and suffering Indians in California, in the years 1851 and 1852, under contract with the then Indian commissioner for the northern district of that State; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of E. Brown, Jr., and that he have leave to withdraw his petition and other papers.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 300) to reduce the rate of interest on the national debt, and for funding the same, have directed me to report it with amendments, and if it is the pleasure of the Senate I should like, as the honorable Senator from Maine has announced his purpose to take up the reconstruction subject next week, to have this bill set for Thursday if there be no objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object to having that fixed. I want to take up several of the appropriation bills during this week, that are on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. Do you want the whole week?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that I shall, but I should not like to have any special order made.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I will simply give notice that I shall endeavor to get this bill up some day this week in order to have the action of the Senate on it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My particular objection is that I gave notice to the committee that I am opposed to that bill and shall object to its being taken up at any time so far as I am concerned, if I can prevent it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate must pass judgment on that point.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It does not meet my approbation in any particular, and therefore I do not want any day fixed for it at any rate.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. GRIMES. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report a bill (S. No. 318) to authorize the appointment of an additional Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

The bill was read a first time by its title and passed to a second reading.

Mr. GRIMES. I will venture to ask the Senate to suspend its rules in order to proceed to the consideration of this bill. I think there will be no hesitation in passing it with the explanation that I shall be able to give of the necessity of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be put on its second reading now, if there be no objection, and then the question of its consideration will be open.

The bill was read a second time at length. It proposes to authorize the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint an additional Assistant Secretary of the Navy, who shall perform the same duties and receive the same salary as is by law allowed to the present Assistant Secretary of the Navy. The office thus created is to cease by limitation in six months from the approval of this act.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. It is due to the Senate that I should state the reasons why the Committee on Naval Affairs have proposed that such a bill as this should be passed at this time.

A few days ago the two Houses of Congress united in passing a joint resolution congratulating the Emperor of Russia upon his escape from assassination. When that resolution came from the House of Representatives to the Senate, on the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. SUMNER] it was amended so as to authorize and direct the President of the United States to transmit the resolution to the Emperor. The present Assistant Secretary of the Navy had filed his resignation, to take effect from to-day, and, as the agent of the Navy Department, was about to visit Europe for the purpose of inspecting the various navy-yards, ships-of-war, and improvements in each, and improvements in ordnance and naval appliances that have been perfected by the European nations during the last few years. I suppose it is not unknown to the members of this body that foreign nations, and especially the British, are in the habit of sending naval officers here to examine with the utmost minuteness everything of that description that is done by us. It is probably known to the members of this body that there is attached to the British legation Captain Buythesa, one of the most competent men in the British navy. He is employed for no other purpose than to make such investigations as it is proposed by the Navy Department that the present Assistant Secretary of the Navy shall make during the months of this summer.

When the resolution congratulating the Emperor of Russia was adopted by Congress, it was suggested by the Secretary of State, and by some other persons connected with the Administration, that Mr. Fox should be deputed to carry the congratulatory resolution to Russia; and it was also suggested to him that he should withdraw his resignation as Assistant Secretary, for the reason that it would give more éclat and would be more acceptable to the Russian Government if he went in his official capacity, as second in authority in the Navy Department, than if he went as a private individual.

It is for that reason that this bill has been reported. Added to this consideration is the fact that on account of the peculiar phraseology of the law organizing the Navy Department, no one, in case of the absence, from sickness or otherwise, of the Secretary of the Navy, can perform the duties of that Department except the Assistant Secretary; and in order to guard against accidents, or the possibility of anything of that kind happening, it is proposed to pass this bill. Mr. Fox proposes to start in the Miantonomoh, an iron-clad ship, a class of improved impregnable vessels, for which this country is indebted to him more than to any other person in the world except to Mr. Ericsson, now lying at Halifax and ready to go—the best iron-clad ship, I believe, in the world, and which, we hope, and he believes, will safely cross the Atlantic. I believe the appearance of that ship in European waters would have a greater tendency to promote peace between the nations of Europe and this country than all the diplomats we shall be likely to send to Europe during the next thirty years.

I will say, furthermore, that this can be attended with no additional expense. The whole sum that will be appropriated, should this bill be passed into a law, will be $1,750, which will not be so much as would be the expense of sending a special messenger to the Emperor of Russia, as the President is required to send if he does not adopt some such plan as this.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

CIRCUIT COURT IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 563) to regulate the time and fix the place for holding the circuit court of the United States in the district of Virginia, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment; and I ask for its present consideration. It merely changes the place of holding the court from Norfolk to Richmond, and fixes the time. I presume there will be no objection to it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out the following clause:

And special or adjourned terms of said court may be held at such time and on such notice as may be ordered and prescribed by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, with the same power and jurisdiction as at regular terms. And said court, at any such regular, special, or adjourned terms, shall have power to issue and enforce all writs and process, make all orders, and do all acts necessary for the due administration of justice and the exercise of their jurisdiction.

So as to make the bill read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the circuit court of the United States in the district of Virginia shall be held at the city of Richmond, commencing on the first Monday in May and on the fourth Monday of November, in each year; and the said court may adjourn its session, now authorized, from Norfolk to Richmond, and there hold the same, and transfer to said last-named place all records, files, process, and property pertaining to said court. And all proceedings and process in or issuing out of said court, which are or may be made returnable to any other times or places appointed for holding said court than herein prescribed, shall be deemed legally returnable on the day specified and at Richmond, and not otherwise; and all suits and other proceedings in said court which stand continued to any time or place shall be deemed continued to the place and time prescribed by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. VAN WINKLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 90) to suspend temporarily the collection of the direct tax within the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 319) to apportion the issue of the national currency to the several States and Territories and to the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 320) to amend an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads and telegraphs in said State," approved March 3, 1863; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 91) to refer the claim of Frederick Vincent, administrator of Le Caze & Mallet, to the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. NYE. I presume there will be no objection to the resolution, and I ask for its present consideration. It is simply a proposition to refer a claim to the Court of Claims. The resolution was read at length.

Mr. CONNESS. Is it not establishing an entirely new rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the present consideration of the joint resolution objected to?

Mr. TRUMBULL. This would be conferring a new jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims by an act of Congress. I do not know that it is objectionable, but I think it ought to be examined in reference to the principles involved.

Mr. NYE. Let it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it has already been examined by a committee and reported I do not desire to have it referred.

Mr. NYE. Let this resolution go to your committee. I did not know it was to change any rule. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

ASIATIC CHOLERA.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 116) to prevent the introduction of the cholera into the ports of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. SUMNER to the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, when this measure was before the Senate a few days since I had stated in part my reasons for supposing that it was not within the constitutional power of Congress to pass it, and I have but a word or two to add in addition.

The honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] placed the authority to pass this measure upon the commercial power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. According to his interpretation of that power, there is hardly anything that might not be done, not only by Congress with the assent of the States, but by Congress in spite of the States. I think the honorable member and the Senate will find upon turning to the cases to which he alluded, the passenger cases, and more particularly to the license cases and the case of Houston vs. Moore, reported, I think, in 5 Wheaton, that this principle has been over and over again proclaimed as the true one with reference to the power of Congress under that clause; that it does not in any manner conflict with the police power of the States; that it therefore does not conflict with any power which the States may deem necessary to preserve the health or the morals of their citizens; that it does not, consequently, conflict with the power which the States have ever been supposed to possess, not as a concurrent, but as an exclusive power, to establish quarantine. The passenger cases, upon which my friend from Massachusetts perhaps in the main relied, were cases involving the validity of an act of the Legislature of New York, which imposed a tax upon every captain or officer of a vessel, one dollar and a half or two dollars—I forget the exact amount—for each passenger landed in New York; and subjected him to a penalty unless he paid the tax; and it appropriated the proceeds of the tax to two purposes, one of which was for a hospital, and the other, I think, for the insane. The opinion of the Supreme Court, as pronounced by Mr. Justice McLean, placed the invalidity of that law entirely upon the ground that it affected the vessel and the rights of the master and the passengers, not after they were landed but before they were landed. It was intended to be a license for the authority to land, and was intended to appropriate the sum which the party was obliged to pay in the nature of a license for some State purpose. But the honorable member will find if he will look at the opinion of the judge to whom I allude, that throughout he not only recognized the authority of the States to establish quarantine, but treated that authority as an exclusive one. And on looking at the other case to which the honorable member referred, that of Gibbons vs. Ogden, reported in 9 Wheaton, the honorable member will find that Chief Justice Marshall, in speaking for the whole court, recognized the validity of State quarantine laws, not only as laws passed in the exercise of a concurrent power, but as laws valid, because the States possessed exclusive power over the subject.

Now, what is proposed to be done by this act? Passing by the supposition that it will accomplish its purpose, supposing that the Army and the Navy can be used practically for the purpose of preventing the malaria, if it be a malaria, caused by the air's being infected by the presence of the disease brought here by persons who may be laboring under the disease, it gives to Congress the authority to go into the States and establish hospitals or quarantine, or do anything else which in the judgment of the three Secretaries, who are constituted a board for that purpose, may be necessary to keep out the disease, if it can be kept out, or arrest its spread. Where is that power to terminate? If Congress has the authority to legislate upon the subject, if the preservation of the health of the country is one of the objects intrusted to Congress at all, it is a power not limited to the seaport, not limited in its exercise to the city, but it must be coextensive with the entire country; and if the cholera after making its appearance in the city of New York is supposed, in the judgment of the board, to be likely to spread all over the State of New York, unless it shall be arrested by the Army and the Navy and by the measures which they shall be recommended to adopt by physicians in order to keep the disease from spreading, they can go all over the State and establish hospitals, establish quarantine, so as to impede commerce strictly territorial, strictly internal.

In the cases adverted to not a single judge doubted that the internal commerce of the States was never submitted to regulation by Congress under the commercial power. Indeed, the very terms in which the power is communicated exclude the idea that it was intended to embrace internal commerce. The power conferred is the power to regulate commerce between foreign nations and the United States and commerce among the States. Marshall, therefore, in the case alluded to of Gibbons vs. Ogden, admitted, as clear beyond dispute, as a proposition never disputed anywhere during the deliberations of the Convention or by any judicial opinion pronounced in any case in which the question arose, that the internal commerce of the States was with the States exclusively. If that proposition be true, (and I am sure my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, will not deny it,) does it not follow that what you propose to do is without authority provided it conflicts with that proposition? A man wants to go from the city of New York to Albany with his vessel, or to travel on the canal from Albany to the extreme lakes. That commerce is clearly internal; but, like foreign commerce, it may be the means of spreading the disease; and if Congress, under the authority to regulate commerce, has a right to prevent the spread of the disease, or the introduction of the disease, it must have an authority to prevent it from spreading anywhere or from being introduced anywhere. It may for the first time be introduced into Albany or into any of the towns situated upon the canal which connects the Hudson with the lakes; and what I say of New York is applicable to all the other States. What do you propose to do? To let the doctors get together and advise the board, which you are about to constitute by this resolution, formed of the three Secretaries. The disease may be introduced into Albany, or, if it makes its first appearance in the city of New York, it may find its way into Albany. They will therefore call upon the Secretaries to establish a quarantine at Albany, and as quarantine may not answer the purpose absolutely, as the disease may find its way into Albany in spite of the quarantine, and one or more cases may be found occurring in Albany, then the way to prevent the spread of the disease is to do what we do with the small-pox disease—establish hospitals; so that under the power which Congress is supposed to have over the health of the country, they may establish small-pox hospitals and cholera hospitals everywhere throughout the States. I maintain, therefore, with due respect to the members of the Senate who think there is authority to pass this resolution, that it is contrary to the best-established principles in relation to the construction of the Constitution in the particular relied upon not only the best established but principles that never have been questioned by the Supreme Court at any time. Without troubling the Senate further, I submit that it seems to me the proposed measure is clearly beyond the power of the Government.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Maryland has called the attention of the Senate to the decisions of the Supreme Court which, in his opinion, bear decisively on this question; but, sir, with the ingenuity of a practical lawyer he has omitted to call the attention of the Senate to that decision which, perhaps, of all others, is the most applicable to this question. With the permission of the Senate I will make up for the deficiency of the learned Senator, or at least endeavor to do so, by calling attention to the case, which, unless I mistake, in its precise language is applicable to the pending question. I refer to the case of the United States vs. Coombs, in the twelfth volume of Peters's Reports. There you will find one of the able and well-considered judgments of the late Mr. Justice Story, particularly treating of this question. By "this question" I mean the power of Congress under the clause of the Constitution giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. I will read a passage from his judgment, page 78, as follows:

"The power to regulate commerce includes the power to regulate navigation, as connected with the commerce with foreign nations and among the States. It was so held and decided by this court, after the most deliberate consideration, in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 189 to 198."

All that the Senator will of course recognize; for, indeed, he has already admitted it in what he has said and cited. The learned judge then proceeds:

"It does not stop at the mere boundary line of a State; nor is it confined to acts done on the water, or in the necessary course of the navigation thereof. It extends to such acts, done on land, which interfere with, obstruct, or prevent the due exercise of the power to regulate commerce and navigation with foreign nations and among the States. Any offense which thus interferes with, obstructs, or prevents such commerce and navigation, though done on land, may be punished by Congress, under its general authority to make all laws necessary and proper to execute their delegated constitutional powers."

Those are the pointed words of Mr. Justice Story.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. That is to regulate commerce.

Mr. SUMNER. To regulate commerce.

Mr. MORRILL. Does the Senator mean to be understood that a regulation in regard to cholera, a disease, is a regulation of commerce?

Mr. SUMNER. I do, certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. Then the cholera is commerce?

Mr. SUMNER. No; cholera is not commerce, but cholera comes from passengers.

Mr. MORRILL. Then is the regulation of it commerce, or is it the treatment of a disease? Is it a regulation of health or a regulation of commerce?

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will pardon me if I say it is one of those matters which runs in several directions. It is connected with passengers, and it may be viewed in its connection with passengers.

Mr. MORRILL. As a disease, not as commerce. It is connected with passengers as a disease and to be treated of in the nature of health, quarantine, sanitary regimen, or whatever you please, but not in the nature of commerce to be regulated.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, I will ask my learned friend, is he not too refined when he undertakes to say that in regulating passengers you may not regulate them so far as concerns their health; that you may regulate passengers in every other way except so far as concerns health? I assume, and I put it to my learned friend, that if under the commercial power you can regulate the introduction of passengers, that carries with it, necessarily, all the incidents of health, because you may apply to the introduction of passengers certain sanitary requirements. I do not see how, logically, the Senator can avoid that conclusion.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senator whether, when you have reached the point that you have got to treat the passenger for his health, the power of the General Government does not cease, and the police power of the State for the protection of the public health at that very point necessarily intervene.

Mr. SUMNER. To that my reply is just this: that the jurisdiction having once attached, it must, from the nature of the case, continue to the end; otherwise the utility of the jurisdiction would fail.

Mr. MORRILL. I beg to suggest to the Senator that it never did attach to the passenger as touching his health; and the moment it becomes necessary to treat him for his health, then the power to regulate commerce ceases, as a matter of course.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says it never did attach to the passenger so far as his health is concerned. How can he say that? Does it not attach to the passenger absolutely? You by your statutes require a certain allowance of water and a certain allowance of food on board a ship. Does not that go to the health?

Mr. CONNESS. And a certain allowance of room on a ship.

Mr. SUMNER. And a certain allowance of room in the ship; a certain allowance of air. Does not all that concern the regimen of health? Now, we propose to go further, and by a careful system of regulations to look still further at the condition of health, and to surround it with still further safeguards; not merely to require a certain amount of food and a certain amount of air and a certain amount of space, but to go still further according to all the suggestions of modern science in order to prevent the introduction of this disease. To my mind, the conclusion seems inevitable, it is just as clear as that $A + B = X$, or that two and two make four. I cannot imagine any conclusion more direct. If you concede that you may make regulations with reference to a passenger, I know of no regulations more important, more absolutely founded upon this constitutional requirement, than those regulations which concern his health. And now the Senator seems to suggest that this is an exercise of power for the first time. How so?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Chair is under the necessity of calling up the order of the day, being the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the unfinished business go over informally that we may have a vote on this measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday can be laid aside by unanimous consent. No objection being made, the unfinished business will be laid aside, and House joint resolution No. 116 will be continued before the body.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not understand that this is an exercise of power for the first time. It is nothing more, perhaps, than a new application of an old power or an expansion of an old power to a new condition of circumstances; and perhaps I may say enlarging this old power, because the circumstances require the enlargement. I do not understand that any new fountain is opened; no new source is drawn upon; no new principle is invoked; we go back to the original text of the Constitution which has been so often applied in kindred cases, and we insist upon its application now.

If I understand the argument of the Senator, it is that all quarantine regulations belong to the States exclusively. Am I right in that?

Mr. MORRILL. Most of them.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator, I understand, says they belong exclusively to the States.

Mr. MORRILL. Yes.

Mr. SUMNER. If I carry that argument of the Senator still further, it would be practically to say that the Government of the United States might make all possible regulations with reference to passengers water borne, but could not touch them in regard to sanitary regulations the moment they entered our harbors. That is certainly the inevitable conclusion, and permit me to say it is an absurdity. I will not consent thus to despoil this Government of a power which to my mind seems so essential to the national health.

Now, if you go back to one of the early statutes, for instance, the statute entitled "An act respecting quarantines and health laws," which bears date February 25, 1799, it will be perceived that while the quarantine is left to a certain extent under the control of the States, the United States officers are directed to assist the State officers in enforcing the quarantine. Here is a clause which I will read:

"And all such officers of the United States shall be, and they hereby are, authorized and required faithfully to aid in the execution of such quarantines and health laws, according to their respective powers and precincts, and as they shall be directed from time to time by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States."

In that statute it will be seen that the quarantine was placed under a mixed government, partly of the State and partly of the United States. Certain United States officers were directed to aid State officers in enforcing quarantine, and the United States officers were from time to time to receive instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury. How could that be if the United States had no jurisdiction over this matter?

Mr. MORRILL. They are to do it, by the very terms of the act, in aid of the State; they took no jurisdiction.

Mr. SUMNER. I will come to that. The Senator reminds me that it was by the very terms of the act in aid of the State; and now allow me to call the attention of the Senator to what he will remember perfectly well in the early history of our country, that the bounds of the jurisdiction of the Federal and State governments were then unsettled. Take, for instance, one of the greatest cases in our history, that of the fugitive slave bill which was passed in 1793. The Senator will remember that the seizure of fugitive slaves was intrusted under that act to State officials, and also to certain United States officials; but the jurisdiction was recognized as concurrent. It was only at a late day when the relations between the State and Federal jurisdiction were better comprehended that the Supreme Court decided that that jurisdiction could not be confided to the State authorities.

Now, I submit that you will find in this statute of 1799 relating to quarantine a jumble or a confusion not unlike that which you will find in the fugitive slave act of 1793; that is, a recognition of a concurrent jurisdiction in the State and Federal governments over this question. This measure which is now before the Senate would follow out, I take it, the general principle or reasoning of later years and assure the jurisdiction to the Federal power, or, as I always like to call it, the national rather than the Federal power. It would secure it to the national power, and to my mind it properly belongs to the national power, and no ingenuity of the Senator from Maine, my excellent friend, can satisfy me that it ought not to be intrusted to the national power. It is essentially a national object, and can be performed effectively and thoroughly only through the national arm. If you intrust it to the different local authorities, you will have as many systems as you have States or communities, and you cannot bring your policy to bear with that unity which it ought to have in dealing with so deadly a foe. You should be able to carry into this matter something of the combination and directness of war. At the same time I beg to say, as I have heretofore said, that I do not recognize this in any respect as a military measure; I treat it absolutely as a commercial measure; I derive it from a commercial power, and by the amendment which I have introduced I would place it under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, in reply to the last position of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, I desire to call his attention to the phraseology of his own amendment and see whether he treats it solely as a commercial question. "It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy to adopt an efficient and uniform system of quarantine." If it is a commercial question, what has the Secretary of the Navy to do with it?

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Senator wish an answer?

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to have an answer.

Mr. SUMNER. The amendment that I have moved charges this duty upon the Secretary of the Treasury, in conjunction with the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, under the direction of the President of the United States. He has that to do with it which the statute gives to him, and he has it because the statute gives it.

Mr. MORRILL. So I see; but I ask the reason why, if it is a commercial measure, you connect the military and the naval power of the Government with it. That is the question.

Mr. SUMNER. Because it may be necessary to act with regard to it on the water; and who would be more competent to advise upon such a matter than the Secretary of the Navy? Or it may be necessary to use military force, and who more competent to supply it than the Secretary of War?

Mr. MORRILL. I have elicited all the answer I expected; it is all the answer that could be given; whether it is a reason or not I submit to the Senate. It is all that the utmost stretch of ingenuity could give. There is no possible reason for associating either the War or the Navy Department with it, except that you want to bring to bear upon the question the power of the Navy and of the Army. Now, is that so? So far as you desire to go upon the water to enforce a quarantine, if you have a right to enforce it the Secretary of the Treasury has a military power at his command always to enforce the revenue laws; and there is no more necessity, on that score, of associating the Secretary of the Navy, I submit to the honorable Senator, to enforce a quarantine than there would be to enforce the laws preventing smuggling. The association is incongruous; and it is either from the fact that you desire to get a power that you are conscious you have not under the authority to regulate commerce, or, I submit, that it is an association of a power not necessary; and so of the War Department.

This is strictly a commercial question, says the honorable Senator. I submit that it is not in any sense. In the first place, cholera is not the subject of commerce; and in the second place, the immigrants are not the subject of commerce; they are the subjects of navigation, one of the incidents of commerce. They enter into that element, and not in any sense are they the subjects of traffic, which is the chief characteristic of commerce. They are simply an incident to commerce in the sense that navigation is an incident to commerce; but when you come to consider the subject of the introduction of immigrants into the country, they lose that character entirely.
